Once the contract is signed, we as a committee would be engaging in censorship if we further restricted the group's performance. If we told them immediately before a show that they must be "politically correct" or refrain from using certain words or expressions, we would be censoring. In the course of our committee's involvement with the comedy group in question, "Some Assembly Required," there seems to have been some confusion about this order of events. Were they asked to "clean up their act" before or after the contract was signed? If the contract was signed, and they were later told to hold back much offensive material, the Bison Programming Committee sincerely apologizes. Such confusion will never happen again. As a result of this controversy, our committee has pledged to be absolutely positive no contract has been signed before any requests to alter the performance are made. We have been made aware of the importance of this and will from now be far more conscious of our actions.

If the Bucknell community is unhappy with our policy or our work as a programming board, let us know, or even better join our committee. Help expand our market place of ideas by contributing yours.

Members of the Bison Programming Committee work very hard for you, the Bucknell community. Our aim is to provide quality entertainment in the Bison on a regular basis. We are doing something about the commonly heard complaint that "there are no alternatives here but drinking and fraternity parties." We are doing the best we can. When controversy such as this arises, we once again did the best job we could to communicate and clarify our position. No doubt, controversy will remain. Are we censors? We don't think so. However, it is only through the expression of many opinions that we came to this collective conclusion. If the Bucknell community is unhappy with our policy or our work as a programming board, let us know, or even better join our committee. Help expand our marketplace of ideas by contributing yours. It is on such expression of different points of view, opinions and ideas that we place all our hope for future improvement at Bucknell, and in the larger society.

Alumnus criticizes lack of debate team coverage

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing to inquire as to why The Bucknellian does not report on the performance of the Bucknell Debate Team. Bucknell participates in dozens of debate tournaments every year, yet the success of the team is rarely covered in the pages of your publication. It is dumbfounding that every issue of The Bucknellian contains from four to six pages of Bison sports results, while intellectual competition is overlooked.

Bucknell, as a university, is reflected by your publication. You must ask yourselves, do you wish to portray Bucknell as a sports camp, or as the academic environment it is meant to be. Perhaps if you enlightened your fellow students about Bucknell's Debate Team and reported on its performance, Bucknell may eventually be more like the Ivy League schools most Bucknellians tried to get into, but couldn't.

Recognition of Chanukah, not just Christmas, asked for

TO THE EDITOR:

Has anyone noticed the Christmas trees around campus? I know I have. What I have not seen is any indication that another holiday exists, Chanukah. It disturbs me that no effort has been made to make the Chanukah celebrating students feel recognized. I do not mind the Christmas trees, but I have trouble accepting the fact that many people feel they are non-denominational. Thousands of dollars were used to refurbish the Bison, and no one could spend five dollars to buy a menorah. The book store gives out gift boxes that have a Christmas design on them, and I would rather not give my parents Chanukah gifts in those boxes. I do not want the trees taken down, just some indication of Chanukah, a banner or menorah. After two and a half years at Bucknell, I feel I have waited long enough to see some changes. All I want is some awareness that not everyone celebrates Christmas and some consideration for those who do not.

Stevie Ray Vaughan's previously unreleased tracks now available

BY STEVE TISA

With the shock of Stevie Ray Vaughan's tragic death over a year ago, the last thing fans of the esteemed blues guitarist expected was a curtain call. But thanks to the efforts of his brother Jimmie, listeners will have the pleasure of making a trip to the record store one more time for this late great legend.

The album, entitled The Sky is Crying is a collection of ten previously unreleased studio performances by Stevie Ray Vaughan and Double Trouble, selected from the five years between 1984's Couldn't Stand the Weather and 1989's In Step. Jimmie Vaughan, Stevie's older brother and former guitarist for the Fabulous Thunderbirds, compiled the album. Regarding the studio tracks, Jimmie states in the liner notes, "It's really amazing, if you think about it. It was all there—like 'Put me together.' I went through a whole van of multitrack tapes, but there wasn't a whole lot of stuff that was finished. It seems like he just left this record."

The studio tracks that were "left behind" are not, in fact, completely new. Many of the tunes were staples of the band's live repertoire. Fans who have had the chance to see him in concert may recognize a few.

The album has many pleasant surprises. The opening song, for example, "Boot Hill," is the only recorded Vaughan song that features him on slide guitar. Recorded during the In Step sessions, the song was left off of the album because of its darker subject matter. The majority of the songs on In Step have a positive message. "Boot Hill" on the other hand, does not. An example is this line from the song, "I don't want to wax you, baby, 'cos you gave me my first thrill".

The title track, "The Sky Is Crying", a slow burning blues track with an Albert King influence, is particularly good, as is "May I Have a Talk With You," a Howlin' Wolf composition. But the album is not all slow blues. "Chitlins Con Carne," a Kenny Burrell cover, shows the jazz influence that is also present on the popular In Step song "Riviera Paradise."

Although many of the songs on this compilation reflect Stevie Ray Vaughan's musical influence, none do more than "Little Wing," a brilliant instrumental version of the Jimi Hendrix classic. Stevie's interpretation, however, is unique. With jazz, blues, and the obvious Hendrix influence, it features a collage of musical styles blended with elegance.

Despite the strength of tracks like "Boot Hill" and "Little Wing," the album's final song, "Life By the Drop," is by far the best. A song about alcohol addiction and the ability of people to pursue their dreams, it serves as an appropriate footnote to Vaughan's rocky and final trip back to the studio. Prior to the In Step sessions, Stevie suffered from alcoholism and cocaine addiction. After putting himself through intensive rehabilitation, he gathered himself to release In Step, an album which critics feel is by far his best. "Life By the Drop" also features Stevie on a 12-string acoustic—it is, in fact, the only acoustic song he ever recorded (with the exception of the MTV Unplugged session, which has not been released).

Collectively, The Sky Is Crying is a phenomenal album, displaying facets of the guitarist never seen before. The selections are excellent, each one showing a different aspect of Stevie's talent, from blistering guitar solos, to jazz-inspired melodies, to his distinctive blues voice. The results leave much to imagine what would have come from this great musician had fate not cut his time short.

The Bucknell Dance Company, which performs each fall and spring, will open its 1991-1992 season tonight in the University Theatre in Coleman Hall at 8:00 p.m. A second show will be held tomorrow night at 8:00 p.m. According to company member Joni Hong '92, the troupe will perform eight or nine pieces choreographed by students, faculty, and guest artists.

Graciela Daniele, a Tony-award nominee for "Once on This Island," will be premiering Adios. Daniele arrived at Bucknell a few weeks ago and has been working with the dance company. "Adios is like an Argentinian tango," Hong stated, adding, "It tells the story of her [Daniele], her mother, and her grandmother and how death took them away from her." The company will also perform a piece by Ze'eva Cohen that was done earlier this season.

Danna Frangione, director of dance, will premiere three new works in this weekend's performances. Her pieces are entitled Skim the Light, Yanomami, and A Shaker Suite. Guest choreographer and performer Todd Rosenlieb will perform a trio. Rosenlieb, a 1989 Bucknell graduate, is currently an M.F.A. candidate at New York University's Tisch School of the Arts.

Bucknell faculty member Shellie Cash-Muller will be premiering The Longing Within, a dance that uses music composed by David Ames '94. Enigma, choreographed by Faith Hunter '92, will also be on the program.

Tickets for this weekend's performances are $4.00 ($3.00 for students and senior citizens) and are available at the Langone Center Box Office. Tickets will also be sold at the door.

Candlelight service to be broadcast nationally

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The interdenominational candlelight service in Rooke Chapel is an old tradition that was started in 1956 by William McRae, and is to take place again this holiday season.

The service consists of scripture readings, congregational singing, and music provided by the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Rooke Chapel Ringers. The Ringers are fairly new to the candlelight service, added in 1982 by Dr. William Payn, associate professor of music.

The 1991 celebration is particularly significant since this year marks the 100th birthday of Robert L. Rooke, the chapel's namesake, and also acknowledges the Rooke family donation of a trompette en chamade, a rank of 61 trumpet pipes to the chapel organ. The bells used by the Ringers were also donated entirely by the Rooke family.

According to Rev. Jim Hammerlee, university chaplain, the candlelight service has "grown tremendously in popularity" and he cites the reason for this to be the addition of the Ringers. "They seem to be so special for the holiday season. People respond to the bells."

In 1987, the service went from being held two nights to three and this year the chapel has added a fourth ceremony. WVIA-TV has also agreed to broadcast the hour-long service for the second time in five years. The service can be seen on channel 44 at 9:00 p.m. on December 24 and again at 3:00 p.m. on December 25. More than 100 PBS television stations have signed up to broadcast the event so far, and the service is to broadcast as far away as Hawaii, the Virgin Islands, and Alaska, as well as all of the New Jersey and New Hampshire PBS stations.

The Rooke chapel is the site for a Bucknell Candlelight Christmas, an hour-long holiday special produced by WVIA-TV, Wilkes-Barre/Scranton. Recorded live on December 7, 1991 at Bucknell's annual traditional candlelight service, the program features the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Rooke Chapel Ringers.

Breakin' Bison roll over Mt. St. Mary's

Mike Bright '93 and Bill Courtney '92 combine for 45 points to lead Bucknell to a 30-point win; improve record to 2–1

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's basketball team looked impressive this week as it ran its early season record to 2–1 with a 93–90 loss to Georgia on Sunday, and a 96–67 thrashing of Mt. St. Mary's on Wednesday. Earlier, the Breakin' Bison had opened with a 13-point win at home against the University of Maryland–Baltimore County.

Two nights ago in Emmitsburg, Maryland, Mike Bright '93 (23 points, 12 rebounds), Bill Courtney '92 (22 points), and Patrick King (19 points, eight rebounds) led the Bison to its 30-point victory. In a game which saw all 12 players get off the bench, Bucknell was able to dominate in every category. The team made 54% of its shots from the floor, including a sizzling 73% (11–15) from three point land. Bright scored 17 of his points in a first half which saw the the Bison build a 20-point lead. After the first 14 minutes of the game, Bright had his 17 points, while the entire Mt. St. Mary's team had just 18.

Head Coach Charlie Woollum need not worry about this year's squad if they continue their torrid shooting from three-point range. Woollum will be in search of career victory number 267 when the team travels to Loretto, PA tomorrow night.

Bucknell made sure they put the game on ice by starting the second half with an 8–0 run. Head Coach Charlie Woollum commented after the game, "We pushed the ball up the floor, which is our game, and we executed well on offense because our defense played well. We lost that heartbreaker at Georgia and I was concerned we might not come out focused, but we did. Everyone decided to play a little harder."

The heartbreaker to which Woollum was referring was the gritty three-point loss in Athens, Georgia on Sunday afternoon. Bright played one of the best games of his career as he scored a personal-best 29 points, including a school-record seven three-pointers. Bright also grabbed a game-high 12 rebounds. King (20 points, seven rebounds) and Paul Olkowski '93 (15 points, seven rebounds) also played well for the Bison.

Georgia built a 45–33 halftime lead, mostly thanks to forward Kendall Rhine, who scored 16 points and grabbed eight rebounds, seven of which were off the offensive glass. In fact, 13 of the Bulldogs 18 first-half field goals came from the paint.

The Bison rallied in the second half, however. For the first eleven and one half minutes of the half, Georgia maintained between an eight and 14 point lead. However, Bright's long three-pointer with 8:24 left in the game triggered an 11–2 run that closed the margin to three. Georgia built the lead back up to as much as eight, but clutch three-pointers from Chris Simpson '94, and Olkowski with 28 seconds left, followed by a Simpson free throw cut the lead to just one.

Two free throws by Georgia's Litterial Green made it a three–point game with 14-seconds left. Then with six seconds remaining, Georgia center Charles Claxton blocked Russell Peyton's three-point attempt to tie the game, enabling the Bulldogs to hold on for the victory.

Overall it was an impressive showing against a Georgia team that typically does very well in the powerful Southeast Conference. "I was very pleased with our effort," said Woollum. "I think we have a good team and a chance to win down the stretch. We had such a poor first half. Being an experienced team, we gave them some awfully easy buckets. We got the lead and quit moving on offense. This was our first game on the road and we had two five-minute stretches in the first half where we got flustered."

Georgia coach Hugh Durham was complimentary of the Bison's performance, saying, "Down the stretch we hit eight of our last eleven free throws, and that was critical, but we could not ever shake them, and that it is a tribute to Bucknell. They're accustomed to winning, and they're experienced at winning. That makes them dangerous."

The Bison's next game tomorrow at St. Francis (PA). After taking a break for final exams and Christmas, Bucknell will then head to New Mexico for the Lobo Classic on December 27 and 28. The next home game is not until January 4 against Cornell.

Co-Captain Patrick King '92 and Mike Bright '93 prepare to outleap three Mt. St. Mary's defenders during last season's 98-81 drubbing of the Mounties in Davis Gym. A dominant rebounding tandem thus far, the two will be looked up to for continued steady play and team leadership.

Grapplers look for reversal at Lehigh

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bob Ferraro '94 captured his third championship, and twelfth victory, at the Lock Haven Mat Town Invitational, but the Bison grapplers lost their first three matches of the season. Bucknell suffered losses at the hands of Clarion, Army, and Lock Haven, though Coach Bob Ferraro remains optimistic about his team's chances for the rest of the season.

The Mat Town Invite was perhaps Bucknell's finest showing of the past two weeks, though the brightest performance came from the rookie Ferraro. Demonstrating once again that he is already a force to be reckoned with, he ripped first seed Matt White of Penn State 10–2 in the 190 lbs. weight class. Ferraro's record of 12–0 speaks for itself, as he has competently carried the team through the season thus far.

The Bison also got some relief from two other place-finishers in the tourney. Russ Parker '93 put in another fine performance to place fourth in the 118-lbs. class, and his record currently stands at 4–6. Ken Herceg '92 also stepped up his wrestling a notch by placing fifth in the 177-lbs. class. His record is now 10–4, including five victories by fall.

Coach Ferraro was pleased with the performance of the team at the tournament, stating that he was encouraged by the younger members of the team. "They beat some really good kids out there. We seem to be constantly making strides individually, and that's encouraging." He also noted the deceiving nature of the event, as some of the top teams in the country were participating. Even so, the Bison managed to finish ahead of North Carolina State, who are currently ranked 11th in the country.

The Bison travelled to Penn State the following weekend to take part in the Domino's Pizza Duals where they once again grappled with the finest teams in the nation. Against Clarion, the high points were few and far between for the Bison. With Mike Van Doren '92 out with a knee injury, and Clarion clearly dominating the matches, Ferraro decided to utilize three of the four extra wrestlers he brought on the trip. The Bison were crushed 33–7 by the eighth-ranked Clarion, but the team was encouraged by what appeared to be some excellent performances. The only winners for the team were Jason Prokopckak '95, who won 16–4, and Matt DiGiacomo '92, who won 7–0.

After Clarion, the Bison lost a heartbreaker to Army, 22–19 though the team put in a superb performance. Ron Wellman '95, quickly becoming one of the dominant wrestlers on the team, was winning 8–0 before Dave Warnick of Army defaulted with an injury. Other victors included George Swann '93, Herceg, Ferraro, and the heavyweight, Ben Myers '92. Once again, the team was encouraged by a tough loss.

The grappler's final match came against Lock Haven, a local rival, who nailed the Bison coffin shut. Bucknell never once garnered a lead, though they managed to come back to make the final score respectable. Once again, Wellman provided some heroics, as he defeated Mike Herceg 8–4. Then, after trailing miserably, the Bison were carried by Ferraro and Bucknell's Herceg, who picked up two quick wins to round off the scoring.

Ferraro was quick to note the effect that the newer members of the team have had overall on the wrestling program. Coming at a critical time, with Van Doren out, members like Ferraro and Wellman are playing an important role, as well as complementing the leadership of the older members of the team.

Ferraro remarked, "The younger guys are really showing some improvement and gaining confidence with each match."

The team heads to Lehigh today for the Sheridan Invitational where they will face such nationally–ranked teams as Lehigh, N.C. State, Old Dominion, and Bloomsburg. Ferraro maintains that he is merely looking to place third overall, as he sees Bloomsburg and North Carolina as providing trouble. Though he is not content to rest on what the team has accomplished, Ferraro was able to remark that he was "pleased with where the team was heading."

Colin Bridgewater — The Bucknellian

Phil Elliot '93, shown here competing in a home match last season, currently has a 6–7 personal record going into this weekend's Sheridan Invitational to be held at Lehigh University. Many of the nation's top collegiate programs will be represented at the Engineer's Stabler Center which seats over 5,000 spectators.

Equestrian team places second at final competition

BY JEN WALSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After strong showings in both of its previous competitions, the Bucknell Equestrian Team finished the semester in good keeping with its success, placing second out of a field of ten teams. Riding in their last horse show of this semester, the team members traveled to Indiana University of Pennsylvania on November 24 for a cold and snowy day of competition. Taking home top honors as high point team over all was Wilson University, finishing with 39 points.

Bucknell managed to come in a very close second with 33 points total, thus tightening the race for regional championships and a shot at nationals to a neck-and-neck battle with Wilson. If Bucknell finishes the year as the team with the most points total, it will then automatically be recognized as regional champion and go on to compete for the national championship. In order to do so, however, the Equestrian Team will have to continue to excel throughout next semester's four competitions, one of which is likely to be held at Bucknell.

Though not quite as sharp at IUP as at the previous show, Bucknell riders still turned in many outstanding performances, overcoming the unluck of some of their horse draws as well as the difficulty of the courses and the judging to finish as reserve high-point team. Blue ribbons were won on the flat by Gretchen Krutenat '95 and Jeanine Romanelli '93 in the novice division, Amy Brent '95 in the walk-trot-canter, Becky Tyler '92 in the open, and both Lara Weaver '94 and Amy Clare '95 in the wall-trot.

"Our horse draws hurt us a little more this show," commented team member Jo Meszoly '94. "It seemed like we had somewhat easier rides at Seton Hill. In this competition, a lot of times we just had to jump right on a difficult horse and figure out how to deal with problems, and just hope that the judges didn't pick up on it." In agreement was Bucknell rider Brenda Rose '94, who noted that, "we got some pretty good horses for jumping, but (our picks) were harsh on the flat."

In no place during the competition was this more evident than with the draw of a horse named Bobbie, a small bay mare notorious for her refusal to canter, who was assigned to be ridden by Bucknell's Romanelli in the novice flat division. Yet despite the difficulties her mount presented, Romanelli took first place in the class, combining with her earlier first-place finish in the novice fence division to tie her for high-point rider at the end of the day. In the ensuing ride-off, Romanelli defeated a Wilson rider of a higher division in a test that required individual demonstrations of the sitting trot, posting trot, canter with two lead changes, the hand gallop, the halt, and the dismount, with both riders having to exchange horses.

The fence courses at IUP gave many riders great difficulty, as the indoor ring in which the jumps were set up was extremely small, forcing the riders to think constantly in order to maintain control of their mounts. Tight turns in the courses and the small spaces between the jumps provided trouble for many in keeping their horses from breaking stride or miscalculating the number of strides between jumps. In addition to Romanelli's first place, Bucknell riders brought home two other blue ribbons in the fence courses, with captain Kelly Kordish '92 winning her open class and Rose taking first in her novice class.

As things now stand, Bucknell is a close second to Wilson in the overall region. Though a second-place finish out of ten teams would be considered quite an accomplishment for any team, the Bucknell riders are seeking higher ground.

"There is so much more team spirit this year, and we're really looking forward to being region champions," said team president Cathy Retallack '93. "It's going to be a close race to make nationals."

Records fall during autumn seasons

Women's soccer and tennis set new school victory marks as Stagliano '92, Henesey '92, and Ward '93 break individual records

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

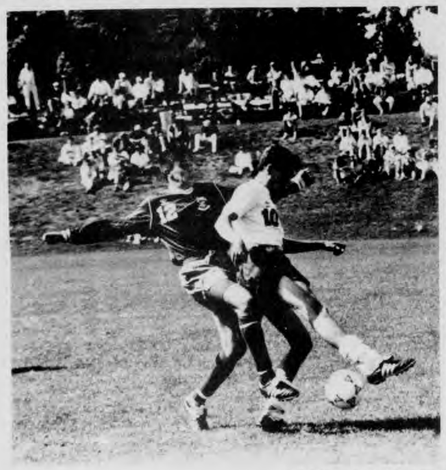
The fall season in Bucknell athletics was marked by a number of landmark team accomplishments and record individual performances. 1991 was an entertaining year in sports and The Bucknellian takes a look back at a few of the memorable highlights.

Probably the most dominating performance came from the men's cross country squad (see page one) who finished the year by placing 13th in the nation. Equally as impressive, though, was the effort put forth by the women's tennis team. Coach Rose Ewan's team began the year with a shutout of Holy Cross and continued to dominate through its season-ending shutout of Hofstra. The victory over Hofstra marked the team's Bucknell-record 15th straight victory and 16th overall, another school mark. While the team's performance was outstanding, one individual performance may have been even more remarkable. Four-year starter and co-captain Karen Stagliano '92 finished the year with a 16–3 record, a mark that raised her career total to 48–9, topping Bucknell's all-time singles victories list. While the team will miss Stagliano and fellow co-captain Mary Ann Benack '92 next season, this year's starting lineup also included three first-year players and a sophomore, who will return to aid the Bison in their fight for Patriot League supremacy.

The men's water polo team also used 1991 to prove itself as one of Bucknell's most competitive and consistent sports. Entering the season, the team was looking toward co-captains Kevin Schroth '92 and Walter Kelly '92, as well as the three-year goalkeeper John Bradbury '92, and the veteran threesome did not disappoint. Schroth led the team in goals scored and total points, while Kelly followed closely behind in both categories. For his outstanding play all season long, Schroth was named to the first-team on the All-Eastern Water Polo Team. The seniors led Bucknell into the Eastern Championships, the first time the squad has qualified in three years, where the Bison finished fifth. The season ended with a 14–13 record after spending many of the latter weeks ranked among the nation's top 20.

The year's most dramatic improvement came from Head Coach Toby Lovecchio's women's soccer squad, which, in only its second varsity season, finished fourth in the Patriot League and qualified for the league's tournament. After finishing its first-ever varsity season with only one victory in 1990, the Bison finished this season at 7–9, a mark that does not include a strong showing in a pair of victories against club teams. The future appears to hold more improvement for Bucknell as a number of key players will return in 1992. Leading this group will be first-year sensation Lisa Gibbons '95 who finished her initial campaign with 15 goals and 3 assists, totaling 33 points and 2.36 per contest. Her totals ranked her second in the Patriot League and helped to earn her honors as the Patriot League's Rookie of the Year. While the Bison will miss the leadership of seniors Shannon Smith '92, Mandy Head '92, and Genine Streeper '92, the squad appears ready to place itself among the Patriot League's finest.

Jon Wise—The Bucknellian



Colin Bridgewater—The Bucknellian

The men's soccer team finished its season one victory shy of its female counterpart. Similar to the women's squad, Coach Craig Reynolds' 1991 team was paced in scoring by a first-year player as Greg Beatty '95 tallied six goals for a total of 12 points. The Bison's future prospects are promising as Reynolds will need to replace only four players, Dan D'Angelo '92, Alex Lyras '92 and co-captains Evan Goldsmith '92 and Keith Goodling '92. The 1992 edition of the Bucknell men's soccer team will return its entire set of forwards, its four leading scorers and its goaltender, Mark Wrigley '94, a veteran even as a sophomore. Add to that the deep Bucknell bench and next season could be promising for the Bison.

Another greatly improved squad in Bucknell Athletics in 1991 was the field hockey team. After finishing 1990 with a 4–12 record, the Bison finished this season at .500 for the first time since 1984. For her efforts, Head Coach Jen Averill was named the Patriot League's Coach of the Year to which she responded, "I'm extremely honored by my peers, but I share this award with my team because it is a reflection on them." Also leading the post-season award winners for the Bison was Jeanette Aurand '92 who was the League's co-MVP for her outstanding efforts. Aurand received first-team honors in the Patriot as did Katrina Mueller '93 and Almira Baldwin '94. Leading the Bucknell defense was the ever-solid Allison Arth '93 and goalkeeper Danielle Ward '93, who earned two Patriot League Player of the Week Awards during her outstanding junior campaign that included a new school record of seven shutouts.

Despite the football team's disappointing totals in the won-loss columns, the 1991 season was marked by a number of outstanding individual achievements. After posting the school's first winning mark in a decade in 1990, the Bison were substantially hurt by graduation and this season's inexperienced edition were forced to learn its lessons in battle as Bucknell finished the season at 1–9. The individual performances were led by co-captain Brian Henesey '92, who gained 686 yards on the season which pushed his career total into first place on Bucknell's all-time rushing yardage list. Also making his mark on school football history was linebacker John Spatafore '92, who finished just shy of Bucknell's career record for tackles. For his play this season, Spatafore was named to the Patriot's All-League First Team, as was tight end Jeff Pape '92. Earning second-team honors were defensive linemen Bill Pisano '92 and John Lusk '93, as well as tackle Eric Rutter '93. Leading next season's offense will be tailback Matt Walsh '93, receiver David Berardinelli '93 and quarterback Travis Kopp '95, while the defense will return Lusk, linebackers Kevin Kane '93 and Hew Woodward '93, as well as safety Blaine Fawcett '93, the only Bison defensive back to start in every game.

The Bison women's volleyball team opened the season with an early seven victories and despite finishing in eighth place in the Patriot League, the squad's 9–23 mark was the best in four years. Leading the Bison in 1991 was Kathleen Sullivan '92, who earned a spot on the All-League Second-Team. In addition, Sullivan has been nominated to become a CoSIDA Academic All-American. Also outstanding for Bucknell was Kara Forosisky '92, a four-year player and a two-time captain. She led the team in aces and kills. A great deal of younger Bison, including a number of first-year players, look to continue the volleyball team's improvement.

Although often overshadowed by the men's team's success, the women's cross-country squad had a respectable season of its own. Leading the Bison throughout the year was Kristen Opdyke '93, who finished first in every one of Bucknell's contests in 1991. Opdyke culminated her outstanding season by capturing the gold medal at the ECAC University Championships at Lehigh. By outdistancing the rest of the field by almost ten seconds, the junior helped Bucknell to a ninth-place finish. Earlier the team had finished fifth at the Patriot League Championships.

The fall season of 1991 served as both a farewell to some of the greatest athletes ever to compete for the Bison, as well as a showcase for the talented student-athletes who will be gracing playing fields in Lewisburg for years to come.

score of someone running for a team. The team with the lowest score captures the title.

For example: Ray Zorback of Arkansas finishes second overall, but first amongst team runners. Arkansas gets one point.

Tom Wuchenich '92 paced Bucknell by finishing 35th in team scoring, and 52nd overall with a time of 31:54. His aggressive and tenacious effort led Gulden to say, "He really put the hammer down. He must have passed 50 or 60 people in the last three miles."

Bucknell's top runner most of the season, Matt Deardorff '92 put off medical school interviews long enough to finish 43rd in team scoring. (All other finishes will be team scoring) However, he did visit Johns Hopkins earlier this week.

Bob Kelly '92, Jason Cahilly '92, and Judd Jarden '93 rounded out Bucknell's scorers. Kelly's 32:20 was good for 66th. Cahilly and Jarden were less than 20 seconds behind, finishing 79th and 83rd, respectively.

Interestingly, had each team been required to count all seven runners instead of just the top five, the Bison would have finished in the top eight. Bucknell's last three finishers outkicked numerous opponents to the finish line.

"We ran really, really well," said Gulden. "I'm ecstatic. I wouldn't have predicted we'd finish that high. We just did a super, super job."

The team strategy of staying with the general pack and then running the final three miles worked well. "We did exactly what we planned to do. We knew we had to be patient and not go out too hard," reflected Gulden. "We decided we'd run controlled for three miles, and then try to pick up the pace. The last three miles, we were just picking people off."

The steady growth in confidence within each runner left the team and its coach wishing that they had another meet.

"I'd bet anything that we'd finish among the top ten," said Gulden. "We've always done the work, now we have the new-found confidence to go along with it. I wish we had another meet."

The improved confidence helped Bucknell avenge some early season results. Kansas, Georgetown, Dartmouth (the only other non-scholarship team in the championship), and Boston University all outran the Bison earlier in the season, but succumbed to the Orange in Arizona.

At least as incomprehensible as a thirteenth-place national finish are the sacrifices that they had to make to get there, placing 4.0 and 3.9 GPA's in jeopardy in order to prepare for this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity. Not to mention postponing medical and law school interviews. But even before they boarded the plane back to Harrisburg, many of these SCHOLAR-athletes had their noses in their books.

Finally, to put just the athletic accomplishments of this team into perspective, next March when everybody's eyes are glued to CBS for the NCAA Basketball Championships and that "no-name" team that reaches the Sweet Sixteen, remember that Bucknell's cross country team was in that position themselves four months earlier.

the victory. Boles, who has been a part of many victorious relay teams since the beginning of the season, came through in the 200 breaststroke, winning the first individual race of her collegiate career in a time of 2:33.72. Although Bloomsburg went on to win to final relay, the Bison had enough points to take the meet, 126-115.

The Bucknell teams then traveled to Philadelphia for their first official away meet of the season, where they faced LaSalle. The LaSalle teams, which boast many scholarship swimmers, were heavily favored to win both contests. Due to that reality, Kachmarik decided to swim her athletes in different events than usual, to see what they could accomplish. Unfortunately, the effort did not amount to much, as Bucknell succumbed to a 161-88 loss. The Bison captured only two victories on the day. Grunow won the 50 free with a time of :24.60, and the 200 free relay squad of Grunow, Hartnett, Boles, and Falcione closed the competition with a first place finish.

Despite the outcome of the meet, the Bucknell women did enjoy many strong individual performances, including four second place finishes. Linda Fink '95 took second in the 1000 free, in what turned out to be a very close race. Her time of 10:49.54 is the fastest distance time that the Bison have seen in recent years. Fink later swam to another second place finish in the 500 free (5:20.34). In the 100 back, Hartnett also claimed second with a strong in-season time of 1:01.76. Finally, Jean Cadigan '95, whose impressive performances thus far have come as a pleasant surprise to Kachmarik, grabbed second in the 100 breaststroke in a personal-best 1:11.35.

The Bucknell men fared slightly better against LaSalle than did their female teammates, enjoying five victorious races in a 147-96 loss. Gross began by winning yet another 50 free, this time in :21.91. Gross, the 1991 Patriot League 50 free champion, has yet to be beat in the event this season. R. Steenson followed with a victory in the 200 IM (1:58.97), while his brother D. Steenson took the 200 back (1:55.98). Britton rounded out the individual victories with one in the 1 meter diving (231.96). The men then followed the example of the women by closing the meet with a first place finish in the 400 free relay. Schroth, D. Steenson, Deitrich Conze '94, and Gross combined to swim to a time of 3:14.06.

During the meet, the Bucknell men also had many strong individual performances in addition to those which garnered first place. Most notable among those were three second place finishes. Stew Harris '95 stroked to second places in the 500 (4:50.82) and the 1000 frees. His time of 9:55.34 in the 1000 marks the second time this season that Harris has broken the 10:00 mark, a feat that he never accomplished prior to coming to Bucknell. Farrell was also just outtouched in the 200 breaststroke, which he swam in 2:16.30.

The Bucknell men traveled to Penn State this weekend for an invitational meet featuring strong teams from Penn State, Syracuse, and Connecticut. The women remain idle until January 8, 1992, when both teams are scheduled to go to Delaware to take on their former E.C.C. rival. Throughout December, the teams will also be preparing for an intense Christmas training trip to Florida.

Mike Bright '93

Mike Bright '93 has been named Co-Athlete of the Week by The Bucknellian for his achievements on the basketball court last week.

The 6'6" junior displayed tremendous versatility as he established a new single game school record for made three-point field goals (7) as well as converting the higher percentage slam dunk.

His 29 points and 12 rebounds against the University of Georgia this past Sunday equalled his career best. Defensively, Bright contributed two blocks and four steals against the Bulldogs in a heartbreaking 93-90 loss.

Wednesday night he continued his sharp shooting from behind the three-point arc by going a perfect five for five as well as yet another rim rocking jam against Mt. St. Mary's.

The Patriot League also recognized Bright's efforts by naming him its Player of the Week.

Kelly Dee '94

Women's basketball player Kelly Dee '94 has been named The Bucknellian's Co-Athlete of the Week for her outstanding play last week at the Lady Bison Classic tournament.

The outstanding sophomore was named the tournament MVP for her efforts in Bucknell's two victories which gave the Bison the tournament title. Dee tallied 40 points in the two games, including an impressive 23 point, 11 rebound performance against Drexel in the championship game. Dee was also seven for 11 from three-point range and had four steals on the weekend.

Last season's Patriot League Rookie of the Year joined teammates Joy Sandler '92 and Juliet McGee '93 on the All-Tournament team.

The Bison look to increase their 2–1record as they take on Coppin State at Davis Gymnasium tonight at 7:30 pm..

Bison Afield

BY MICHAEL CORELLI
Bucknellian Staff Writer

December 1, 1991 — On location in Chappaqua, New York. Thanksgiving turkey was the highlight of my break until Sunday when I had the opportunity to shoot the latest rage in clay targets, sporting clays. Yes, the week was looking dismal for my Giants who lost to the pitiful Bengals and suffered a compound wound by having all of their wildcard competitors win. However, they'll be back and I was able to escape these threatening worries for the hour and a half it took to complete the sporting clays course at the Campfire Club in Chappaqua.

If you enjoy trap and skeet but are put to sleep by the lack of diversity and reality of these sports, this is the answer. You proceed from station to station, in the middle of the woods, in a similar way that you proceed from hole to hole in golf (in the woods). At each station there exists a completely different shot. Furthermore, every shot is made to mimic, in the best way possible, shots that are encountered in real hunting situations. This creates an energy when facing the course that simply cannot be matched in any other clay target sport. At each station there are five sets of pairs that are pulled at the shooter's command. The course I had the pleasure of shooting consisted of 10 stations culminating in a final tally of shots of 100. A complete, championship course consists of 14 stations and 140 shots. This is sure to be the future jewel of clay shooting competitions.

A few of the highlight stations included the first station, which was made to create a waterfowl, overhead shot, as the clay pigeon pairs are shot directly at you over a hillside and about a hundred feet high. The second station creates the type of shot that is encountered when hunting for ruffed grouse, as the clay target flies down a tight ravine from your right against a hillside. The fifth station, the one that I completely flailed on, was in my book the most difficult station. It consisted of the clay coming on a low line drive over your left shoulder that created in my mind the belief that the target was hazing me, knowing that I couldn't hit it and laughing all the way. There is still suspicion on my mind that the clays pulled for me at this station weren't clay at all, but rather rubber or steel or some other impervious material.

Battered and humbled, I proceeded to the sixth station which included a straightaway shot at Mach one, imitating the appearance of the ruffed grouse and its ability to seem and fly as if it had Acme jet packs tied to its feet. The most enjoyable station of the course was the seventh, which highlighted a running rabbit clay along the ground. The eighth was a comparable shot to a pheasant shot as might be encountered in a corn field and the tenth was a high tower shot. Overall the sporting clays course was exhilarating. My score was less than impressive so I will fail to disclose this embarrassing fact, however my brother Chris's score of 70 on his first go around was extremely laudable.

In closing I would urge you to seek out and seize the opportunity to shoot a sporting clays course. Though it is likely to be a new and humbling experience, shame to those who fear a new challenge. As one man I travelled the course with, who went on to shoot an 84, expressed, "Nothing ventured, nothing gained."

"I think we've done well, and we continue to maintain good quality programs," said Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, whose office oversees the athletic program. "That's a positive point for the institution that's good for us in admissions," she continued. "We can attract good students who want good athletic competition."

Shailor said the department stayed within its budgetary guidelines last year despite increased travel costs associated with the Persian Gulf war and rising fuel prices.

Hartzell said the Bison continue to entertain new revenue options. One promising revenue source is an increase in "guarantee" games. In such contests one school pays a lesser school a fixed sum of money and covers travel expenses for that team to visit the campus for a road game. The stronger school gets an almost-guaranteed win in front of a large, paying home crowd; the other school gets a payday and builds valuable experience against talented opponents.

The men's basketball program has scheduled several such games, including this year's game against New Mexico and last weekend's near upset of Georgia. Hartzell said this money is pooled into a special account; this revenue covers special road trips such as last year's jaunt to the San Juan Shootout. The women's program is also exploring more guarantee games.

Hartzell and head football coach Lou Maranzana have refused to accept such offers in football. He said Buckell has entertained six-figure offers from Division I-A schools, but he is concerned about the risk of injury if the Bison face bigger, stronger players.

Many universities have been forced to cut sports to balance their budgets. Hartzell said the Bucknell has examined and, to date, rejected this option. He said each sport was examined and prioritized for the order of possible cuts, but two factors kept the department from acting.

Many programs only have a budget of a few thousand dollars and part-time coaches, but several dozen participants; Hartzell said the small savings was outweighed by the cut in participation. He also said the department resisted cutting sports after the recent addition of women's soccer and men's and women's crew.

Facing a depressed economy and a declining college-age population, the University is trying to control costs in all areas and "maintaining the status quo with minimum growth, according to Shailor. She said the University's committee on planning and budget is doing a cost analysis throughout the University to determine which expenses and programs should be cut, should such a need arise.

In the athletic department, Shailor said, "The fact that we haven't had to cut [any programs] is due to prudent management on their part."

"We may have to face that at some point," Hartzell said of cutting programs, "but I don't think that's imminent."

Women's basketball captures tourney

Bison stampede St. Francis (PA) and Drexel en route to inaugural Lady Bison Invitational title; Dee named tournament's MVP

BY KIRK PETERS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After dropping its opening game to perennial powerhouse Delaware by a 24-point margin, the Bucknell women's basketball team came back to take many by surprise. The team managed to accomplish in one weekend what it did all of last season, winning two games. In doing so, they not only won the Inaugural Lady Bison Classic tournament, but they also brought some new life to the program. After a dismal 1990–91 campaign, the Bison, under new head coach Juliene Simpson have a new attitude which they diplayed in wins over St. Francis (PA) and Drexel.

In last Saturday's opening round against the Red Flash, the Bison jumped out to an early ten-point lead. After seven minutes had passed, the Bison led 19–9. All five starters contributed to the early run. Tri-captain Joy Sandler '92 scored the game's first three points and then assisted on a Juliet McGee '93 layup. The Bison also got early buckets from tri-captain Kirsten Ellison '92, tri-captain Lisa Fink '93, and Kelly Dee '94 as the Bison benefited from a balanced attack.

Tom Carl—Media Services

Kelly Dee '94, pictured in a game last year, earned tournament MVP honors last weekend.

Bucknell continued the early torrent, widening its lead in the next six minutes. When Anne McGovern '93 hit from sixteen at the 7:44 mark, the Bison opened their largest lead of the half at 29–15. The Red Flash managed to cut the lead by nine points, but the Bison still went to the locker room leading 35–26. Along with the balanced scoring, Bucknell played terrific team defense holding St. Francis to just 12–31 shooting in the first half.

The Bison did not make things any easier for their crimson clad opponents in the second half. St. Francis managed to cut into the lead to 47–41, but the Bucknell women stepped up the pressure and began to pull away.

Fink led the Bison stampede, converting a layup off an offensive rebound and another off a steal. McGee followed with a put-back, and Fink converted off another steal as Bucknell went on an 8–0 run that stretched the lead to 14. The Bison went on another 8–0 run just three minutes later to stretch the lead to 20 and put the game on ice. Bucknell cruised to a 75–54 win.

Dee and Sandler led the Bison in scoring with 17 and 16 respectively while McGee and Ellison owned the glass, ripping down 27 boards between the two of them. Bucknell also benefited from a solid floor game from the point position as Fink scored twelve and dished out three assists.

After their first win, the Bison moved on to the championship game against Drexel the following day. The story was much the same against the Dragons. Bucknell jumped out early as they opened up a 21–8 lead in the first ten minutes of the game. Again all the starters contributed, but McGee led the way. She scored eleven of Bucknell's first twenty-one. The Bison managed to maintain that lead through most of the first half thanks to the play of the back-court duo of Fink and Dee. Dee had a great first half, tallying 14 points, including two three-pointers, and Fink added eight points and five boards.

Drexel, however, would not go away quietly. They went on a 12-6 run at the end of the half to cut Bucknell's lead to the smallest of margins at 42-41. The Dragons came out strong in the early part of the second half and managed to take a four point lead at 51-47. The next five minutes, however, were a showcase for the new attitude of the Bison. They went on a 20–4 run and buried the Dragons. Sandler paced the run with nine points, including a coast-to-coast bucket. Two three-pointers from Dee and five points from McGee filled out the scoring in the game's deciding run. The Bison hit their free throws down the stretch and went on to a 77–66 win and the tournament championship.

Debra Cook —Media Services

McGee had a monstrous game collecting 24 points and 15 rebounds. She joined Sandler, who finished with 11, on the All-Tournament team. Dee finished the game with 23 points and eleven boards and was subsequently named tournament MVP. It was an outstanding performance for the Bison, especially defensively. The Bison held Drexel to just .286 shooting for the game and outrebounded the Dragons 52–47.

The women's team finished last season with two wins, but this is a new year and, in effect, a new era for the Bison. The balanced scoring and team defense that were missing last season were both on display in last weekend's triumph. The early wins should provide the momentum for the Bison as they finish out their non-conference schedule and move toward Patriot League play.

Swimming teams split a pair of meets

BY MITCH BENTON AND ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Bucknell men's and women's swim teams both split a pair of meets the week before Thanksgiving break, bringing the women to a 3–1 record and the men to 2–2. On November 23, the Bison took on neighboring Bloomsburg at Freas-Rooke pool, before leaving for Philadelphia to swim LaSalle the following Tuesday. Both Bucknell teams defeated Bloomsburg but fell to LaSalle.

The Bucknell men held the upper hand against Bloomsburg before even entering the water, as they faced a team comprised of only eight members. This fact became evident immediately, when Bucknell won seven of the first eight events to establish a substantial 110-37 lead. The Bison opened the meet by capturing the top three spots in the 400 medley relay. Steve Droste '93, co-captain Chad Farrell '92, Jay Gross '93, and Rick Steenson '95 led the team in the event with a time of 3:44.01.

Bloomsburg then took the 1000 freestyle before Bucknell won the next six events. Swimming victors were: co-captain Don Steenson '92 in the 200 free (1:46.92), Gross in the 50 free (:22.14), Droste in the 200 individual medley (2:05.23), R. Steenson in the 200 butterfly (1:58.96), and Kevin Schroth '92 in the 100 free (:49.46). The Bucknell divers also followed the example set by the team's medley relays by sweeping the three-meter diving event. Eric Carr '93 took the top spot with a score of 210.30.

Head coach Dick Russell then decided to exhibition swim many of his competitors, rendering their swims unofficial, in order to keep the score down in a meet that had the makings of a blow-out. Despite his action, Bucknell won four of the last five events as well. John Bonaccolta '94 captured first in the 200 backstroke with a time of 2:09.30, while Doug Reid '95 was victorious in the 200 breaststroke (2:23.37).

The diving squad then went on to sweep yet another event, with Kevin Britton '93 winning the one-meter diving with a score of 245.85. The Bucknell 400 free relay of Gross, D. Steenson, R. Steenson, and Schroth closed the meet with another victory for the Blue-and-Orange combining for a time of 3:16.40. The final score of the competition was 159-63 in favor of the Bison.

Against Bloomsburg, the Bucknell women faced much stronger competition than did their male counterparts, but swam tough to beat a team that they have had problems with in the past. Kathleen Hartnett '94, Stephanie Boles '95, Kim McPherson '95, and Andrea Falcione '92 teamed up in the 400 medley relay to capture first place with a time of 4:11.92. That event gave Bucknell a lead which it never relinquished throughout the competition.

Co-Captain Margaret Grunow '93, competing against Army last winter, has multiple school records, and will lead the team in 1992.

Similar to the men's meet, Bloomsburg took the 1000 free before the Bison countered by capturing the next three events. Co-captain Margaret Grunow '93 started the trend by winning a close race in the 200 free by a .31 margin (1:57.98). Falcione then followed with a victory in the 50 free in :25.07. With the loss of Wendy Sheldon '93 to an injury, Bucknell head coach Lynn Kachmarik decided to go with Grunow as a replacement in the 200 IM, an event which Sheldon usually dominates. After only one event's worth of rest, Grunow went on to easily win the 200 IM in a time of 2:15.26.

Later in the meet, Grunow would also go on to take the 100 free (:53.67), her third individual victory of the contest. Hartnett immediately followed that performance with a first place finish of her own in the 200 back (2:13.20). Going into the final two events of the meet Bucknell had only a seven point lead and needed strong performances in those events to clinch

Ice hockey skates past Johns Hopkins

BY JEN WALSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bison club hockey team opened its season by splitting a pair of games. The team dropped its first contest of the year 9–2 to Drexel on the road November 24. They rebounded, however, with a stunning win over Johns Hopkins.

The Bison defeated the defending league champion Johns Hopkins in a close, hard-fought match for their first victory of the season. The Bison perservered through two early one-goal deficits to finally take a 4–2 lead in the third period, and held on for the 4–3 victory.

Scoring for Bucknell against Johns Hopkins were forwards Don Bateman '92, Jamie Abrahamsen '93, Scott Kuhn '94, and defenseman Pete Cook '92.

The win over Hopkins not only demonstrated Bucknell's ability to contend with the best teams, but was encouraging to the players in several other aspects.

The Drexel game was a different story altogether. Aside from Drexel providing tough competition for the Bison, Bucknell suffered, as very few players showed up for the season opener, leaving the team seriously undermanned—a problem that plagued the team last year as well.

Drexel dominated the game in every way to crush the amazed Bison. "Drexel surprised us a little bit —they were a better team than we had expected," said captain Bob Hauser '93. "They're a newer team, one we haven't played against before."

The one bright spot that could be seen in the otherwise thorough thrashing of Bucknell was the performance of Trevor Quick '95, who scored both goals for the Bison against Drexel. This contribution was especially encouraging as it came from a freshman, and it gave the team promise of some goal-scoring ability for the season.

"It seemed like a lot of the things we talked about in practice —forechecking, team defense, stuff like that finally started coming together in the second game," commented Hauser.

The Bison also got some strong support in goal, as netminder Alec Altman '94 shut down many of Hopkins' best offensive attempts, displaying the kind of goaltending necessary for a team looking to be a contender in the playoffs.

The Bison will attempt to extend their winning streak. The ice hockey team will play its next games on Sunday the 8th at UMBC and the following Wednesday at Dickinson University.

Athletic budget faces fiscal test

BY BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A quick glance through the sports pages reveals the many crises facing big-time college athletics: low graduation rates, bribes and payments to athletes, consorting with gamblers, athletes commiting violent crimes on campus.

Bucknell is thankfully removed from this seemier side of college athletics, but there is one spectre haunting nearly every college program, from the largest Division I universities to the smallest NAIA schools.

Recent reports have shown that Michigan State has the only athletic program in the Big 10 Conference not operating at a deficit. Conferences are playing musical chairs with their membership as schools scramble to lock up large media markets and the huge television revenues they bring. Universities as diverse as Drexel, Yale, and Millersville have cut programs, or are considering it.

Although future uncertainties always loom, Athletic Director Rick Hartzell said Bucknell's intercollegiate program remains fiscally sound and prudently managed. He noted, however, that Bucknell is fundamentally different from its larger brethren in Division I.

"Our program is not based on making or losing money," Hartzell explained. "The University funds athletics just like it funds everything else." At many schools, the athletic program is financially separate from the rest of the university, and must cover expenses through its own revenue. "We're not required to make money to sustain ourselves," he continued, "but we try to bring in as much revenue as we can."

However, Hartzell explained that such opportunities are limited. Currently, the department relies on ticket sales, program advertisements, and radio ads on football and basketball broadcasts. In recent years the department has added the weekly football and basketball highlights show, shown on cable systems across the northeast; this year Bucknell has joined Teamline, a national service providing Breakin' Bison radio broadcasts by phone. The University also receives NCAA revenues "in six figures" from Bucknell's share of the NCAA's television contract; the money is divied among all Division I schools.

Hartzell said ticket sales, the most obvious method for increased revenue, are limited. Men's basketball is limited because "you can't put any more people in" Davis Gym, and Hartzell refuses to charge admission to students. Ticket sales for football could be increased, but he said, "that depends on a lot of factors—how good is your team, how good are your home games, is Penn State playing a home game."

At many schools such factors cause the pressure to make money to become the pressure to win, but Hartzell doesn't soon expect to see big-money Bison boosters of shady reputation slinking around Davis Gym.

"I don't believe the pressure to win to increase revenue is going to change dramatically for us." He said, "People interested in the University want to see excellence" in all areas, and "football is our biggest opportunity to attract customers, and winning drives attendance.

"The great thing about a place like Bucknell," he continued, "is that most people keep that in perspective."

Bucknell currently has 26 sports which involve around 800 students for an amazing participation rate of nearly 25 percent.

Arson hits Phi Psi

Quick work of officers prevents major fire; construction work remains on schedule

BY BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

An intentionally set fire caused only minimal damage to the unoccupied Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house last week, but Public Safety Director Vince DeCerchio said quick action prevented serious damage to the structure.

The state police fire marshall has ruled the blaze arson. Safety Manager Jim McCormick said lumber and construction debris had been piled in the foyer and set ablaze. East Buffalo Township police are continuing the investigation, but DeCerchio said this week there are no new leads and "we may not have enough evidence to go further."

Physical Plant Director Robert Naugle said students are still scheduled to move in next week, but some work will remain to be completed. He said the affects of the fire were mostly limited to smoke damage and did not cause any significant delays in construction.

The fire was discovered at 2:30 a.m. on Tuesday, Jan. 7, when the building's smoke detection system sounded an automatic alarm. Public Safety officer Sharon McCrum and Sgt. Jeffrey Baird arrived to encounter a wall of flame inside the front door; using fire extinguishers they were able to knock down the fire and control it until firemen arrived.

DeCerchio issued letters of commendation to Baird, McCrum and radio dispatcher Jeffrey Klobe for their quick action in stopping the blaze.

Luncheon marks King's birthday

BY BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The life and legacy of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. was honored Wednesday at a campus luncheon attended by students, faculty, staff and members of the Lewisburg community.

The program, titled "Rekindling the Dream," commemorated the slain civil rights leader on what would have been his 62nd birthday.

The program's speakers had a common theme, that King's dream of equality has not been realized over two decades after his death. Alem Asres, director of multicultural affairs, echoing King's belief that "injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere," said, "people are still judged by their surname, their gender and the color of their skin." Asres and Kristin Skarie, director of student activities, organized the program. Skarie said she hopes to make the program an annual event.

Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, said "we still have a long way to go in finding our own diversity" at Bucknell. She also said the U.S. has not achieved equality in education, as the low-income areas often suffer with inferior schools, and the dropout rate is "exceptionally high," especially among minorities.

President Gary Sojka used the occasion to attack recent initiatives by the Department of Education to eliminate federal aid programs targeted for minority students. "I'm deeply troubled from things I see happening now from our duly elected officials," Sojka said. "There's a movement afoot to roll back thirty years of progress through the interpretation of law on who is and is not entitled to financial aid." Sojka also said the government "is undermining legitimate efforts to encourage diversity and equity." He said the Middle States Association of Colleges and Universities, the acrediting body which evaluates Bucknell, has come under "heavy handed federal pressure" to reverse a recent decision to add a diversity component to its review process.

Theater Dept. plans busy schedule

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While the remainder of the campus lulls into January, the theater department is maintaining a full schedule of rehearsals for performances in late January and early February.

Topping the bill is a groundbreaking rendition of Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland entitled, The Alice Project.

Produced in conjunction with the Bloomsburg Theatre Ensemble, performances are scheduled for January 30 and 31, at 7 p.m. and February 9, at 2 and 7 p.m. in the University Theatre in Coleman Hall.

Admission is free and open to the public, although tickets may be reserved at the L.C. Box Office.

The Alice Project offers a complete theatre experience and provides its audience with not only an amusing entourage of actors, but also handmade puppets of all sizes, and an original script and musical score. The production is intended to reach an audience of all ages, according to Laurie McCants, director and scriptwriter for the show and a professional artist with the Bloomsburg Theatre Ensemble.

Completing the creative team behind The Alice Project arecomposer Kyle Gahn, the new-music columnist for the Village Voice, scenographer and puppeteer F. Elaine Williams, Director of Theatre and professor of design, and lighting designer Steven A. Draheim, technical director of the Department of Theatre and Dance.

The students' ensemble of performers consists of eleven actors and three musicians. In addition to playing multiple roles, the actors will also be serving as puppeteers for theshow.

Also being rehearsed are two one-act plays for the Cap and Dagger production An Evening of One Acts.

This show will be performed on February 8 and 9 at 8 p.m. in Tustin Studio Theatre. Tickets are on sale now at the L.C. Box Office for $4 ($3 with a student ID).

"Speak Spanish For Me", a contemporary drama by Bernardo Solano, deals with a Hispanic youth's journey into the alien, upper-middle class, predominately white culture of Yale University. Directed by David B. Ames, the play addresses issues relevant to Bucknell.

Solano is a native of Columbia, a Fullbright scholar, and an MFA graduate of the Yale School of Drama, where "Speak Spanish For Me" was first performed. His play, "The Death and Life of Luis Rodriguez" won him the National Playwriting Award from the Mixed Blood Theatre in Minneapolis.

Lighting improved near Roberts, Gateways

BY BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Physical plant workers recently installed additional lights in both the Roberts quad and the area around the Gateways, completing the latest component in a continuing plan to upgrade lighting on campus.

Last semester the physical plant and the office of public safety worked with concerned students and administrators to compile a list of lighting needs on campus, But Robert Naugle, director of the physical plant, said the recently completed improvements were planned last year.

Naugle said the list developed this fall is being prioritized, and cost estimates are being completed.

The adequacy of campus lighting, especially in the area between Roberts Hall and the Gateways, came under increased scrutiny following several attempted sexual assaults last year.

Fight continues for crime reports

Federal court backs editors against Dept of Education

BY BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A federal court ruling removes the major roadblock preventing Bucknell and other universities from releasing the names of students included in campus crime reports.

The court decided in favor of the Student Press Law Center and three college editors in their lawsuit against U.S. Secretary of Education Lamar Alexander to block the threatened withdraw of federal funding from universities which release such information.

The preliminary injuction against the department recognized that the plaintiffs had a substantial liklihood of success on the merits of their claim that the Department's interpretation of the Buckley Amendment violated the first amendment.

"We're telling student journalists to visit their campus police and ask for the reports they're entitled to," said Mark Goodman, SPLC executive director. "And if schools continue to deny those reports, we

As the battle over the disclosure of campus crime reports came to a boil last summer, the college media discovered an unlikely enemy in its struggle for access: the U.S. Department of Education.

News Analysis

The controversy began with a federal court ruling in Missouri in March, which forced Southwest Missouri State University to release campus security department reports to Traci Bauer, then editor-in-chief of the Southwest Standard. Bauer had filed a lawsuit against her school in January 1990 with the help of the Student Press Law Center when the school refused to give her access to an incident report involving an accusation of a sexual assault committed by an athlete at the school. EDITORIAL

The campus doesn't stop, so we haven't

January at Bucknell is a relaxed time, without the normal pressures and demands of a full class load. While activity at Bucknell does slow during January, it certainly doesn't stop. It is a time to explore new and different avenues, and to round out a Bucknell education.

That's why we are holding this special January edition of The Bucknellian in your hands. Like the rest of the campus, we have slowed down, but we decided that it was not right to stop entirely. We will publish two bi-weekly issues; the second is on January 31. Following the February 14 issue we will resume our normal weekly publication schedule.

And, like the rest of the campus, our format is more relaxed and well-rounded. We have endeavored to provide useful information about entertainment options; you will find several suggestions on the facing page.

We have also included more reflection and commentary on important issues, and we have tried to have a little fun.

In the past, important campus events have missed coverage because they did not occur at the right time. This week's lunch program honoring Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. is such an event. At a University which has struggled mightily, and largely unsuccessfully, to increase its diversity, minority students often feel isolated, their concerns ignored. When both the nation and the campus pause to recognize the advances and deficiencies in achieving equality, the event is an important one, newsworthy and important no matter when it occurs. That it occurs between semesters makes it no less important.

The calendar has also traditionally discriminated against Bucknell's winter sports teams, because the bulk of their season usually falls during late December and January.

This does not make their accomplishments any less important or less worthy of coverage; the campus community is certainly interested in their exploits, and we feel it is equally important for us to deliver the news to you. That is why you will find a full sports section.

We hope the the January edition will become a new tradition, as well as an important part of the January program at Bucknell.

We want to give recognition to interesting Jan Plans. If you or someone you know is doing something really exciting or interesting during January, let us know. We want to hear about it so that we can bring it to the rest of the campus.

The Bucknellian is nearing its one-hundredth anniversary. During the last century the editors who have come before have strived to improve the paper and to provide the best possible service to the campus community. With our new expanded coverage during January, we proudly carry on that tradition.

Enjoy.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Professor expresses gratitude to students

TO THE EDITOR

On Sunday, October 20th, approximately 150 people participated in Lewisburg's 1991 CROP Walk. As a member of the CROP Walk Planning Committee, I would personally like to thank the Sisters of the following sororities for their active involvement and substantial contributions: Kappa Kappa Gamma; Delta Gamma; Kappa Alpha Theta; Pi Beta Phi; and Beta Gamma. I would also like to thank Kristen Bucci and her friends from Bucknell's Dining Service for their generous gifts. In addition to creating goodwill between the community and the university, the exceptional efforts of these caring Bucknellians helped us attain our goal of raising nearly $10,000. Ninety percent of this amount was shared by partner relief agencies in more than 70 countries. The remaining ten percent was donated to the Lewisburg food bank.

Once again, I thank you for all you have done, and I look forward to seeing all of you in CROP Walk 1992!

Coordinator salutes students for their help

TO THE EDITOR

Those of us responsible for the Lewisburg Area CROP Walk were delighted with the response and participation of members of the campus community. We have long hoped to involve more Bucknellians in this community undertaking, and it was exhilarating to have a large number of sorority Sisters join in. Our warm thanks to Kappa Kappa Gamma; Delta Gamma; Kappa Alpha Theta; Pi Beta Phi, and Beta Gamma; to Kristen Bucci and her friends from Bucknell's Dining Service, and to Mark Bettner. Their efforts will help feed hungry people here in Union County and around the world.

OPINIONS

Promote racial diversity: reject the SATs

BY ROB SCHROEDER

As evidenced by the successful January 15 luncheon/tribute to Martin Luther King, Jr., dubbed "Rekindling the Dream," there are a lot of people in the Bucknell community concerned about the challenges of race on campus and around the country. Sensitivity to racial and multicultural issues is making slow headway at Bucknell, gradually sliding into the academic and social mainstreams. Management companies now think twice about what to put on their ads., for instance. But apologizing for depictions of "lazy" Hispanics is not nearly enough. What can be done to really increase racial diversity and sensitivity at Bucknell? One answer is to recruit more minorities. But how to go about doing it?

One sure-fire technique of increasing minority matriculation is eliminating so called "standardized" tests like the SATs and subject achievement tests from the Bucknell application. The logic of the standardized test assumes all Americans receive an equal opportunity to an education that prepares them for the test. But what is "general" or "standard" for high- and middle-income whites attending suburban schools is quite different than for low-income peoples of color and poor whites struggling in the country's slums.

Who receives a good education in the U.S.? Intensive college-prep English classes and after-school SAT cram sessions aren't found in the barrios; they're found at the private schools, and the public schools that either have money or some truly dedicated teachers. Upper social classes are prepared to take the SATs and the achievement tests; the lower classes aren't, by the very nature of their schools. In a country where race and class go practically hand in hand, patterns emerge quickly: the standardized tests are a part of the pattern of university discrimination against minorities.

For a school that claims to be as concerned with multiculturalism as Bucknell, I'm wondering why SATs are still part of the application. Does the admissions staff think them a necessary evil? Or are they too busy to read over an extra essay or two, the ones that might replace the standardized tests? Maybe the thought that eliminating the SAT isn't enough—that even evaluating individual achievements reflects racial bias—deters the staff.

> The standardized tests are a part of the pattern of university discrimination against minorities

Axing the SAT of course will not solve the problem of discrimination in education; nor will it automatically boost minority enrollment at Bucknell. But it will provide a chance to more seriously evaluate qualities that are salient to a successful education: individual achievements like grades and essays, and recommendations. If it's memorization skills that the admissions staff is concerned with, solicit letters from math and science teachers. If it's vocabulary and reading comprehension, look at English grades. The education that each student receives in their respective secondary classroom is not standardized, and it certainly isn't equal. Thus prospective Bucknellians may not be up to "recommended" levels of scholarship. But achievement in any environment—whether its Harlem or Greenwich, CT— sounds like the sign of a successful student to me. Once in, it's Bucknell's job to fill underprivileged students in on what they may have missed: Calculus because the school didn't have it, or that in-depth history class that was only available at the prep school.

Students need only to be intelligent to come to Bucknell; they do not need to be academically in sync, all having read the same books and solved the same problems upon enrollment. SATs and achievement tests wrongly assume equal educational standards, for all races and for all classes.

So if the administration is willing to promote racial diversity beyond honorary luncheons, the SAT and the achievement tests should be rejected as a part of the application process. The admissions staff might want to look into the GREs as well. Eliminating these tests will not solve the larger problem of race and class discrimination in higher education, but it will represent a needed, concrete start.

Silence of the Lambs complex, chilling

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Video review

The former number-one best selling movie turned box office smash, The Silence of the Lambs, is now about to become a video blockbuster as well.

Adapted from the Thomas Harris book by Ted Tally, and directed by Jonathan Demme (Swing Shift and Married to the Mob), The Silence of the Lambs has recently been released by Orion Home Pictures on video cassette and is available at local video stores.

Jodie Foster (Little Man Tate and The Accused) portrays Clarice Starling, an FBI trainee who is sent on a mission to interview the brilliant, although psychotic, psychiatrist Dr. Hannibal Lecter (Anthony Hopkins—The Elephant Man and A Chorus of Disapproval), better known in the movie as Hannibal the Cannibal. What Agent Starling does not realize, however, is that her boss, Jack Crawford (Scott Glenn—Silverado), has actually sent her to probe Lecter for information concerning Buffalo Bill (Ted Levine), a serial killer wanted for killing and skinning several women.

Throughout the course of the movie, Starling trades pieces of information about herself to Lecter in exchange for clues to Buffalo Bill's real identity.

The movie, although it contains several graphic scenes, is not your typical Friday the 13th horror flick. It is a psychological thriller that plays with your mind. The scariest part is that, unlike Jason, the psychos in this movie are so real and complex, one could actually believe that people like them do exist.

Part of the movie's effectiveness is the extensive preparation which the cast and crew underwent before beginning production. Demme took his cast down to Quantico, Virginia to the real FBI training center for an intensive study of firearms, law enforcement, and serial killers. Scott Glenn listened to an actual tape that two psychotic rapists recorded while they tortured a victim.

Demme also based the Buffalo Bill character on three real life serial killers: Ed Gein, a Wisconsin farmer who murdered and skinned from two to twelve women, Ted Bundy, from whom Buffalo Bill steals the trick of using a fake cast to gain sympathy from his victims, and Gary Michael Heidnik, a Philadelphia practical nurse who, when the FBI finally caught, was found with two women already dead and three more chained to the wall in his cellar much like the way Bill kept his victims confined in his basement.

But perhaps the most chilling character is Dr. Lecter, who seems to know your every thought before you even think it, who can disassemble a person's psyche at a single meeting, and who is so cold and ruthless you doubt he could ever be stopped. Hopkins gives a brillant performance and the scenes between Hopkins and Foster are incredible for their intensity of dialogue and of relationship. Demme shoots close-up after close-up of Foster and Hopkins and is rewarded by a realism of character and complexity of emotions that is rare in Hollywood today.

Combined with the ever-perfect cinematography of Tak Fujimoto, the movie excels in every point of production. If you saw the movie and vowed it was too scary to see again, rent it. This is a film that gets better every time you see it. For those of you who never saw it, you're missing out on the artistic highlight of the year.

Solano will be in residence on the Bucknell campus from February 10-29, giving special lectures and conducting a playwriting workshop in conjunction with a future Bucknell production.

The second one-act, "The Price", is the story of Melisa, a young woman found on the roadside by a psychiatrist who diagnoses her with amnesia. Alicia, the doctor's daughter, befriends Melisa and tries to help her redetermine her past.

A series of men arrive at the house, each bringing shocking evidence to supposedly reveal Melisa's identity.

Originally written in Spanish, the play was translated by director Nina Knoche '93 in completion of her semester abroad in Spain.

Alcohol kills F&M student

Franklin & Marshall College was rocked by the death of Johan Hans Holmkvist, a 22-year-old sophmore from Sweden, from alcohol poisoning on December 10, one day before classes ended for the semester.

At 5 a.m. Sunday morning Holmkvist was discovered face down and not breathing on a sofa in the living room of a friend's dormitory suite. He could not be revived, and was later pronounced dead at a local hospital.

Holmkvist, a popular student who excelled in tennis and squash, had a blood-alcohol level of .41, over four times the legal intoxication level in Pennsylvania. Campus physician Dr. Marianne Kelly said the student died from alcohol-related respiratory arrest.

According to police, Holmkvist had earlier attended a holiday party at his fraternity at which brothers exchanged bottles of hard alcohol, and each attendee had to finish his bottle, drinking it straight. Holmkvist apparently drank his bottle and helped others to finish theirs.

Tufts students boycott Gilette

The Animal Rights Movement at Tufts University is organizing a boycott of Gilette because the personal care products manufacturer tests its products on laboratory animals.

"Basically, they do tests on animals that aren't necessary," said Eliot Jablonka, Movement vice president. "The government says they do not have to do these tests. Other companies don't do these tests."

The group has placed bins around campus for students to dump their Gilette products. The Movement plans to mail the products back to Gilette, accompanied by petitions and a letter of protest.

G'town allows pro-choice club

After a successful three-year effort to win official recognition, a pro-choice group at Georgetown University is educating students about abortion, contraception and AIDS, arousing anger on the Jesuit campus.

The group, GU Choice, was not alone in its fight. Students trying to form pro-choice groups at other Catholic schools are facing resistance. At the College of St. Benedict in Minnesota, a student proposal to make a pro-choice group an official campus club was rejected last month. Students at Villanova University are also battling the school's administration.

The Georgetown group gained recognition due to a 1987 lawsuit by a gay and lesbian campus group that brought a change in campus policy, so that Georgetown does not endorse clubs, but grants benefits regardless of the group's stance.

"Georgetown would never support a racist or a sexist group," said Georgetown Right to Life President Margaret Reichard. "I don't understand why Georgetown should support a group that goes against everything we should be working for."

Seniors face bad job market

A Northwestern University report says the job outlook for the class of 1992 is grim. The 1992 Lindquist-Endicott Report projects that hiring for 1992 will be down 30 percent from 1989, and 47 percent of corporations surveyed will decrease the number of graduates they hire.

The report, which surveyed more than 250 mid- to large-sized businesses across the United States, was written by Victor Lindquist, associate dean and director of placement at Northwestern.

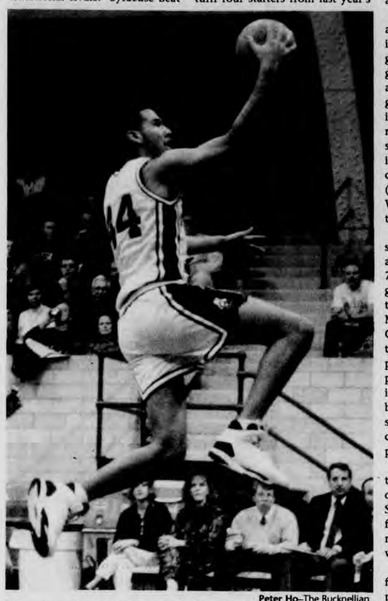
Bison sink Navy, bow to Holy Cross

Record now stands at 7–5; Patriot League foe Army to invade Davis Gym tomorrow night

BY KIRK PETERS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With the coming of the new year, the college basketball season heats up. Conference play begins in January, and the new year has already seen the meeting of many traditional rivals. Syracuse beat Georgetown, Indiana beat Ohio St., and UCLA beat Arizona. More important than any of these big conference meetings, however, was the start of the second season of Patriot League play.

The Bucknell Bison enter league action with high hopes. They return four starters from last year's fouth place squad including three all conference selections. Unfortunately, Holy Cross paid no attention to the hype and embarassed the Bison Wednesday night. They began the game with a 13-0 run and never allowed the Bison to get in the game. The Crusaders cruised to a 94-76 win.



Peter Ho–The Bucknellian

Forward Mike bright '93 floats on his way to the goal for two of his 16 points against Division Three Lycoming. Bright currently leads the Patriot League in steals per game with 3.08 and is third on the team in scoring average at 16.9 points a contest..

The game was not even as close as the 18 point final margin might indicate. The Bison picked up some garbage points at the end of the game to cut ito a lead that hovered around thirty points for most of the game. Although a loss on the road in the Patriot League is not uncommon, the margin of the defeat is some cause for concern. However, it is not time to panic. The veteran club should be able to rebound (something they didn't do much of Wednesday) and challenge for the top spot in the conference.

Despite the early loss, the Bison's Patriot League record is even at 1-1 as a result of a hard fought 78-74 at Navy last Saturday. In that game, the Bison were lead by their three top guns Bill Courtney '92, Mike Bright'93, and Patrick King'92. Courtney led all scorers with twenty-one, and Bright scored 18 and pulled down eight rebounds. King played his normal solid game scoring 15 points and grabbing ten rebounds. Additionally, Chris Simpson '94 played the best game of his career scoring fifteen points and provided strong defense.

Sandwiched in betweent the two conference games was a blowout over Division Three Lycoming. Six Bison finished scoring in double figures against the completely overmatched opponents. The Bison won the game by fourty, 106-66.

Bucknell fans will have their first chance to see Patriot League play in Davis Gym this Satruday when the Cadets from Army arrive from West Point. Army is not expected to be among the elite teams in the league, but last season's Patriot League Rookie of the Year David Ardayfio could be a big point producer. With the talented Ardayfio and a good slow-down game, the Cadets should be able to stay in games. The Cadets are also expecting to get production from some heralded freshmen. Spencer Staggs and Ross Peacock should be able to help offensively if they can blend in with the veterans on the club.

After a non-conference game against Towson State on Monday, the Bison will return to Patriot league play Wednesday against Fordham. The Rams have one of the league's strongest teams and should will be a threat to defend their title and finish first in the conference again. Though they lost Player of the Year Damon Lopez, the Rams return sharp-shooter Jean Prioleau, as well as Fred Herzog and Dave Buckner. These three should provide a solid nucleus for Fordham. Despite a heart-breaking loss at Lehigh this past Wednesday, the Rams should be considered one of the favorites to take top honors in the Patriot league.

Lehigh will also be among the elite teams in the Patriot Lleague. The combination of Bob Krizansky and Dozie Mbonu provide the Engineers (or is it the Brown and White, I always forget) with a great front court. Though they are among the league's smaller forwards, the two are very strong inside and excel in transition. The Bison will not get their first crack at Lehigh until January 29, when they come to Lewisburg.

This will undoubtedly be another exciting Patriot League season. Bucknell, Fordham, Holy Cross, and Lehigh would all seem to have a shot at the top spot in the confernce without a clear cut favorite among the four teams. Those students who are on campus in January should be treated to some exciting games as the Bison make a run for the top of the Patriot League.

Russell Peyton '93 splits the Warrior defense and draws the foul during the Bison's 106-66 drbbing of Division Three friend Lycoming.

Bucknell swim teams trounce Engineers

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's and women's swim teams have competed in two meets since returning home early in the new year from their training trip to Florida. On Wednesday, January 8. the teams traveled to the University of Delaware to face the Blue Hens, followed by a trip the following Saturday to Bethlehem, PA, where they took on Patriot League rival Lehigh.

Both teams suffered a loss at the hands of Delaware before cruising to easy victories against Lehigh.

Colin Bridgewater–The Bucknellian

Kathleen Hartnett '94, Bucknell's premier backstroker, competes here in a meet against Army last season held at Freas–Rooke Pool.

The Bucknell men fared well versus Delaware, dropping a heart-breaker by only three points, 122-119. Leading the Bison in their hard fought attempt were newcomers Rick Steenson '95 and Stew Harris '95, both of whom were double-winners. Hams captured the team's first victory of the day with a time of 9:55.69 in what turned out to be a close race in the 1000 freestyle. He also went on to take the second distance event of the day, the 500 free (4:52.78), while Steenson was victorious in the 200 individual medley (1:59.10) and the 200 butterfly (1:57.88).

Other first place finishers at Delaware included Dietrich Conze '94 in the 200 free (1:46.89) and Jay Gross '93 in the 50 free (:22.01). Both Conze and Gross were also members of the 400 free relay that closed the meet with a victory. Co-captain Don Steenson '92 and Kevin Schroth '92 were the final two members of that relay.

The Bucknell women did not match up with Delaware as evenly as did their male teammates, and they suffered a substantial loss., 142-101. Despite the final outcome of the meet, the Bison put forward some outstanding performances. Topping that list was the triple-winning effort of co-captain Margaret Grunow '93. Grunow swam to a 1:56.05 victory in the 200 free before coming back only two events later to take the 200 IM in 2:15.34. She later finished up the day with a victory in the 100 free (:54.00).

Kathleen Hartnett '94 added a first place finish in the 200 backstroke (2:13.06), while Linda Fink '95 captured the team's final victory in the 500 free in 5:18.56, a time which put her eighth on the Bucknell all-time list in that event. Lynda Walford '95 also turned turned in a notable performance in the 1000 free; her third-place time of 11:01.79 put her eighth on the all-time list for that event as well.

In the Bucknell men's 136-107 victory over Lehigh, Harris and Steenson came through for the Bison, as they both came up double-winners once again. Steenson's winning times of 1:58.48 in the 200 IM and and 1:56.88 in the 200 fly moved him onto the Bison's list of top ten performances in both events, where he is seventh and ninth respectively. Harris once again took the 1000 (10:03.97) and 500 (4:52.42) freestyles. Gross garnered double-winning status as well. He took the 100 free in :48.72 and the 50 free with an impressive in-season time of :21.60.

Bucknell's top sprinter remains undefeated in the 50 in dual meets this season.

Conze swam to another victory in the 200 free at Lehigh with a time of 1:46.66. The Bucknell divers also added first place points to their team's effort in both the 1 and 3 meter diving events. Kevin Britton '93 took top honors on the 1 meter board (229.27), and Eric Carr '93 won on the 3 meter with a seore of 213.90.

Although the Bucknell women savored thel38-105 outcome of their meet against Lehigh, some impressive individual performances highlighted the meet. On their way to victory, the Bison succeeded in breaking two Lehigh pool records and one Bucknell school record. The women opened the meet with a victory in the 400 medley relay, consisting of Hartnett, Stephanie Boles '95, Grunow, and Suzanne Dilenge '94. That squad broke into the school's top ten list with its time of 4:07.77, the fourth fastest in Bucknell history. In that event, Hartnett broke a pool record in the 100 back with her lead-off split of 1:01.61.Hartnett was also a double-winner in individual events, taking the 50 free (:25.36) and the 200 back (2:12.61).

Grunow was in full form for the Lehigh meet as she enjoyed two record-setting swims on the day. She first set a new school record in the 200 IM with her winning time of 2:12.72. Next, the teams saw the second pool record fall in the 100 free, when Grunow swam to a :53.14 victory. Fink was the team's third double-winner, capturing the 1000 (10:55.93) and 500 (5:19.46) freestyles. Finally, Kim McPherson '95 enjoyed the first individual victory of her collegiate career behind an outstanding swim in the 200 fly. Her winning time of 2:16.21 puts her sixth on Bucknell's top ten list.

Track's Hinton '95 and medley teams shine

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Tameka Hinton '95 and both distance medley relay teams impressively opened the 1992 half of the men's and women's indoor track and field schedules at the Mid-Atlantic TAC meet at Lehigh University.

Hinton qualified for the ECAC Championships with a fully-automatic time of 7.30 seconds in the 60-yard dash. Despite a slow start, her mark placed second at the meet and tied for third on Bucknell's all-time list. A highly prized newcomer, she ran the tenth best 300-yard dash in the nation last year as a senior at Boston Latin Academy.

Also, Becky Tobin '95, Beth Muehl '94, Kathy Wurster '94, and Gina Abraham '93 snatched top honors for the women in the distance medley relay with a time of 12:52.6. The freshman class managed to waltz off with another gold medal as Sharon Shilling '95 won the 600-yard event in 1:36.8.

The members of the men's distance medley team equalled the accomplishments of their female compatriots by placing first. The quartet of Dave Slupe '93, Jim Bock '92, Tom Eagleson '93, and Jeff Loomis '92 captured the lone gold for the men. However, Brad Bernardini '94 tied for sixth place in the 60-yard dash and Pete Gregory '93 placed third in the 35-pound weight with a personal best toss of 44'9". Bernardini's 6.4 second effort ranks among Bucknell's top ten all-time.

Head Coach Art Gulden's men's and women's teams will travel to frosty Hamilton, NY tomorrow for tri-meets against host Colgate and Columbia University. Colgate, whose women finished last in the league last season while its men placed third, should provide experienced competition for the visiting Bison.

The Red Raiders' field house was the cite of last winter's inaugural Patriot League Championship in which the men cruised to an easy title and the women placed second, only 18 points out behind Fordham.

Tri-Captain Tricia Plasko '92 leads a talented sprinting contingent that includes Audra Wilson '94, Dana Harbst '93, and Julie Diercks '93. Hinton and Shilling will add even more depth the group.

Dawn Ellery '94 is the defending indoor and outdoor high jump champion. Triple jumpers Jen Thomas '94 and tri-captain Ella Episcopo '92 are expected to garner points come championship time.

The men, undefeated in Gulden's 19 year tenure, should breeze to another league title this season. The dominant cross country team will move inside to join the strong sprint, hurdle, and jumping groups to reassemble nearly the same team as last winter.

will help the student press take those schools to court."

The controversy began early last year, when editors at Southwest Missouri State University, with SPLC backing, sued the University after being denied access to crime reports. The newspaper won the case, but the Education Department disagreed and threatened action against schools releasing names in crime reports; Education Department officials cited the Buckley Amendment in the 1974 Family Education Rights and Privacy Act, a measure designed to prevent the release of incorrect academic information about students.

taken away. But many colleges, with the support of the U.S. Department of Education, have used the statute to withhold campus crime reports, claiming that they are education records. During the course of the court hearing in Bauer's case, Education Department officials sent notice to over a dozen universities that they could lose federal fundinif they released police reports to the public and the media.

U.S. District Court Judge Russell G. Clark ruled that, contrary to the Department of Education's position, the Buckley Amendment did not cover campus law enforcement records and if it did, the law would be unconstitutional. Two months later, a state court in Arkansas handed down a similar decision. Southern Arkansas University newspaper editor Rosa Jones was given access to the logs and incident reports maintained by her campus police department.

But the Education Department pursued the issue and attempted to intervene in the Bauer case and appeal the decision even after Southwest Missouri State University had decided to accept the judge's ruling.

After several months of intense pressure and criticism by security advocates, student media organizations and the U.S. Congress, the Education Department made an almost complete reversal in July, announcing that it would urge the introduction of legislation to exempt law enforcement records from FERPA and would withdraw its appeal in the Missouri case.

The Department stopped short of a complete policy change, however, stating that until legislation passed through Congress and was signed by the President, it would continue to threaten schools with withdrawal of funding if they make crime reports open to the public.

Currently five bills are pending before Congress that would make clear that campus law enforcement records are not covered by the Buckley amendment. Legislation has been approved in Massachusetts and is being considered in Pennsylvania and two other states.

oms, and five assists that she notched were the results of strong efforts on her part throughout the game. McGovern then went on to score 12 points at Navy, as well as grab seven rebounds and give out three assists. The 5-10 junior is also second on the Bucknell squad in free throw percentage, averaging .824.

Kristi Dunleavy '93 has been seeing a lot of playing time as of late, as she fills in for injured starters. Dunleavy has been playing point guard and holding her own on the court, scoring seven points and dishing off three assists against Mount St. Mary's before collecting 4 points and 5 assists versus Patriot League rival Navy.

Tri-captain Kirsten Ellison '92 pushes inside against Mount St. Mary's. Ellison pulled down ten rebounds against the Mount to lead Coach Simpson's injury-plagued squad.

Prior to sustaining her knee injury, Dee was named to the All-Tournament team at the Malibu Classic at Pepperdine University, marking her second All-Tournament team since the start of the season. Dee was leading the Bison in scoring, with 15.0 points per game before going down. She was also first in the Patriot League in three point shooting, boasting a stat of 48%.

Sandler, who has been seeing limited practice and playing time, was averaging 10.3 points prior to being injured. She was one of four players to score in double-digits during the intense Mount St. Mary's game, netting 10 points. Sandler also leads the team in free throw percentage, averaging .826.

Tri-captain Kirsten Ellison '92 is also a major contributor to the efforts of the Bison squad, averaging 11.3 points per game and 8.9 rebounds. Against Mount St. Mary's, the senior pulled down a team high 10 rebounds, tying teammate McGee. Ellison currently has 890 career points and needs just 110 more to reach the 1,000 point mark. Last season, she recorded 214 points and scored 352 during her sophomore year.

In their most recent game versus Holy Cross, the Bison ran into trouble early on as the Crusaders, the 1991 Patriot League Champions, ran out to an early lead. The Crusaders outscored the Bison 39-15 in the first, behind a miserable .368 field goal percentage by the Bucknell women. The second half proved to be more profitable for the Bison, who were only outscored by five, ending the game 68-39. The highlight of the game for Bucknell was the performance of newcomer Erin McCoy '95, who played well at guard and went on to score 11.

The Bison, who lead the league in field goal percentage defense and rebounding, look to challange the Cadets from the U.S. Military Academy tomorrow at Davis Gymnasium. According to Sandler, "We're looking for a win. Army should be a good game; they play tight defense, but we think they're beatable. And Lisa [Fink] should be back, which will be a real team-booster, both in play and in morale." Tipoff is scheduled for 5:15, following the Bucknell men's JV game.

Margaret Grunow '93

For the fourth time during her collegiate career, swimming co-captain Margaret Grunow '93 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week.

The Bucknell women's swim team enjoyed outstanding performances from Grunow at the meets in which the team competed during the past two weeks. Against the University of Delaware, Grunow had a triple-win, taking the 200 freestyle, 200 individual medley, and the 100 freestyle.

The highlight of her week came at Patriot League foe Lehigh's pool. She led the 200 medley relay to a victory before going on to set a new school record in the 200 IM. Her time of 2:12.72 bettered the record of Kathy Lynch that had stood since 1984 by a full two seconds. Grunow finished the meet by breaking the Lehigh pool record in the 100 free, with a time of :53.14.

satellites are launched into space, 18-inch diameter dishes will be available for $350-$500. A fan with a dish could view almost every game every night. "All the leagues are going to be looking at direct delivery to supplement their other television agreements," says Joel Nixon, NHL Vice President of Broadcasting. "But we have a greater need and an opportunity than they do. We won't be jeopardizing a lucrative existing deal by putting games on the satellite. We won't be siphoning games away from anything that exists now. We can play and experiment."

These satellite innovations sound great — to the die-hard fan. What hockey nut wouldn't love to zip around from the Monteal Forum to Chicago Stadium to the Calgary Saddledome in one evening? The problem here is not giving current viewers more games to watch, but creating new fans. Is somebody in, say, Little Rock, Arkansas going to go out of his way to introduce himself to the sport? The answer is most likely no. What that fan needs is for a medium that he already owns to step up. This would be ESPN or a network.

Say NBC picked up a game on a weekend every month or so. It would not cost much, and they would certainly pick up the fans in non-NHL cities who have always been curious about the game, but have never been able to see it. Suddenly that guy in Little Rock can't wait until next month's game, and goes out and buys his dish. Just like that you have another die-hard.

The NHL should follow the lead of other sports. Remember the first Super Bowl was not even a sellout, and ratings were pitiful by today's standards. In the years since then, however, the networks, and now ESPN, have turned the National Football League into a booming business, and American football is expanding across the globe. It is only because of the media attention that the Super Bowl is one of the most watched events in sports.

College basketball and football are similar. It wasn't until the middle to late seventies that these sports were popular on a national basis. Not coincidently, network television began to hype these sports at about that time. As a result you can watch a college basketball game seven days a week during the winter, and look at the television revenues raked in by the networks for the bowl games. Obviously, it was free television that got the thriving major sports off the ground, and now, as pay-per-view looms in the near future, these sports have a strong enough fan base to make it work.

So listen here, NHL executives. I am a loyal hockey fan and always will be, but if you want my family in Tennessee, or others like them who can't see your teams play, to join me in my loyalty, then get games on ESPN and network television. Then those Americans who have never seen a Denis Savard Spin-O-Rama goal or a sweet glove save by Patrick Roy will be able to enjoy the speed, grace, and power of the sport with the rest of us.

A sports wish list for the New Year

As we welcome in the New Year, many of us toast to various resolutions that are bound to dissolve by mid-May at the very latest. So, instead of disappointing myself, I'll let several individuals and governing bodies from the sport's world do it for me.

Major League Baseball is financially doomed when The Boss returns legally to the Bronx, if not right now. Teams are outbidding one another at a pace that will eliminate the Cleveland's of the game (maybe that's a positive thing) for good. How about an NBA type salary cap and no more holdouts. Danny Tartabull will make more money next season than the members of Murderers' Row made their entire collective careers.

The National Football League can stop wasting the time of the Colts', Buccaneers', and Packers' opposing coaches by just merging the three "teams" together. The Irsays should handle all of the moving (I assume they want to play in Tampa). That family has experience in such matters, just ask Baltimore Colts fans. The net result would probably still be a 5-11 team.

David Stern has done a remarkable, but not quite perfect, job with the National Basketball Association. Every Game of the Week (really month) is Bulls vs. Lakers/Pistons/Celtics. I thought there were 25 teams in this league? (Nets + Mavericks + Magic + Kings = 2 teams) However, the Christmas Day game from the Clip Joint in Los Angeles, allbeit a Laker game, was a step in the right direction.

Who is David Zeigler? Bucknell's alchohol policies are more stable than this guy's suspension practices. The National Hockey League not only needs a TV contract (see the back page commentary), but a semi-consistent means for handling players with "no redeemable social qualities." By the way, Zeigler is the league's president. Don't worry — half the GM's don't know that either.

Jerry Tarkanian's promise to resign as UNLV's head basketball coach at the end of the season should be enough to satisfy the National Collegiate Athletic Association. But, a reinstatement of Thanksgiving basketball tournaments and a real system for determinig a national champion in football would be appreciated.

Finally, for Auburn football coach Pat Dye, a kicker who refuses to go on the field to kick for a tie; a corporate sponsor for the Patriot League; numerous gold medals for American athletes in Barcelona and Albertville; a speedy complete recovery to Bo Jackson so that we can see some new Nike commercials without what's his name; and continued brilliance for Nolan Ryan, Cal Ripken, Wayne Gretzky, Chris Berman, and Ron Tugnutt.

Wrestling tops East Stroudsburg, 21-16

Captains Mike Van Doren '92 and Ken Herceg '92 pin opponents to lead Bison to first victory of season; to travel to UNC tomorrow

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad used a pair of pins by Ken Herceg '92 and Bob Ferraro '94 to topple East Stroudsburg and earn its first dual match victory of the season last Friday. The Bison followed that with Saturday's defeat at the hand's of nationally ranked North Carolina State.

The East Stroudsburg match also marked another first for Bucknell and as tri-captain Mike Van Doren '92 made his return to the mat following a preseason knee injury that has kept him out of action for the first six weeks of the season. Van Doren, last season's East Coast Wrestling Association champion at 150-pounds, returned to defeat the Warriors' captain Bill Troop, 7-4, in the main event that culminated the first half of action. The win was the Bison's third of the first five matches and gave the team a 9-6 lead heading into the second half.

Also scoring victories during the first half were Ron Wellman '95, a 9-6 winner at 134-pounds, and George Swann '93, who avenged last season's decisive nine-point loss to Mike Recker with a 4-0 shutout on Friday.

In the second five matches of the evening, East Stroudsburg took three victories, but their total could not overcome the first period falls recorded by Herceg and Ferraro, and Bucknell earned a 21-16 victory, moving its season total to 1-3.

Herceg's pin, coming at 1:19 of the first period, raised his season total to nine and his career total to 39, only two behind the school record set by Tom Marchetti '91 last season. That victory also raised the tri-captain's career record to 75-31, ranking him fourth on the all-time Bucknell win list, only six behind last year's All-American Bryan Burns '91, and 15 away from second place in the school's annals. The senior began the season at his customary 177-pounds slot but has since dropped a weight class to 167-pounds and is currently ranked twelfth in the nation by the Amateur Wrestling News.

Although it earned him his first victory of the season, Head Coach Bob Ferraro was not entirely pleased with his team's performance last Friday in Davis Gymnasium. "East Stroudsburg has a traditionally strong program and they have already won the Millersville Tournament but I wasn't happy with some of the performances. We need to be more consistent individually." The coach, now in his 18th season in Lewisburg, seemed much happier with the team's effort on Saturday. "On the whole I thought the team performed well against N.C. State. There were a number of close matches that they won and that won it, but on the whole our effort was much higher."

The match was eventually won 28-13 by the Wolfpack, but the Bison appeared to be on track to upset the current 11th-ranked team in the nation when they jumped out to an early 9-0 lead. The quick start was obtained through strong performances by Russ Parker '93, a 4-2 winner, and Swann, who pinned N.C. State's Mike Norton with five seconds remaining in the bout. For his effort over the weekend, the 126-pound Swann was one of three conference wrestlers named to the weekly E.C.W.A. Honor Roll of the outstanding performances.

Peter Ho—The Bucknellian
126-pound George Swann '93 locks up with his East Stroudsburg opponent last Friday night. Swann won both of his matches over the weekend, earning himself a spot on the ECWA Honor Roll.

Tri-captain Mike Van Doren '92 throws his opponent on the way to earning his first victory of the season. Last year's conference champion at 150-pounds, Van Doren missed the first six weeks of the season with a knee injury.

The turning point came in the next bout at 134-pounds, where N.C State's Clayton Grice, then ranked seventh in the nation, topped Wellman in a match that included a pair of near falls for Wellman that could have put Bucknell ahead 15-0. Instead Grice tallied a 25-16 major decision. The visitors went on to score victories in the next four matches before Ferraro could break the string with a 13-5 major decision, pulling Bucknell to within six points. Included in the string was a 12-5 victory at 150-pounds that marked the second consecutive year that Tom Best had bettered Van Doren. The match concluded as tri-captain Ben Myers '92 was pinned by Sylvester Terkay, the second-ranked heavyweight in the nation, and Herceg dropped the main event by a 9-4 count to Chris Kwortnik, rated tenth in the nation at 177-pounds.

Coach Ferraro commented afterwards that he thought some of Bucknell's wrestlers may have been intimidated by their North Carolina State counterparts. "Some of our guys may have respected their opponents too much and others, like Mike [Van Doren] coming off his injury, were just a little tentative. They were ranked fifteenth based on a different line-up and the one we faced was even stronger so they should move up even higher."

Along with Swann, Bucknell's only other double winner this weekend was the 190-pound Ferraro whose pin and major decision raised his season total to 16-1, with five falls, and his current national standing to ninth. Ferraro's lone defeat on the season was a one point decision to George Mason's John Curtis, now rated fifth.

The Bison grapplers will embark on a road trip to compete against the highly regarded North Carolina, before returning home to begin the conference season against Drexel on January 25.

According to Coach Ferraro, the Bison have not met their strongest test of the season yet as he believes that North Carolina will be even better than the Wolfpack. "They have a tough lineup and would match up well against N.C. State. I think they will beat them in the ACC's."

North Carolina is now 2-3 and represent the fifth nationally ranked team that Bucknell will face in their pre-conference schedule. The Bison had already fallen to sixth-ranked Clarion, 19th-ranked Army, and 20th-ranked Lock Haven before topping East Stroudsburg.

NHL needs ESPN

Tomorrow afternoon on NBC the best hockey players in the world face off in the National Hockey League's All-Star Game at the Spectrum in Philadelphia. For those of you who do not live in an NHL city, or at least one where SportsChannel America is available, the last hockey game you saw was, oh, last year's All-Star Game.

There are many reasons as to why the NHL is still considered the fourth major professional sport, but the top one certainly is the lack of television exposure. In 1988 the NHL left ESPN and its 51 million homes for the seven million subscribers of SportsChannel America. Obviously, the NHL got cash goggles in accepting SCA's $51 million dollar deal over three years.

However, when that contract expired at the end of last season, the geniuses at the NHL headquarters made an eleventh hour decision to renew its contract with SCA for this year, plus an option for the 1992-93 season, at the comparatively paltry sum of $5.5 million per year.

To be fair to the league, they were really in a no-win situation. Now that ESPN has gone big-time with Major League Baseball and National Football League coverage, plus their 12 billion college basketball games during the winter, they could only offer Friday night games in January plus the last two rounds of the playoffs.

Basically ESPN cited the same reasons that NBC dumped the NHL back in 1975 - that although hockey's main audience is extremely loyal and appealing to advertisers, it is not nearly large enough to shell out the big, NFL-type bucks.

Additionally, SCA promised to have 30 million subscribers by the end of their original contract. The fact that they are still ten million homes short of that goal is part of the reason that the terms of the latest contract were so small. So the NHL is thinking that at least they are not losing big money at the expense of their lack of exposure.

However, it seems that now is exactly the time that the league needs that exposure. The three stars that everyone associates with the NHL - Wayne Gretzky, Mario Lemieux, Mark Messier - are nearing the ends of their careers due to either age or injury.

Of the younger players, right now only Brett Hull is a household name. Other youngsters such as Jeremy Roenick, Pat LaFontaine, Adam Oates, Brian Leetch, Kevin Stevens, Steve Yzerman, and Patrick Roy, and are budding superstars who only need coverage. In today's economy, marginal hockey fans may not not shell out the bucks for an expensive premium channel like SCA, but imagine if they could see games, even if only weekly, on ESPN on their basic cable system. It may mean the NHL loses a few dollars now, but down the road it will surely be profitable to have as many top names known as possible, as would be the result of the added exposure.

Another excuse NHL execs offer is that new technology will soon permit satellite dishes to become very small and inexpensive. As soon as the necessary

Injuries decimate women's hoops

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball team has been fighting for its third win of the season, but to no avail. Unfortunately, the Bison have been facing one difficulty after another ever since the ringing in of the new year. The loss of key people on the court continues to hamper the performance of the team as it seeks its next victory.

First, during their Christmas tournament at Pepperdine University, tri-captain Lisa Fink '93 suffered a broken hand while playing. Tri-captain Joy Sandler '92, who has been battling tendonitis in her knee since the tournament, was the second starter to develop problems. Last, but certainly not least, came the injury to the team's leading scorer, Kelly Dee '94, who went down with a knee injury during a game against Mount St. Mary's last week. The Bison expect Fink and Sandler to be back in form soon, perhaps in time for tonight's game against Army. Dee, however, was diagnosed as having torn the anterior cruciate ligament in her knee and will be unable to play for the remainder of the season.

Peter Ho–The Bucknellian
Kelly Dee '94 prepares to go up for a driving lay-in against a Mount St. Mary's player last week. Dee had led the Bison in scoring, with 15.0 per game before suffering an injury on this play.

Peter Ho–The Bucknellian
Anne McGovern '93 looks to pass to an open Juliet McGee '93 in last week's game versus Mount St. Mary's.

The injuries that the team has suffered have provided one important bright spot– the younger, less experienced players have gotten a chance to gain not only playing-time but also experience that will come in handy for the remainder of this season and next.

During the new year, the Bison have dropped four. The losses came against St. Bonaventure 93-71, Mount St. Mary's 78-71, Navy 70-68, and Holy Cross 68-39. Throughout the games, power forward Juliet McGee '93 has continued to play tough under the hoop. She played to three straight double-doubles, earning a spot on the Patriot League Honor Roll for the week of January 5-11. McGee had 23 points with 11 rebounds against St. Bonaventure, 12 points and 10 boards versus Mount St. Mary's, and 21 points and 11 rebounds in the heartbreaker at Navy.

She was also one of only two Bucknell players to score in double-digits against Holy Cross, netting 10 points and adding 8 rebounds. McGee is currently second on the team in shooting, with 14.7 per game, and not only leads the Bison but also the Patriot League in rebounds, averaging 10.3 boards per game.

Three-guard Anne McGovern '93 showed that she may be someone to be reckoned with in the game against Mount St. Mary's, when she established three career-high marks. The 19 points, 10 car-

Faculty, administration debate Jan Plan overhaul

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A proposal by the Jan Plan Advisory Committee, distributed to Bucknell faculty members on Feb. 6 and discussed at an open meeting at 4 p.m. on Thursday in the Langone Center Forum, may change the nature of Bucknell's January term.

The plan proposes a Winter Study Program that would require all students to complete two January projects - one during January of their first year and another during January of any of their three remaining years.

First-year Winter Study credit would be earned through participation in an on-campus Colloquy. The Colloquy would be organized around a central theme that would change each year and would consist of a wide range of cultural activities.

The first Winter Study credit would be earned through participation in an on-campus Colloquy...

Although Jan Plan Committee Chair Roger Tarpy admits that not every department would feel equally comfortable with every theme, he maintains that "the themes would be broad enough so that almost every department would be able to find interdisciplinary ties."

Approximately 40 seminars relating to the Colloquy theme would be offered, each of which would explore the topic from a specific perspective through such means as lectures, readings, discussions, movies, and artistic performances.

...the second Winter Study credit would be received upon completion of an Independent Winter Study program.

The second Winter Study credit would be received upon completion of an Independent Winter Study program, to be completed during the student's remaining years at Bucknell.

While the focus of the Colloquy would be on the role of community and supportive faculty supervision, the emphasis in this second January project would be on individual initiative, self-discipline, and personal growth.

According to Tarpy, "a student would be encouraged to propose his or her own project which would be evaluated and approved accordingly. Thursday night's forum revealed mixed faculty reception of the proposal.

Concern was voiced by several faculty members that the voluntary nature of faculty involvement in the plan would create the possibility of inadequate opportunity for students required to participate in the program.

In response to this anxiety, Vice President for Academic Affairs Larry Shinn pointed to the University's writing requirement as an example of a similar volunteer program that has been supported by the faculty. Shinn emphasized that the faculty's "firm belief that writing is important" has allowed this program to thrive, adding that the new Winter Study Proposal could thrive in the same fashion "if the faculty can be convinced that it accomplishes something important that can't be accomplished otherwise."

Jan Plan Advisory Committee member Harold Schweizer responded to concern with regard to faculty involvement by highlighting what he considers to be some of the proposal's unique strengths. Schweizer noted that the Winter Study Program would be attractive to faculty because the teaching of Colloquy seminars will be sufficiently different from teaching during the semester.

He stressed that not having to grade students in the traditional manner would foster a more equal teacher/student relationship. "For me as a teacher

State task force calls alcohol "drug of choice"

Sojka pledges to continue fight on campus after aiding in report

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

According to a state report released Monday, alcohol is "the drug of choice" on today's college campuses in Pennsylvania, and Bucknell is no exception.

Colin Bridgewater— The Bucknellian
Bucknell has already implemented most of the recomendations made by a state task force, according to President Gary Sojka, who served on the force.

The report, compiled by the President's Task Force on Substance Abuse Issues on Pennsylvania College and University Campuses, sets forth recommendations for college and university administrators, as well as state and federal legislators, in an attempt to curb alcohol abuse among college students.

Studies used by the task force found that 94 percent of college students report having used alcohol, as compared to only 51 percent for marijuana.

More than 42 percent of those who responded had consumed five or more drinks in a row within the past two weeks.

A 1985 survey of Bucknell students reflected similar findings, as about 90 percent of the respondents indicated that they used alcohol.

"We cannot solve the drug problem until we solve the alcohol problem," asserted President Gary Sojka, who served on the task force and released the report to the public during a news conference held at Bucknell.

According to Sojka, Bucknell has already implemented most of the recommendations.

"We are pleased that Bucknell is moving forward in the fight against alcohol abuse with several in place to help and educate our students," said Sojka.

Echoing long-standing claims by Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio, the report also found that "alcohol was a factor in 50 to 70 percent of cases of violence, property damage, and other misconduct," as well as 20 to 30 percent of student dropouts and academic failure.

Calling for action on the part of university officials state-wide, the task force recommended the hiring of a drug and alcohol specialist, establishment of an interdisciplinary group to implement programming, setting up alcohol and tobacco-free residence halls, and a ban on brewery advertising on campus, all of which have been accomplished at Bucknell.

Robert Thomas was hired two years ago to serve as coordinator of drug and alcohol programs, while the Alcohol Policy Review Task Force assembled last fall made the second such group on campus, the other being the University Committee on Illegal Drugs and Alcohol. Both are comprised of students, faculty, and administrators.

Currently, there is one hall housing "a dozen" students who have chosen an alcohol and tobacco-free environment, according to Associate Dean for Residential Life Edward Dadez, and Bucknell has prohibited brewery advertising on campus for years.

The report also called for inexpensive health insurance covering drug and alcohol treatment programs and a prevention program, both of which are being implemented as well.

The task force called on the state to ban the sale of grain alcohol; require a deposit on glass and aluminum containers (with unclaimed deposits going to postsecondary education for alcohol and drug programming); increase the tax on beer, which the report called "undertaxed" compared to other states; enact "Good Samaritan" legislation to allow institutions to admit they have drug or alcohol problems without litigation; not increase the number of liquor stores per capita; and dedicate a portion of the existing alcohol tax for use in alcohol and drug programming.

The task force also recommended that the federal government require all alcohol beverage advertisements to carry warnings and ban alcoholic beverage advertising on radio and television, or regulate advertising according to industry standards.

The report is the culmination of a two-year study by the 35-member task force, comprised of university officials, drug experts around the state, and various state officials and legislators.

New drop/add policy instituted

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The faculty acted to replace the present "drop/add" policy with a revised version presented by the Committee on Instruction during their monthly meeting.

The new policy allows students to drop a course up to nine weeks into the semester in any two out of their eight semesters at Bucknell.

Registrar Bruce Freed said that the failure of any faculty member to reject the proposal, which came in the form of the committee's monthly report, resulted in the school adopting the policy. "By their acquiescence, the faculty accepted the proposal, and it is my understanding that the policy is in effect today," commented Freed.

"The problem has been that students with a bona fide reason to drop needed to go through all sorts of hoops to do so."
—Bruce Freed, registrar

The former policy allowed only first semester freshmen the privilege of such a late drop.

Although some faculty voiced concern that an expanded drop policy could end up being more chaotic than the former one, John Pyper, associate dean of Arts, stated that Bucknell's policy was among the top three most restrictive in a field of 29 comparable schools. The new proposal would still place the school among the most restrictive.

The committee began revisions last summer, after representatives from the Deans' offices, Student Services, and Psychological Services voiced concern over the outdated system.

At the Monday meeting Pyper commented that there are many things in a student's life that could necessitate a late drop, but the old system allowed only for serious medical and psychological problems.

Associate Professor of Geography Ben Marsh, who chairs the Committee on Instruction, believes that the new policy allows students to "take some responsibility for themselves," while at the same time alleviating some administrative hassle. "It's not that the administration is trying to get out of work, it's just that many times these routine crises are diverting them from other work," said Marsh.

Freed agrees that the old system was inconvenient to many people. "The problem has been that students with a bona fide reason to drop needed to go through all sorts of hoops to do so, " said Freed, while the new system alleviates much of the red tape.

Agreement was almost universal that severe restrictions should be placed on the new policy.

"With absolutely free drops, you don't know who's going to be in your class tomorrow. Students would never get D's because if they saw that they were getting a low C, they would drop that course," said Marsh.

The committee arbitrarily agreed on the number of drops. "We knew that zero was the wrong number, and no one seemed to have any problems with two," said Marsh.

The new program is basically an extension of the policy that first semester freshmen have always had. Freed commented that the number of students who take advantage of this program is generally small, and it occurs during a time when little is going on in this is extremely attractive," said Schweizer. "I can treat students as I wish I could treat them always."

Another area of concern for several faculty members was the additional financial burden the requirement of an on-campus, freshman-year January program would place on students and their families.

"I have spoken to a number of students who hit the streets on December 25 and will work until February 4," noted Theresa Amott, professor of economics. "The needs of those students must be on the committee members' minds."

the Registrar's office.

"It's kind of like sick days, " said Freed. "You take them only when you need them, and you're always saving one for when you really need it."

A deficiency that the faculty found in the report was in reference to the summer program. Under the old guidelines, the summer drop policy was identical to the regular program. The faculty agreed to exclude the summer program from the new guidelines because otherwise students would be able to drop up to the last week of summer school.

Sculpture embodies Iroquois message

Brian Sipes–The Bucknellian

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Frederick Frank's sculpture "Seven Generations," a recent artistic addition to the Bucknell campus located near the Carnegie Building, was inspired by the great law of the Six Nation Iroquois Confederacy which states, "In all our deliberations we must be mindful of the impact of our decisions on the next seven generations."

The dedication of the seven-element steel icon, on Feb. 25 at 11:30 a.m., will mark the opening of the Environmental Imperative, a year-long series of lectures and presentations to be held at Bucknell. Frank will attend the ceremony.

The Environmental Imperative is the title given to what will be the first annual President's Forum; each forum will cover wide-reaching issues.

The Environmental Imperative will, over the course of the next year, present political, scientific, economic, and spiritual solutions for effectively preserving and protecting our endangered planet.

Mary Evelyn Tucker, a member of the Forum committee and professor of religion, said, "'Seven Generations' is an artistic, concrete embodiment of the Environmental Imperative.

It represents students and the continuing of relationships here at Bucknell as well as in a more global type of context."

The sculpture which Frank presented to Bucknell is the seventh and final replica of his "Seven Generations."

Frank donated the work, and Bucknell had only to provide the materials.

Other sites displaying replicas include Pennsylvania State University and the Cathedral of Saint John the Divine in New York City.

The original work is located at "Pacem in Terris" (Peace on Earth), a center for artistic and spiritual reflection in Warwick, New York.

"Pacem in Terris," originally a decaying grist mill and unofficial trash dump, was transformed by Frank into "an oasis of inwardness for reconnecting self and nature."

Visitors can enjoy artistic works, various performing artists, and the simple beauty of the earth.

Public Safety officers responded to Phi Psi fraternity on the report of a fire alarm in activation. It was discovered the alarm was activated by cigarette smoke.

Student security, while providing an escort service to a student, observed two signs lying in front of Ward House. He also observed an individual carrying two other signs. When the individual noticed he had been observed, he fled the scene. A description was given to Lewisburg Police Department of the perpetrator.

The resident of the room was interviewed at which time he stated that he had left the room at 8 p.m. on this date and returned at 1 a.m. The room had not been secured while unattended. Apparently the unknown perpetrator burned the pillow, extinguished the fire, and set the pillow upside down on the bed so it would not be noticeable.

Officers were dispatched to Vedder Hall on the report of a fire alarm in activation. A student admitted to having had lit a sparkler-type firework and had dropped it on the floor. He attempted to put it out when it set off the fire system.

Speaker blasts U.S. human rights policy

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG

Attacking the United States for ignoring the role of human rights in domestic and foreign policy, former Attorney General Ramsey Clark delivered the 1992 O.V.W. Hawkins lecture this past Tuesday, pointing to a history of neglect which continues, according to Clark, in the Bush administration.

In his lecture, entitled "Human Rights Today," Clark began critically examining U.S. policy by looking to the past and discussing Columbus's motivating greed for gold and the subsequent violence that was inflicted on native peoples. Pointing to the poverty, violence, hunger, ignorance, illness, and pain that is so prevalent in our world today, Clark wondered if Americans today still share Columbus' values. Instead of the current practice of using imprisonment to fight crime, he suggested concentrating on improving health, keeping families together, and de-glorifying violence.

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

The recent Persian Gulf conflict is another example of a blatant disregard of human rights in foreign policy,said former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark.

Human rights, according to Clark, can be viewed as an expansion of our idea of civil rights where it is most needed, in the international community.

He was sharply critical of recent U.S. foreign policy, most particularly with the war against Iraq; he questioned our aggressive offensive strategies against virtually no defense, our destruction of Iraqi infrastructure necessary for civilian life, and especially our disregard for the lives of thousands of Iraqis.

Lip-sync winners perform in NYC

"E House Posse" takes top honors

BY CYNTHIA LEVINSON AND LARNIE BOOKER

News Feature

The top two winners in last December's Students Against Multiple Sclerosis (SAMS) lip-sync contest recently travelled to New York City to compete on a new MTV game show, Lip Service.

Both "M.C. Beta", comprised of Sharon Allmen '92, Wendi Fitz '94, Ellen Gabriel '93 and Edward Jackson, Jr '95, and "E House Posse," whose members include Marc Harrison '92, Larnie Booker '93, Damon Garner '94, Damon McCain '94, and Troy White '95, were selected over other acts from Bucknell and along the eastern seaboard to compete.

After the December contest, the winners, "E House Posse", and the runners-up, "M.C. Beta" were told that they may later be notified to appear on the MTV show. Sure enough, both group were contacted. On Jan. 28, both groups then travelled to New York City to have their shows taped at Chelsea Studios. They arrived by 10 a.m. and prepared for a long day which included the taping of several shows for the new MTV series.

"E House Posse" competed first against a team from New York. The game show consisted of three segments: the Deadly Medley, the Flip Sync, and the Scratch Factor. The Deadly Medley consisted of five 15 second segments of randomly selected songs to which one member of the group had to lip-sync whether they new the song or not. The Flip-Sync allowed one member of each group to sing a previously given song over a microphone, while the video was being played. Instead of hearing the original vocalists' voice, the voice of the person who was singing into the microphone was heard. The final segment, the Scratch Factor, allowed each group to perform a lip-sync to a song of their choice. The difficulty of the lip-sync was greatly increased because DJ T-Money, of Yo MTV Raps, sped up, slowed down and scratched the record while the contestants were performing. The contestants had to adjust quickly in order to gain points from the celebrity judges which included Monie Love, a female rap artist, Linda Blair, an actress who played in the Exorcist, and Nipsy Russell, actor and comedian extraordinaire.

"E House Posse" swept all three segments of the show. After each segment, prizes were awarded to each member of the winning group. For the Deadly Medley, they each won $150 worth of Gold's Gym Equipment and for the Flip-Sync, they won $280 worth of Lone Star Telephones. Going into the Scratch Factor, "E House Posse" was ahead by three points. They performed their lip-sync to "Can't Truss It" by Public Enemy and received 59 out of 60 points to earn the victory along with a $1150 trip to Miami for each member to be taken at the dates of their choices. Needless to say, these five men found their journey to new York well worth their time.

"M.C. Beta" was unfortunately not as successful. They lost the first segment and controversially lost the second segment. Jackson was chosen to sing during the Commencement speaker is named over student objections

Seniors' advisory role in selection process questioned

BY THERESA KANE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Joseph Verner Reed, former Chief of Protocol and soon-to-be Secretariat of the United Nations, will speak at commencement exercises this spring. This announcement comes amid concerns expressed by Richard Gatteau, president of the class of 1992, that the officers of the senior class were not consulted in making the final decision.

According to Gatteau, the selection process began in the very first weeks of the fall semester.

At that time the University Commencement Committee brainstormed possible candidates, and the senior officers compiled the results of a senior survey.

Of the 115 respondents to the survey, 15 supported Bertice Berry, a touring speaker with a Ph.D. in sociology and a comedy act that promotes acceptance of diversity. She has spoken here several times.

The next most mentioned candidate was President George Bush with 11 votes.

After discussion with the committee Sojka extended an invitation to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Colin Powell.

Late in the fall semester Powell turned down the offer and the committee began searching for another candidate.

At this point Sojka suggested Reed, and Gatteau was asked to consult the Senior Council, a volunteer group that helps in planning commencement and senior activities.

However, only five of the twenty members could make the early December meeting.

Gatteau took an informal poll of seniors and told members of the committee that Berry was still the first choice. He said that "there was a sense from the seniors that Berry could offer a perspective on diversity and on issues such as respect for individuals and for community."

After a meeting with Sojka in mid-January, Gatteau felt that Sojka did not find Berry "particularly suitable as a commencement speaker."

Gatteau wondered if she was "too controversial" for commencement.

Acting Vice-President for Student Services Barbara Shailor denies claims that the administration didn't consider Berry.

"Absolutely not," said Shailor. "Gary [Sojka] considers very seriously the recommendations of the committee. There was no hidden agenda here."

Concerning Reed, Gatteau said that Sojka told him he would "check out Reed's availability."

Gatteau was not consulted beyond that point until this Monday when he was informed by John Dunlop, dean of students, that Sojka had chosen Reed.

Gatteau stated that he is upset that his input was not sought for the final decision.

Shailor stated that the commencement committee is advisory to the Office of the President and that selection of the commencement speaker is "ultimately the President's decision... It may be that [Gatteau] thought this committee had more power than it did."

She said that commencement is not a senior activity but a "university event."

On the other hand, Gatteau felt that proper procedure would warrant a full meeting of the committee and further consideration of Reed, Berry, and other candidates.

He questions the actual role of seniors in the commencement planning process, not only in the choosing of the commencement speaker, but also in budgetary concerns.

He suggests that in the future the role of senior officers be better defined.

Shailor said that she felt that the seniors were instrumental in the planning of Commencement Weekend. Saturday's events are largely a response to seniors.

Also, this year is only the fourth time that Bucknell has invited someone not associated with the University to speak at commencement. This change was a result of student input.

Concerning the budget, she stated that it is her responsibility to work with administration to allocate money for commencement. She did not feel that student input was necessary.

Sojka could not be reached for response to Gatteau's concerns, however he did comment earlier on Reed's qualifications.

"He's a career diplomat, and in such a year as 1992 where we see international events of unprecedented magnitude, such as the dissolution of the Soviet Union and the advent of the European Economic Community, Reed will be quite timely."

"Who better to have as a speaker than someone who can speak with authority as well as reminisce personally about such historic events and their ramifications?" he said.

"Absolutely not—Gary [Sojka] considers very seriously the recommendations of the committee. There was no hidden agenda here ... It may be that [Gatteau] thought his committee had more power than it did."

Teleconference adresses gay and lesbian issues

BY MICKI HAMILTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Office of Student Services, the Gay Lesbian Awareness Group, and the Race/Gender Resource Center sponsored a teleconference on Feb. 6, to address needs of gay, lesbian, and bisexual students. The national conference was broadcast in the Langone Center Forum.

The videoconference presented live, via-satellite from Washington, D.C., 5 panelists with specialized backgrounds to talk about homosexual issues.

The panelists included Rosalind E. Andreas, vice president for student affairs at the University of Vermont, Kevin Berrill, director of the campus and anti-violence projects of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, and L. Lee Knefelkamp, professor and chair of the Department of Adult and Higher Education.

Also among the panelists were Kathy Obear, President of The Human Advantage, and Jamie Washington, a doctoral intern in the Office of the Vice President for Student Affairs as the University of Maryland-Baltimore County.

The purpose of this teleconference was to provide an opportunity for all members of campus communities across the nation to examine the developmental needs of gay, lesbian, and bisexual students.

The program also explored the issues of homophobia, anti-gay prejudice and harassment and resources available to change existing attitudes.

In 1985 there were 859 such incidents, while in 1989 there were 5,353 incidents according to the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. Successful campus organizing efforts, campus policies, and model programs were also discussed.

During the program, Andreas commented that as vice president of student Affairs at the University of Vermont, it is her responsibility to protect all students. She said, "We need to support ways that make people whole."

This includes offering safe places for homosexual students to "come out" and interact. Andreas advocated this idea to the administration of universities across the nation.

As President of The Human Advantage, which is a human resource management firm specializing in employee development seminars and worksite wellness programs, Obear commented on a question posed by an audience member.

One viewer asked whether or not fraternities and sororitites on college campuses fit the stereotype of being intolerant of homosexuals.

Obear responded that she has worked with Greek leaders at homophobic workshops and that the stereotype does not fit every Greek community in America.

'91-'92 budget draws administrative concern

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

At an administrative forum Wednesday morning, Barry Maxwell, vice president of administration, expressed some concern over the adjusted 1991-92 budget.

"This year is going to be a very tough year financially," he said. Maxwell said the University's main concern centers on expenditures for the next year.

A decline in interest rates, not projected in the original budget, and an increase in the projected cost of providing fringe benefits are, at least in part, to blame for the possibility that the University might run a slight deficit in the current fiscal year.

That deficit, currently projected to be $60,000, will not be detramental to the University, according to Maxwell.

"We're not looking at a huge deficit, but we are looking at the possibility of a deficit, [which we haven't] had in many, many years."

Maxwell also said that the University is still hopeful that "by the end of the year [the deficit] will change to surplus."

Because of monetary strains, financial aid, one of the budget areas which continues to steadily grow, will be somewhat limited in the 1992-93 fiscal year.

Maxwell said that the University is presently examining a financial aid plan which would, with constant monitoring, "get us through the next four years."

"It's essentially a plan to balance the allocation of financial aid evenly over the four classes," said John Miller, committee chair and professor of management.

He emphasized that rather than attempt to find a short-term solution, as in years past, the University will, after four years, contain its financial aid expeditures within the trustee guidelines.

"We're aiming now to achieve that over four years," he said.

Although part of this plan will almost assuredly include reducing the number of students to whom the University will grant aid, Miller said that the committee has never discussed the possibility of reducing or denying aid to students who already receive it.

Last week, the faculty's Planning and Budget Committee met to discuss cutting the operating budget guidelines for the 1992-93 fiscal year from 3.5% to 3%, according to Miller.

Maxwell mentioned that a lower inflation rate than originally projected had also factored into this decision, and that it would be reviewed by the board of trustees in May.

Miller said that in general, the University will have to spend cautiously.

He said that the Planning and Budget Committee is awaiting a list of recommendations from Maxwell and Ellis Harley, associate vice president for finance.

Killed were Megan Beeler and Coleen Hipp, both 19. A third freshman, Haley Scott, suffered a serious spinal injury.

Most of the 36 passengers suffered minor injuries.

All weekend athletic events on campus were cancelled, including a women's swim meet against St. Bonaventure.

F&M investigates death of student

Franklin & Marshall President Richard Kneedler has announced the formation of a Commission of Inquiry to examine the alcohol-related death of Johan Homkvist last month.

Kneedler said the nine-member Commission, comprised mainly of students and faculty, has three main purposes: establishing a narrative of acts surrounding Homkvist's death, analyzing the events and their cause, and recommending steps to prevent a recurrence.

The Animal Rights Movement at Tufts University is organizing a boycott of Gilette becuase the personal care products manufacturer tests its products on laboratory animals.

Grad students end strike

A week-long walkout by 700 graduate students at the University of Massachusetts ended before Thanksgiving, and undergraduate classes resumed as teaching assistants returned to work.

The students gained University recognition of the Graduate Employee Organization as an official union, and agreed to indirectly collect dues from all graduate students. The students also won phased-in health beneifts, greater job security and a possible pay raise.

Students say this is a victory for the organization, which protects the rights of graduate employees.

Flip-Sync segment. While he was singing from the cue cards, the cards were accidentally mixed up, thus causing "M.C. Beta" this portion of the show.

"M.C. Beta" went into the Scratch Factor trailing by three points. They were hoping that their performance to "2 Legit to Quit" by M.C. Hammer would be enough to win.

They came up just short. They received a score of 59 points out of 60 but their opponents scored 57 points to win by just one point.

Although "MC Beta" did not win their show, both groups have a chance to compete in the semi-finals.

Following the airing of the shows in the Lip Service series, three independent judges will re-judge all the shows which were taped and they will chose the semi-finalists, this being done so that there will be an equal balance of judging for all of the shows.

If either one of these groups are chosen as semi-finalists and go on to win the competition, they will have a chance to compete for the grand prize, which is the opportunity to have a big money music video produced and aired on MTV for week.

But for now both groups are content with the fun they had and are awaiting a phone call which may give them the chance to compete again.

Students hit by laundry price increase

BY JEN REEB
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Campus regained its life last week, with the return of thousands of students dressed in fresh home-washed clothes. As students, in the next week or so, haul their wash to the basement of their residence halls, they'll find that the cost of clean clothes at Bucknell has increased by 50 percent.

Having remained constant at fifty cents for a cold water washing machine cycle or a 30 minute dryer for the last eight years, campus washers and dryers now cost 75 cents per load.

The rise in price occurred for several reasons, the main one being a corresponding rise in costs, according to Eric Schmidt, purchasing agent. The costs of maintaining the equipment and the laundry areas as well as the costs of utilities have all risen.

Unlike the soda and snack machines on campus, Bucknell does not directly receive the profits from the washers and dryers.

Laundry facilities at Bucknell are owned by Diehl Appliances of Lewisburg, an independent vendor. Although Diehl is responsible for deciding when to replace a machine, the University physical plant takes care of day-to-day maintenance.

Diehl pays the University to compensate for electricity and water usage and maintenance costs, and this money is channeled back into the operating budgets of the residence halls.

Schmidt hopes that the price increase will cause the vendor to be more inclined to maintain a higher quality of facilities, which would include replacing them earlier. This could result in an increase in usage of the on-campus machines which, while making more repairs necessary, would still offset the added cost of higher quality.

Another reason for the price increase involved Bucknell's concern for local businesses, said Schmidt. The previous price of laundry on campus was significantly lower than that found in Lewisburg. Since the University does not pay income tax on those expenses which are classified as "educational" (including laundry, since it is located in the residence halls), local businesses tend to feel that Bucknell has an unfair competitive advantage. For this reason, the price of laundry and other services provided by Bucknell is intentionally not significantly lower than those found in town.

Aside from the price increase, the absence of cold water is a common complaint about on-campus facilities offered by students.

The hot water option was dropped from campus washers about eight years ago. There were two reasons for this, besides the obvious money saved by not heating the water. Explained Schmidt: "Our experience with students, particularly male students, is that they don't understand a lot about how to do laundry.

We were having a lot of problems with damaged clothing and shrinkage problems." These problems were an added expense for the University, since it ended up paying claims in many of the cases.

Also, there was a high incidence of problems caused by dying in the machines. Basically, the person who tried to use a washer after clothes had been dyed in it wound up with a load of dyed clothes. According to Schmidt, after the decision was made to abandon hot water, the dying-related complaints stopped coming.

An effort has been made to provide signs with more detailed instructions about how to use the washing machines, which has also contributed to the large decrease in complaints. A return to hot water is not anticipated by Schmidt in the near future, especially since today's detergents are capable of getting clothes properly cleaned in cold water.

Students returning from the January break were greeted by a fifty percent increase for all residence hall laundry facilities.

Another problem voiced by students is the risk of vandalism. The experience of Penny Scarborough '95 and Amy Chamberlain '95 is indicative of the type of incident that occurs. "We thought some selected articles of our clothing had been stolen [out of the dryers] until we finally found them in the trash can, covered with dirt and lint!" commented an angered Scarborough.

The machines themselves are also often the subject of vandalism. "There is much more of a problem with people cheating the machines than with people losing money," said Schmidt. This practice, which involves using Scotch tape to retrieve coins, causes the coin mechanism to jam up. Replacement of coin mechanisms is an added cost to the vendor.

Any problems with laundry facilities should be reported to the Physical Plant, which handles all repairs.

The on-campus laundry issue is not over yet. According to Schmidt, the purchasing department, the Physical Plant and the Office of Residential Life are all involved in looking at different ideas for improvement of the laundry areas as well as other vendors' proposals.

"Hopefully, there will be some improvements happening in the future, but there will be costs associated with that," said Schmidt.

"We do not take increasing prices lightly," stresses Schmidt. "Costs have gone up, and the revenues have not gone up to meet the costs."

bunch of broken bodies in chars and call it peace?" queried Clark.

These criticisms were tied to Clark's fear that "the New World Order will be nothing more than the United States having its way around the world with the use of force, fear, and falsehood." Concerning the U.S.-Japan trade relationship, he stated that we cannot bully Japan into complying with our wishes.

Clark concluded by calling for the people of the United States to reject violence as "the ultimate human degradation," and argued that, in the future, "we must want to feed a starving child more than we want a VCR."

Clark took several questions after the lecture, one of which concerned the link between human rights and environmental issues. Noting the extent to which environmental concern was expressed by various groups during the war in the Middle East, he stated that he felt that the relative popularity of the issue now is a hopeful sign but he is unclear as to how deep the commitment truly is.

The movie JFK prompted a question about Clark's involvement in the investigation of John F. Kennedy's death. After discussing his limited role in the proceedings, he dismissed the renewed controversy over JFK's death and asked why we are now so concerned with what happened over twenty years ago.

Clark served as Attorney General of the United States under President Lyndon Johnson, during which time he drafted the Civil Rights Act of 1968. Clark is currently active in a private commission gathering information on the Persian Gulf War while practicing law in New York City.

Dance department hosts guest artists

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Teaching classes while in residency this week were the dancers of Susan Marshall and Company and Yun-Yu Wang, dance artist and Labanotation reconstructor.

Susan Marshall and Company will present a concert at 8 p.m. tonight in the Weis Center. The company of nine dancers was formed in 1983 and has performed throughout Europe, Japan, and the United States, including appearances at the Brooklyn Academy of Music's NEXT WAVE Festival and PBS's "Alive from Off Center."

A New York post-modern dancer/choreographer, Marshall has received the American Choreographer Award, a New York Dance and Performance Award for outstanding choreographic achievement, and a Guggenheim Fellowship.

Marshall was also chosen as one of three choreographers for the French/American Dance Exchange by Paris Opera's GRCOP.

William Boswell, director of cultural events, comments, "Susan Marshall is a true original, and her dances are moving and immediate in a unique way since they are so often telling about relationships and day-to-day emotional experiences. Her 'non-dancy' approach to movement makes her works particularly appealing and accessible."

The Department of Theatre and Dance is also hosting Yun-Yu Wang, from Feb. 9 through 17. Wang has taught three classes in jazz and modern dance thus far, and will be holding a fourth class in modern dance on Feb. 17 from 3:30 to 5 p.m. in Tustin Dance Studio. The class is free and open to the public, and dancers of all levels are invited.

The focus of Wang's residency is the reconstruction of Soaring, a musical visualization with five dancers and a large, billowing scarf. First choreographed in 1920 by Doris Humphrey and Ruth St. Denis, Soaring will be performed by the Bucknell Dance Company. Supplemental to that work, Wang will visit the Kelly Elementary School to teach Chinese Ribbon Dancing to third graders.

One-act hits the road

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Cap and Dagger Evening of One Acts closed on Saturday night, but for the cast of Speak Spanish For Me, the work is hardly finished. The show will travel this weekend to Baltimore where it will be performed at the East Central Theatre Conference.

The ECTC is one of five regional conferences in the United States. Gary Grant, chair and assistant professor of theatre, describes it as, "an umbrella conference for interest groups," concentrating on such themes as community theatre, theatre management, women and theatre, and black theatre.

As the interest group chair for the dramaturgy criticism group, Grant was responsible for proposing a workshop on criticism for different fields of theatre. "I decided that one of the issues that educators need to deal with is how can we use the theatre as an educational tool in the classroom."

His question resulted in the brainstorm for an educational theatre company of actors and directors which would be available to perform in classrooms to deal with certain issues in a manner less traditional than a lecture or class discussion. Speak Spanish For Me was chosen to test the feasibility of a theatre performance/forum because of the sensitivity of the issues that it addresses. Grant refers to the intense psychological and cultural levels of the play and the questions it raises.

The goal of the workshop to take place this Sunday involving Speak Spanish For Me is to create the environment of a classroom with the intention of bringing up certain issues of the play and to discuss how those issues are handled. Also slated for the conference is a discussion of how to assimilate the factors of a professor, an acting company, a class, and a clinical psychologist into a workable ensemble. If successful at the conference, Grant hopes to pursue the idea of a theatre company for schools beyond the scope of the ECTC.

Poet-in-residence to give reading Sunday

BY BRIAN KING

College is thought of as an institution of learning that allows us to explore the realms of the outside world and those within ourselves. Through a rich environment of classwork, student interaction, and an occasional party, students begin to develop a greater appreciation of the world through a higher level of knowledge. It should be stressed that some of the most worthwhile aspects of college life are the programs offered beyond the typical classroom or fraternity party. This Sunday, poet-in-residence Colette Inez will give the first of two poetry readings. She will read a mix of poetry ranging from autobiographical to "lighter" poems involving concepts such as memory and time. The reading will take place at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall and is open to the public.

Author of five poetry books, Inez has received a Pushcart Prize, the Great Lakes Colleges Association National First Book Award, two awards from the Poetry Society of America, and fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation, the National Endowment for the Arts, and the Rockefeller Foundation. She has also held residencies at Yaddo, the Millay Colony for the Arts, Blue Mountain Center, Ragdale Foundation, the Djerassi Foundation, the Virginia Center for the Creative Arts, and the Leighton Art Center in Banff, Canada.

Inez was born in Brussels, Belgium, where she was brought up in a Catholic Home for Children. She immigrated to the United States shortly before World War II and graduated from Hunter College. Inez has been an instructor with the Columbia University Writing Program since 1983.

In addition to conducting a poetry workshop later this semester, Inez will offer writing assistance in poetry for students at Lewisburg and Mifflinburg high schools. Her second reading is scheduled for Apr. 26, after which she will return to campus in early June to work with students in the Stadler Seminar for Younger Poets. The seminar will be composed of ten students chosen from across the country, to work with Inez to strengthen their poetry skills.

Inez's goal is to "coax more people into poetry." She hopes that by sharing some of her work she can stimulate more students into experiencing poetry through listening and writing.

Impermanent waves

the trees are straight

Nilda is back

Quito, Ponce, San Jose

to tease the gringo siles of blue-eyed wives
in the raining city.

And now she cha chas up the aisles or why she goes or where her hair uncurls at night damp at the edge of waves of love.

Reconsidering R.E.M.'s Losing My Religion

BY STEVE STEYERS

The day after the Grammy Award nominations were announced in January, I decided it was time to listen to R.E.M.'s Out of Time album. I had heard the song "Losing My Religion" two or three times, but I'd never paid much attention to it. At most, I thought it was a provocative song title, and the music had a certain catchiness, but it didn't interest me any further.

When I read that Out of Time had been nominated for album of the year, my first reaction was that I must have dismissed it too easily. For it to receive that sort of recognition, there must be an appeal to this particular music that goes far beyond the "alternative rock" music lover. So, trying to keep an open mind, I sat down and listened to it. And now I know what the excitement is all about. It didn't take long for me to hear the captivating magic in the songs on this album, especially in "Losing My Religion," which is nominated for song of the year.

This song isn't what it appears to be at first glance. It certainly isn't propaganda about the joys of becoming an atheist. On the surface, it may indeed be about a crisis of faith, about searching for meaning in religion and not finding it. But I think that's deceptively simple. For me, "Losing My Religion" is actually an understated, plaintive, even heart-breaking love song that tries to speak about love by comparing it to other profound and mysterious things, like the notion of losing your religion. The word "love" can't be found in the lyrics, but if you listen closely to the words, the different layers of their meanings begin to come through.

The song begins with the words, "Oh, Life," like a kind of incantation, a plea for a larger perspective. This is followed by a pause and then, "is bigger. It's bigger than you." Obviously, singer Michael Stipe is talking to someone, or talking to himself about someone, trying to convince himself of something.

The song continues: "And you are not me. The lengths that I will go to, the distance in your eyes." Stipes is trying to separate himself from the one he loves, yet at the same time he desperately wants to reach her (or him). Possibly, he wants to tell her that he has, in fact, fallen in love with her, something she may or may not already know. But he finds this incredibly difficult to do, for he says: "Oh, no, I've said too much," a line that becomes a refrain through the song. It's as if he wants to reveal his emotional state, but he's afraid of the consequences. Does the one he loves love him? How will he ever find out if he doesn't express himself? He realizes his dilemma when he says later on, "I haven't said enough."

Copyright 1990, RCA Recores

Stipes sings, "That's me in the corner. That's me in the spotlight, losing my religion, trying to keep an eye on you. And I don't know if I can do it." So what is happening is that he is having a profoundly meaningful, all-encompassing, but self-contradictory experience: he's in love, perhaps hopelessly in love, perhaps for the first time, and he doesn't know what the hell to do about it, or even what to say about it. So he compares it to another experience entirely, one that is private, intensely private, like losing your religion. But if you talk about it, it's suddenly made intensely public, like being "in the spotlight."

And here the song practically compels the listener to be imaginative, to make you wonder what "losing your religion" could mean. It would surely be a significant event in your life. It would force you to view the universe in a different way. And it would also change you deeply, probably as deeply as the great change of falling in (or out of) love.

The singer looks for signs of acceptance or denial, some kind of recognition from the one he loves: "I thought that I heard you laughing. I thought that I heard you sing. I think I thought I saw you try." But he isn't sure at all what the other person feels. He wants to know if this person has any inkling at all about his emotions, but he doesn't know how to interpret her behavior. He isn't even sure that she really did "laugh" or "sing" or, most important of all, "try" to cross the gap between their separate selves and recognizes the love he's trying to speak of.

Stipes sings: "Every whisper, of every waking hour, I'm choosing my confessions, trying to keep an eye on you, like a hurt, lost, and blind fool..." Another religious image is the confessions, but he's only choosing them; he may never make them to her. And this tentative situation, this immensely unsettling, probably irrational state he finds himself in, makes him feel like a fool. Maybe he's hoping for something that can never be; maybe he's so frightened of the possibility of being loved that he can't begin to confess his feelings.

He goes on: "Consider this, consider this the hint of the century. Consider this, the slip, that brought me to my knees, pale." And he asks, "What if all these fantasies come flailing around?" What are we supposed to consider? What is the hint of the century? He never explicitly reveals his feelings, nor does he say what the fantasies are that could come flailing around. But I think the hint is the song itself, and the fantasies are his hopes for a mutual love. His desire for a shared happiness is also the thing that "brought" him to his knees, in a kind of worship. Then, suddenly, he comes to a realization when he sings: "But that was just a dream."

However, he doesn't want to believe that either, so he repeats what he said before, about being "in the corner," "in the spotlight," "losing" his religion, saying "too much," not saying "enough," thinking that he thought he saw her laugh, sing, try. And none of this works, not even in his own mind. The song ends with him singing the line "just a dream" several times, and then finally one word, "dream." It seems he understands and accepts that the love he had hoped to confess will not be returned by the other person, no matter what he said or did about it.

On the other hand, there is no definite conclusion to this song. It begins in the middle of a story, and we can only guess at what has occurred prior to those opening lines, "Oh, Life...it's bigger than you." And the story doesn't end with the last lines of the song either. He may think of himself, in the time frame of these lyrics, as "a hurt, lost, and blind fool," but that doesn't mean he must stay that way. The song may end in the dreamof his overwhelming emotions and his denial of romantic love, but who knows what happens after that? This song is like the scene of a play, and it's not the last scene. A great dealk more is possible, and the end of the song again makes us think, imagine, wonder what has happened, what will be.

This is a song that works on many levels. Its poetic quality, intelligent lyrics, and enigmatic story are some of the reasons for its popularity. There's a haunting, mysterious yearning in it. I like the flowing melody, the use of mandolin, and the string arrangement wafting in and out of the background. Listen to it, dance to it, sing to it, think about it. I've heard the other songs nominated for song of the year; "Losing My Religion" deserves the award.

Plush highlights Columbus in music

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Australian composer and musician Vincent Plush's visit to campus Feb. 10 to 12 culminated in a lecture to students of the music department and a seminar on music during the age of Christopher Columbus. A faculty member at Colorado College, Colorado Springs, where he recently taught a course on Columbus, Plush addressed a small group of music students and faculty on Monday night.

Dividing his time between Australia and the United States, Plush plans to spend six months in Atlanta where he will write Guamaquina, the second of four pieces on Columbus. "Guamaquina means culture-giver. The Indians of the West Indies called Columbus this because they thought he was their culture-bringer." Plush is interested in the theme of Columbus and what happens when the old-world culture meets the new one. Guamaquina, which will be scored for a wind quintet, will premiere on March 29 at Colorado College.

Plush describes himself as a musician who is "involved with the quest for Australian identity in music." In creating his first work for orchestra, Pacifica, written in 1976 for the Sydney Symphony to celebrate a decade of FM radio broadcasting in Australia, Plush wanted to write a piece about all the music that had come to Australia via radio. "I imagined Pacifica as an ocean voyage leaving from Sydney and sailing east, where you encounter many island civilizations, to the west coast of Latin America."

The three central movements of Pacifica are based on Mexico, Peru, and Chile. "The piece ends as the voyage returns in reverse to encounter the same islands." Plush completed Pacifica in the key of D minor, a key which J.S. Bach always thought of as blue, like the Pacific. Pacifica is the first Australian piece that Plush knows of that looks to Latin America for its source of inspiration.

Plush's 1981 work, On Shooting Stars-Homage to Victor Jara, is a political piece regarding the destruction of democracy in Chile. Plush returns to some of the music of Jara in Pacifica.."I have put my music to the service of political and social concerns."

Vincent Plush will be completing his latest piece on Columbus in Atlanta, Georgia after leaving Bucknell.

Davis Gym needs renovation — Now

School spirit, social alternatives, better town-gown relations, success and prestige for the University... all of these are worthy goals, and Bucknell's administration is always seeking improvement in each of these areas.

The Bison men's basketball team is helping bring the University closer to each of these goals, but Coach Charlie Woolum's squad is badly hampered by Davis Gym, which is cramped, outmoded, and downright dangerous. Improvements to Davis would benefit not just a few dozen varsity players, but the entire community.

Davis Gym was a state-of-the-art facility... in 1939. Back then players made free throws underhand, the jump shot wasn't invented, and there were only 1,016 students on campus.

Last Saturday witnessed the largest crowd in Davis history, nearly 700 people over the building's official capacity. Each one of those spectators put his life in danger. Recently at City College of New York nine people were crushed to death and 20 more were injured in a stampede in a crowded gym. It could easily happen here.

Over the last few years the success of the Breakin' Bison has provided the only true unity on a campus which is otherwise divided into disinterested factions. The two trips to the NCAA tournament in 1987 and 1989 brought pride and excitement not otherwise seen in at least 25 years.

The Bison also have a large following in the area community, providing one of very few activities which students and townspeople can enjoy together. However, last Saturday's crowd, combined with the promise of even more fans tomorrow, will drive many local fans away. The University should not alienate Lewisburg residents. More importantly, it cannot afford to alienate paying customers.

The Bucknell Concert Committee has also suffered with the inadequate facilities. Bucknell can not bring big-name concerts to Davis because of a lack of seats; therefore the Committee can't sell enough tickets to pay the large expense of converting the gym into a passable concert facility. Improvements to Davis Gym would not only allow for better concerts, but would also provide another prime space for alternative social programming. The renovation of the Bison greatly expanded social opportunities; the addition of another prime venue would further increase the possibilities.

The use of the athletic facilities by both varsity and recreational activities has increased dramatically since the Fieldhouse was built in 1978. The renovation of Davis Gym should begin as soon as possible, and it should be part of a general upgrade of all facilities in the complex. The weight room in the annex is slated for removal under the renovation plan. This facility needs to be relocated and upgraded elsewhere. Also in desparate need of attention is the Freas-Rooke swimming pool. The renovation of the gym is important, but it should be the centerpiece of a building-wide improvement plan.

The Athletic Department, rightly, has a long-standing policy of free attendance for students, but that policy only works if the gym can comfortably accommodate all students who wish to attend. It did just that when it opened in 1939, but it falls far short over half a century later.

In 1992 Davis Gym is as antiquated as the two-hand set shot. It hurts the teams which play there, it slows positive growth in the University community, and it sometimes endangers the lives of Bison fans. It's time for a change.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

"Evan Maloney, there is no doubt that you are right!"

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to applaud Evan's editorial in The Bucknellian issue of December 6th. it is about time someone had the "balls" to criticize those fascists on the far left. Rarely have I ever read a better reasoned and more open-minded article. There is not a The Bucknellian that goes by where some Dyke or Kyke isn't complaining about how homophobic or anti-semitic we are.

You and I live in daily fear that the PC will form an army, hunt us down and put us on trial for all those "nasty" things our kin have done. It's like they can't stop the Klu Klux Klan so they have to become just like them. Further, it's getting to the point where I can't throw pennies at a Jew, call a black man sambo, a woman a girl, or a homo a fag.

I think you and I agree: women should be held responsible for most of the harm done to us. I mean when Thomas Jefferson stated that all men are created equal, he meant it. Really the reason why there are so many date rapes is that women just don't put out. If they did, we wouldn't have to use force to get what is naturally ours.

Just say yes—we have your best interests at heart!

With fine and subtle flair you illustrated how similar the PC are to Nazi's. I hope I'm not wrong, but I inferred from the above that you were trying to tell us that we should be sick of hearing about Nazi Germany—everyone is too uptight about Hitler. How bad could he be? After all didn't he kill fags? Furthermore, when was the last time you heard a good joke about a crematorium. And calling that professor racist. Gee I was really impressed. It is about time that someone stood up to the faculty, and told them to lighten up, to get a hobby, or a real job-or even better join the Greek system; then they would know what life is really about.

Finally, I inferred, and what a revelation it was, that people don't realize that the easiest thing in the world to do is to love someone, or even easier, to empathize or sympathize with a cause. What they don't realize is that life is about power. We (those who love Howard Roark, Libertarianism and Richard Nixon) know it, that's why we hate government (unless we control it). The left think they are so open-minded because they cry when a homeless man sleeps in a corner of a doorway, or allow Arabs equal rights under the law.

Really though, they should try hating people.

The only way mankind will ever be happy is if we all believe in the same thing, so laugh it off, lighten up and take a stand, it's America after all, home of the free and the brave. Thanks Evan, it's really impressive that a sophomore knows so much about the world and can share it so intelligently, so profoundly, and with so much savoir-faire.

Student objects to homophobia

TO THE EDITOR:

Homophobia has been an issue which has been increasingly discussed on our campus as a serious problem which needs to be addressed. In many places at Bucknell, homophobia continues to rear its ugly head, and the basketball game vs. Holy Cross was no exception. While I joined the record crowd in cheering on the Bison, I repeatedly heard groups chanting homophobic slurs which made me throughly disgusted. "F-A-G-G-O-T," "butt-plugger," and "number so-and-so is a homo" were but a few that myself and the other 2500 people in Davis Gym were lucky enough to hear.

One fact which made these inconsiderate cheers all the more disheartening was that during the basketball game, our school had a great deal of media attention. The radio broadcast and newspaper reporters all heard the Bucknell student cheering section scream their anti-gay slogans. I would consider it a sad day for this university if the media and/or the majority of the fans at the game considered those narrow-minded students representative of the whole student body.

I would imagine that students would not cheer "N-I-G-G-E-R" or "number so-and-so is a Jew." So why do some Bucknellians find it popularly acceptable to yell faggot or dyke? The answer is because we still have a very homophobic campus, and I call on the faculty, students, and administrators to take some serious action to educate this campus and dispense with ineffective talk. I'm placing a great deal of responsibility personally on President Sojka. He was at the game and should have heard the same things that everyone else did. As the president of Bucknell, I should hope that he, if anyone, should see how the homophobia demonstrated at the basketball game illustrates that the problem of discrimination against gay and bisexual students at our university is getting worse as opposed to better.

For the rest of our basketball season, as we cheer Bucknell on to their Patriot League championship, let us not degrade the image of Bucknell by partaking in homophobic cheers. Think about what you are saying, and give the image to others that we are a university open and accepting of diversity.

Students want designated smoking areas

TO THE EDITOR:

We are writing to preserve the rights of smokers and the rights of non-smokers, in general, in a designated area of the Bison.

This is not to say that we do not recognize the right of people to live in a clean-air environment. What we would like to present is our reasons for this letter. The L.C. was built for the student body in general. The Bison is the student recreational area where students gather in-between classes and during their general free time. It is the only such place provided by the University. Therefore, by barring smokers from the premises, you are infringing on their rights, causing them to be excluded from the rest of the student body. Doesn't the University promote diversity in lifestyles and population integration? We feel that dictation of a lifestyle is oppressive. The barring of smokers, (students, faculty and staff), from the Bison entails a forced change of lifestyle for this population which would exclude them from the rest. Providing a designated smoking area does not constitute an infringement upon non-smokers' rights, since the designated area would be properly ventilated.

We oppose the whole process of decision-making in regard to the smoking issue, since it was done in such a matter that it effectively excluded the student voice. The fact that the committee tried to pass a decision by January 31, when the majority of students were not on campus, does not comply with any democratic decision making process. Furthermore, decisions were published in "Notes and Notices" only, addressed to faculty and staff only! (see "Notes and Notices," Jan. 17). Excluding the students from such a decision, which affects their lives also, is tantamount to discrimination. Doesn't the University promote discussion between different groups of people? By passing a decision in such a manner, we are forced to conclude that the committee's intention was to present the students with a de facto reality of a smoking ban, in which they have no say.

Our intention is to make this issue public and follow this letter with a petition, so that the committee would become aware of the students' voice on this issue.

Student calls for non-smokers' rights

TO THE EDITOR:

Professor Patten analyzes the "anti-smoking" policy on a class level, claiming that it is a way for "the middle class to determine behavior for all classes, particularly the lower ones." However, this is just a tactic which is supposed to make non-smokers guilty about asserting their right not to smoke.

Although there are many reasons why people choose not to smoke, some do not smoke because they are allergic to smoke, suffer from asthma, or have other sinus problems. Is it wrong for these people to ask that smoking be restricted to open or well ventilated areas, so that they are able to enjoy themselves while they are eating or just hanging out? Some areas on campus, like the 24-hour area in the library, are so congested with smoke that it is very difficult for some people to breathe there. Closed-in areas, like the Bison, (which is non-smoking, except for the corner booths behind the big-screened TV), should have areas designated as non-smoking or smoking because of a lack of ventilation. One area in particular that should be made non-smoking is the classroom. How can students be expected to concentrate on the material when they can not breathe?

One area that should be made non-smoking is the classroom. How can students be expected to concentrate when they can not breathe?

In response to Professor Patten's question, "How much of a downright snob am I as I insist that the habits of others be changed?", I do not think that asking others to consider my right to not smoke makes me a snob. No one is forcing all smokers to quit, but instead we are just asking them to understand the non-smokers' position and to allow us to enjoy ourselves also.

Coffee with Alice

BY DEAN BAKER

By now most people have probably heard the accounts of Bill Clinton in the sleaze media. We know about how they have sensationalized his candidacy, about how they have used "trash for cash" journalism to turn a dull-witted, mediocre, small-state governor into the "front-runner" for the Democratic Presidential nomination, but more about sex later. As the media prepares to give Clinton the Democratic nomination, it is worth examining how a candidate can wrap up an election without a single vote being cast, and asking why anyone calls this country a democracy.

If this country had a free press, the major issue in this campaign would be that 11 years of Reagan-Bush trickle-down economics had devastated the nation's economy. By virtually every standard economic measure, the last 11 years have been an economic disaster. The economy has grown at its slowest rate since the Great Depression. Worse, even this anemic rate of growth was accomplished only with massive and unsustainable borrowing in both the public and private sectors. For the first time since the Great Depression most of the population saw their incomes stagnate or decline.

Before a single person has cast a vote, the major media in the nation have decided that Bill Clinton is the front runner and have virtually stopped reporting on any other candidate.

For the richest 1% of the population, however, things have never been better. Their real incomes nearly doubled since 1980, in the largest upward redistribution of wealth in the history of the world. This redistribution was brought about through drastic reductions in taxes on the rich (top marginal rates fell from 70% to 30%) and through policies designed to decimate the bargaining power of working people. If this country had an independent media, undoubtedly this unaffordable give-away to the rich would be the central focus of the 1992 campaign, and one of the candidates raising it as an issue would probably be the front-runner for the Democratic nomination.

This is where Bill Clinton comes in. Clinton established himself as a conservative Democrat back in the 1980's when he embraced Reagan's foreign policy, his military build-up, and much of his economics. He helped initiate a conservative caucus within the Democratic Party, the Democratic Leadership Council, whose purpose was to marginalize the role of Blacks, labor, the poor, and progressives within the Democratic Party. Apparently his performance convinced many of this nation's rich people that he could accomplish this task, since they have enthusiastically supported his campaign. This means giving him the millions of dollars needed to buy elections, and also giving him the extensive media coverage necessary to defeat opponents who are taking more popular stands on the issues.

Before a single person has cast a vote, the major media in the nation (e.g., The New York Times, National Public Radio, CBS, CNN, etc.) have decided that Bill Clinton is the front-runner and have virtually stopped reporting on any other candidate. His status as front-runner is based exclusively on his contributions from rich people and his standing in public opinion polls. It is well known that, since most people have minimal familiarity with any of the candidates, Clinton's standing in polls is attributable almost exclusively to the excessive coverage the media has given him. With the blackout on the other more progressive candidates, Clinton's edge is almost certain to increase.

The media has been absolutely shameless in their efforts to promote Clinton's candidacy. For example, Time magazine had a lengthy cover story proclaiming Clinton the front-runner. National Public Radio and CBS News have even taken to ly-

Free speech is at risk on campuses around America

BY MICHAEL WARDELL

American universities are the sites where young minds grow. Nowhere else is the unrestricted exchange of ideas so crucial as on campus. However, at many universities across the country, the exchange is curtailed—often with the knowledge, consent and complicity of the faculty and administration. The curtailment affects what the faculty can teach and affects what the students can say and write.

Bucknell has, for the most part, resisted the impulse to restrict expression. But as a warning, here are several examples of what could happen here: (from Illiberal Education, by Dinesh D'Souza)

- In 1988 the law school faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo adopted a resolution which warned students not to make "remarks directed at another's race, sex, religion, national origin, age or sexual preference," including "ethnically derogatory statements, as well as other remarks based on prejudice or group stereotype."
- The University of Connecticut interprets as "harassment" all remarks that stigmatize women or minorities. Examples of violations of the University President's Policy on Harassment, for which penalty ranges from a reprimand to expulsion, include "the use of derogatory names," "inconsiderate jokes," and even "misdirected laughter" and "conspicuous exclusion from conversation."
- The University of Michigan defined as punishable "any behavior, verbal or physical, that stigmatizes or victimizes an individual on the basis of race, ethnicity, religion, sex, sexual orientation, creed, national origin, ancestry, age, marital status, handicap, or Vietnam-era veteran status."

According to an accompanying guideline: "The university recognizes and respects the fundamental right to free speech. But the freedom of speech does not include the right to harass or injure others."

The UM code was struck down by U.S. District Court Judge Avern Cohn. The Judge noted that: "it is firmly settled in our constitution that the public expression of ideas may not be prohibited merely because the ideas are themselves offensive to some of their hearers."

Let us look at the Bucknell Student Handbook. On pages 53–54 and 60–61, the university defines sexual harassment, gives examples, and explains the penalties. What would Judge Cohn say about the following "violations:"

- Offensive sexual graffiti.
- Verbal abuse, including sexist jokes.
- Obscene gestures. (i.e., one's extended middle finger)

These "violations" are actually examples of free expression. The First Amendment guarantees all expression—whether offensive or not.

Proponents of the code on sexual harassment argue that we must make "sacrifices" for the good of the community. But who determines what "sacrifices" we must make? How would we feel if another group (the Moral Majority, for example) required us to make "sacrifices?" The Sexual Harassment code sets a dangerous precedent for further speech restrictions. Through such restrictions, Bucknell violates both the First Amendment and the spirit of the liberal education. Perhaps the authors of the Sexual Harassment code have forgotten their Orwell—or perhaps they misunderstood his irony. Let's repeal the Sexual Harassment code, and replace it with some advice your Mother taught you: "Sticks and stones may break your bones, but words can never hurt you."

The road to the White House...

How serious is the Bush administration about defense cuts?

BY JOHN SHIRE

First of a Series

With recent divisions within the Eastern block, and specifically the breakup of the Soviet Union, the Bush Administration has agreed to consider proposals of nuclear arms cuts in up to fifty percent of current strategic weapons. Although no proposals have been brought before President Bush to date, it seems clearly evident that the Administration is seriously considering a reduction in operable nuclear arms targeted toward eastern Europe.

It seems clear that the willingness of the Bush administration to consider proposed nuclear arms cut is a result of changing global events, and not merely a ploy to gain support for the 1992 election.

Those who oppose the Bush Administration's handling of defense might argue that the recent willingness to negotiate arms reduction with members of the former Soviet Union is a direct result of the upcoming Presidential election. The Administration acknowledges the fact that the majority of the citizens within the United States wish that our military could operate without the use of nuclear weapons. By cutting the arms by fifty percent, the President would be appealing to many voters on election day; therefore, this action may be viewed as a tool to bolster support for Bush's campaign, when in fact the Administration could find some excuse not to respond to the proposals after the election. Those with this view might also argue that if the Bush Administration was sincere about arms cuts, then it could have considered the proposals earlier in its term, at least long before the 1992 election.

What these people fail to see is that it is the recent divisions in Eastern Europe that have allowed our government to feel secure enough to begin measures of nuclear arms cuts. While the Soviet territories were under the control of a strong central authority with the ability to enforce its policies through an elite military force, they served as threat to the national security of other countries and specifically the United States. Now that these former Soviet territories are becoming independent countries they will have to focus on developing their economic and political structures, rather than attempting to maintain elite military forces that would pose a threat to the United States.

It seems clear that the willingness of the Bush Administration to consider proposed nuclear arms cuts is a result of changing global events, and not merely a ploy to gain support for the 1992 election. This demonstrates that the Administration is serious about defense cuts. Although it would be appealing for the Bush Administration to consider a complete cut in nuclear weapons, it is not feasible. Without nuclear arms production, the American economy would fall apart. We would see a massive increase in unemployment and a loss in confidence of many nations that depend on America's military strength for their own success (i.e. Japan). Additionally, potentially dangerous countries such as Libya, Iran, and Iraq may take the liberty of becoming nuclear powers while the rest of the world is in the process of nuclear disarmament.

As students preparing for life after education, we search for a sign of hope that the world we will be living in as adults will be more peaceful than the one lived in by our ancestors. The willingness of the Bush Administration to even consider cuts in strategic nuclear arms is not quite a solution toward world peace, but rather a signal that some state governments accross the globe are working towards achieving this common end.

ing about the sequence of primaries and caucuses in order to divert attention from the Iowa caucuses where Clinton is expected to do poorly. The Iowa caucuses will be the first chance for voters to express their views of the candidates, but because Iowa's Senator Tom Harkin is expected to win decisively, the media have chosen to ignore this contest, and sometimes even deny its existence. Instead they have been telling the public that the first votes will be cast in New Hampshire, where Clinton is likely to do well. The New York Times coverage of the Democratic campaign has amounted to a daily piece on Clinton, and an occasional piece on one of the other candidates, which usually focuses on their efforts to deal with Clinton.

In their coverage of Clinton, the media has also been polite enough not to inform people that his state, Arkansas, is dead last in environmental quality, worker safety, and near the bottom in virtually every other category of economic and social well-being. They also haven't written about his union-busting activities in Arkansas, his flip-flops on crime, and his use of the state payroll to finance right-wing lobbying efforts (Tom Nichols, the person who filed the suit pertaining to Clinton's sexual affairs, originally was employed by Clinton because of his involvement with right-wing lobbying groups). Instead, the media has spent most of their time talking about how Clinton is being received by different groups, usually giving positive reports regardless of the actual reception. (Karen De Witt of The New York Times [Jan. 26] made it sound as though Clinton had received a favorable response from the progressive Rainbow Coalition even though he was booed during his speech, and some people actually walked out.)

Why do the media want to promote Clinton so badly? The answer is very simple: money. The media people who are trying to sell you Bill Clinton are rich and will gain tremendously if he (or Bush) is elected and the Reagan-era tax breaks are left in place. For example, if national reporters such as ABC's Sam Donaldson earn $200,000 per year on average, they stand to gain approximately $10,000 per year by keeping the Reagan tax breaks in place. The owners of the media stand to make even more. Time-Warner president Steve Ross earned $78 million last year. The elimination of the Reagan-era tax breaks for the rich would have cost him more than $15 million dollars (this calculation is based on the assumption that a progressive president would raise the marginal tax rate on income over $150,000 halfway back to its pre-Reagan level. This would put it at 50% since it currently is at 30%, and previously it had been 70%), 150 times the amount that was supposedly paid for Gennifer Flowers' story. The fact that Time magazine ran a cover story on Clinton should not be surprising. Now, that's trash for real cash.

So apparently sleaze is the order of the day. The media has ensured that our elections are a joke. The only difference between the candidates that they will allow voters to hear about is in their sexual habits. Anyone offering a policy prescription involving any fundamental changes from the status quo is ridiculed and/or ignored. Thank God we have a democracy.

Cashing in on Saint Valentine's Day

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Roses are red
Violets are blue
I hope what you bought me
Is as nice as what I bought you

Were you one of the many who hoped for, expected, or threatened someone's life over a dozen red (or pink or white or yellow or...) roses last year? Did you sit anxiously in the Bison watching every other female prance through the entrance carrying her bouquet like a newly crowned Miss America, cursing your boyfriend that a notice had not been stuck in your mailbox, directing you to the Langone Center 2nd floor delivery area?

Perhaps you were on the other end of the deal, shelling out premium prices for that armful of thorns. You figured that the price of roses, a heart-shaped box of cheap chocolates, and ten Hallmark cards was better than the pain of pouty lips, cheap remarks, or sad-eyed questions of doubt about your true feelings.

For those who were among the 300 or more who took the elevator up to the switchboard area last year to collect their 30-or-so dollars worth of roses, was it worth it, or did you just feel like another one of the crowd who benefacted from the holiday that Hallmark seemed to have created?

As commercial as Valentine's Day has become in recent years, and as often as people (especially males) can be heard complaining about the expense of the day, the "giving" trend has yet to experience a serious backlash. Stein's Flowers and Gifts, Martin's Flower Shop and Greenhouse, and Dogwood Hill Florists, all located on Market Street in Lewisburg, report that sales of flowers for today are as strong as or better than last year.

This Valentine's Day, one dozen long-stemmed red roses costs $45 at Stein's Flowers and Gifts. The most popular color is the traditional red, followed by white. At Dogwood Hill, long-stemmed red roses are $5 each. More popular this year than before, though, says Angela Motler of Dogwood Hill, "are mixed bunches of Spring flowers." They call it a European look. According to her, "They look light and airy and last longer than roses." They also sell for about half as much as a dozen of the thorny variety. So while many customers are opting for a longer-lasting, less expensive gift, they are still turning to flowers.

The heart-shaped box of chocolates can also be a real setback to the wallet. One satin and lace encased box was sighted at a store along Route 15 for over $30. It wasn't Godiva chocolate either.

Lingerie at Wal-Mart cost $10 to $12 for a racy little set. Ordered from the infamous Victoria's Secrets, it would cost a hefty $50 plus to make your fantasies come true.

So whether you've invested in the $3.99 bottle of Andre champagne, or the $71.29 bottle of Dom Perignon, or planned to take either of them with you on a ski weekend in the Poconos, you've at least made the stores around campus quite pleased, as they've counted upon your emotions and monetary support since long before Christmas. The competition between Ames, Rea and Derrick, and Wal-Mart is fierce. Colin Bridgewater, photographer of the commercial Valentine shots, had to receive permission from each of the chain's manager before taking pictures and was then escorted throughout the store. He laughs as he says, "Each store was afraid that I was a spy from one of the other stores."

Let's just hope that your gift makes your "sweetheart" as happy as it did Ames or Stein's or Mr. Millionaire Wal-Mart when you purchased it from them.

Colin Bridgewater—The Bucknellian

How much will you have to spend on your "honey" this year? Try $7.99 for a small-sized stuffed bear at Ames, $10–$12 for Wal-Mart lingerie, $25 for a dozen hybrid roses from Martin's Flower Shop and Greenhouses, $3 for a metallic helium balloon, and $10 to send all of your family members cards.

Best One Ever

BY THE FEATURES STAFF

With all the hype that the holiday receives, we were wondering what really makes the day special and memorable.

Here are some students' favorite memories:

—"Last year, after my boyfriend and I had broken up, I came home from Rush at 2:30 a.m., and found a really nice card, stuffed animal, and rose on my bed from him." —Junior

—"I went to my mailbox and found a big heart in it from a secret admirer. At class, a guy handed me balloons, saying that they were from someone special. When I returned home there was a message on the machine telling me to go to the Bull Run Inn at 7 p.m. My secret admirer would reveal himself there.

He did and was a guy that I had been eyeing all year. When he found out my feelings he had decided to return them." —Senior

—"I came back from the doctor and was really upset. When I walked back to my car, I found three roses and a bottle of champagne in the backseat. Of the three roses, one was yellow for friendship, one was red for love, and the third was white for forever. I was amazed." —Senior

—"Last year I did not have a boyfriend on Valentine's Day for the first time in my adolescent life. It really depressed me. That night I went out with my friends to Front Street Station for dinner and had the best Valentine's Day yet. It felt great just to be able to enjoy the evening without the pressure of impressing someone." —Sophomore Who invented Valentine's Day... Cupid or Hallmark?

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the greedy, seductive thoughts of bon bons, roses, and risqué cards and gifts run rampant across campus, the rumored origins of Valentine's Day are heartily discussed.

Though most non-believers think Valentine's Day was a crafty scheme devised by the greeting card industry, the scantily clad little cherub that surfaces every year is thought to be the crafty little product of a scandal long, long ago.

One legend has it that St. Valentine, a priest in Rome circa 300 A.D., defied an order from Roman Emperor Claudius and secretly continued to marry couples. The emperor, believing single men made better soldiers, executed St. Valentine on February 14.

Another legend portrays St. Valentine as the nonconforming worshipper. St. Valentine faced execution for refusing to worship pagan gods. While imprisoned for his crime, he befriended the jailer's blind daughter and restored her sight through prayer. On February 14, the day of his execution, he sent her a farewell note signed, "From Your Valentine."

Valentines were first printed in Europe around 1800. Typically, they were trimmed in satin or lace with a space in the center for people to write their own romantic prose.

Regardless of the holiday's origin, Valentine's Day has become a permanent part of our culture. Every year, a wide assortment of cards and gifts are given and received. The traditional gifts—bouquets of roses and boxes of candy—still seem to be the most popular.

Expressions of love on February 14 are more evident today than ever before, as over one billion valentines will be exchanged in the U.S. alone this Valentine's Day.

Marc Haimes' The Sharpest Image

Kum Two My Kuntry

By the Vice President of the United States

Romans, countrymen, and lovers, hear me for my cause and GUESS WHAT? Uncle Georgie said that I could write this really swell article ALL BY MYSELF! Hooray! You see, all of us folks here at the good ol' nation's capital are doing our best to stimulate the hell out of this pesky economy by telling those foreigners to come here (America) on their vacations. Uncle George said it would be nifty if I wrote an article telling about the virtual plethora of great "opportunities" there are in America, and after Marilyn helped me look up virtual plethora in the dictionary, I said I would do it. And let me just start out by saying: if you are in a far, far off land, and you don't take the time to get up out of your tee-pee and visit this great country of ours, than you must be a complete patootie head (pardon my French).

Actually, I don't really know French! (Marilyn says I shouldn't even try to kiss that way because it reminds her of Millie and makes her nauseous). But, if I were French I'd toss aside my bread and my fries and my dressing and Parlez-Vous (sort of like Doci-Do) on over to the good ol' U. S. of A for a vacation that is really, really pleasant and swell. A virtual plethora of swellness.

America is so neat, and if you work very, very hard and plug away at your job and don't take any wooden pickles, then you could get to be Vice President (like me) and then there is a whole bunch of really, really keen stuff you can do.

For one thing, there are these neat-O, gigantic dinner parties with hundreds of ambassadors and ex-Presidents and Supreme Court justices and Grand Wizards all sitting at one really, really long table where I play funny, funny pranks. Tee hee! During one of my very first banquets, I reached into Millie's bowl and scooped up a handful of kibbles (not the hard kind, but the squishy soft ones that taste like clam chowder and bacon), and then I used my soup spoon like a catapult to fling them around the room when no one was looking! It was very, very funny. A virtual plethora of humor. I had gotten off some nifty ricochet shots when this one deformed kibble went wild and landed in Miss Kirkpatrick's beef stew with a loud plopping sound. Uh, oh! I knew I had to get rid of the incriminating kibbles still in my hand, so I dove from my chair under the table with a virtual plethora of speed. My brilliant plan was to slip the round chunks under the rug and get back to my seat before anyone noticed my disappearance and raised the alarm. Not an easy task. Not an easy task at all. Looked like a job for Super Dan.

So there I was under the dining area searching for a good place to ditch the Purina and trying not to bump my sensitive head. I had silently crawled down to the very end of the table, where the Reagans were, when I heard this squeaky gurgling sound from the chair next to Nancy's and smelled this yucky smell. Now, I grew up in Indiana and if there's one thing I know, it's a poopy smell! I sat there puzzled for a moment, breathing deeply in an effort to pin-point the source of the odor. And then, I overheard the following revealing conversation:

Great Uncle Ronnie: (Leaning over to whisper to Nancy) Oh dear, I think I snarfed down too many of those pumpkin fritters. Nancy, honey, I seem to be blowin' off some steam, heh, heh.

Great Aunt Nancy: (Hissing back) Ronnie, you idiot. I told you to watch yourself after that Kugel incident in Jerusalem. Oh well, if anyone says anything, blame it on the Democrats.

Boy oh boy! That Nancy sure is smart! She thinks up neat fibs to tell really quickly! But I don't think she likes me very much because of the time I walked in on her and that Italian singer guy in The Lincoln Bedroom and they were BOTH NAKED. The singer-guy was screaming something about doing it "my way" and they never noticed me until I quipped, "Gee willikers, I didn't know someone could have wrinkles down there." Tee hee. You see, I always feel a well-timed joke can help ease an embarrassing situation. But they still got awful red in the face and then told me to leave, like they were really sore at me or something.

Anyway, Nancy shouldn't have gotten so upset. Golly, it's not like I've never seen a naked woman before. I mean, Marilyn was naked in those Polaroids the Iraqui ambassador showed me. He even traded them to me for those neat airplane diagrams that I was supposed to put in the paper shredder.

I like the paper shredder a whole bunch because it makes a funny whirring noise that sounds like the electric banana in Marilyn's closet, and it slices and dices big pieces of paper into little tiny, tiny slivers. Georgie and I used the paper shredder a lot before Mr. Helmes' visit. George ruined all his best magazines... even the ones with the pictures of the poodles and the nine year old Swedish albino school boys jello-wrestling. Go figure. And then, after Mr. Helmes left, George gave me seventeen rolls of scotch tape and told me to get to work. Gee whiz! But I shouldn't complain. It's not that I love George less, but that I love America more!

Oh, but back to the story... there I was under the banquet table surrounded by a disgusting odor that made me feel like coughing up a virtual plethora of vomit. I quickly pushed the kibbles into Nancy's shoes and crawled back to my seat. But just when I was in front of my chair, I discovered that Mr. Sununu had reached over to hold Marilyn's hand making it impossible for me to slip back into place undetected. And then, as he rhythmically moved his other hand up and down across her thigh, something terrible happened! He accidently poked his elbow into my nose and I couldn't help but let out a yip of pain. Oh no! I had to think quickly or I would be in big trouble! Fortunately, my mind works fast, and I came up with a plan.

"Woof, woof," I said. "I am a puppy. That is why I am under the table."

I think Mr. Sununu bought it, because he scratched my muzzle and said, "Good girl, good girl. Now, why don't you scamper on upstairs and quit making a jerk of yourself."

"Woof, woof," I agreed, licking his hand affectionately. Then I slipped past Marilyn and Fatso and made my way on all fours towards the door remembering to pant and scratch so as not to blow my cover. What a fun night!

And the good times had only just begun! Sometimes, me and Georgie take important yet pleasurable trips across town to the Petagun. I like going to the Petagun because while Uncle Georgie talks to fat people in uniforms, I play this neat game where I push these flashing buttons as many times as I can. Each time I push them, a big sign that says, "Def Con 5" counts backwards. First it goes to "Def Con 4," and then to Def Con... uh... well anyway it counts backwards. But just before I can get in that final push to make it say Def Con 1, George finds out and gets really peeved and doesn't let me into the Oval Office for the next two weeks. Which means I can't make any of those wacky prank phone calls on that little red telephone. Tee hee! Oh, but I can tell you how to do my favorite one, though. Here's how...

1. Wait until Georgie and the other important people that you are not allowed to speak to have left the Oval Office to "go get some hose" (I guess they want to water the lawn or something).

2. Casually pick up the receiver. Now here's a transcript of what your prank call should sound like...

Phone: Ring, Ring, Ring, Ring...

Man with funny accent: Dah?

You: Yes, hello there, sir, is your refrigerator running?

Man with funny accent: Ah, hello, Mr. North! Did you get me dee Levis jeans, dee Beatles records, and dee White Cloud toilet tissue? Dah?

You: No, you borsch-guzzling, country-splicing idiot. I asked if your refrigerator is running.

Man with funny accent: Dah?

You: To get to the other side! Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha...!

Phone: Click.

3. Now, quickly put the phone down and get the heck out of the room before George and the other guys come back with their nieces.

And these are just a few of the wonderful activities you can engage yourself in, if you get off your lazy foreign asses and come to the land of the free and the home of the brave. As a great man once said during a Japanese trade negotiation, "It's not what our country can do for you but what you can bleeeccccchhhhhhhhh." Thank you for reading. See ya at Disneyworld!

Feeling restless—Need a new bar?

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Speaking of love...what about the city of brotherly love? Philadelphia is only a few hours away from Lewisburg, and well worth the drive. Of course there are several cities a few hours drive from Lewisburg, but here are a few reasons why you should roadtrip to Philadelphia in particular.

For all those who love to go "clubbing" in NYC, but don't feel like standing against a wall waiting to be "selected," or paying a $20 cover charge, Club Xero is for you. Club Xero, located at 4th and South, hosts an interesting blend of the yuppie and progressive crowd, dancing to a curious mix of progressive music from a live DJ. Although the music will most likely be foreign to most bubble victims, the spirit of those participating on the floor will surely move you. Club Xero is also foreign in the beer spectrum, with Killian's Red and Fosters on tap. They also have the largest draft beers west of the UK, as you'll find a 23 oz. beer—their "regular" size—for $2.25. So for the nominal cover charge of $4, Club Xero is hard to beat.

If you're in the mood for a live rock band, and you don't plan on leaving the South Street area, ("where the hippies meet," they say) J.C. Dobbs is a must-see. Located at 3rd and South, right on South Street, J.C. Dobbs offers a live band every night of the week. So if you don't mind exposing yourself to groups with names like "Corrosion of Conformity," this place is for you. J.C. Dobbs has two floors with the band playing on the lower one and a bar on each floor.

For those in the South Street area who don't want to feel as if they've left the Bucknell fraternity party scene, Who's on Third?, located at, of course, 3rd and Bainbridge, aptly does the job. This place is so crowded and noisy that you'll realize that it's best to just shut up and drink. There is a $3 cover, and if you go early enough in the night, there just may be some draft beer left. A live DJ plays an excellent mix of popular and alternative music which will no doubt make you run to the dance floor. This place is recommended, but definitely not for those who have claustrophobic tendencies.

A little more low-key alternative is Dickens Inn at 2nd and Pine Street, located a half-block away from South Street in Newmarket Square. This restaurant and pub certainly lives up to its name in establishing a 19th century Dickensian atmosphere. Pints are served, of course, with a large variety of lagers and ales to choose from; and the crowd is primarily made up of college graduates.

The west side of Philadelphia is the home to both University of Pennsylvania and Drexel University, which makes it a prime place to find exciting young bar crowds. Smokey Joe's, located at 40th and Walnut, is where many Penn students converge on the weekends. Although it is located in a less-than-desirable area of the city, Smokey Joe's is to Penn what the Bull Run is to Bucknell. This place also lives up to its name, for both floors are so dark and thick with smoke that you might as well go incognito. Nevertheless, it's a cheap price to pay ($1 cover, $1 drafts) for an extremely cozy atmosphere. Two other great pubs to try in the University area are Roosevelt's, at 23rd and Walnut, and The Irish Pub (one of many in town) which is huge, festive, and hosts a great crowd of students. There is a $2 cover, and beer is cheap and easily accessible.

There is something for everyone in Philadelphia, as in most major cities, and The Kasbah makes the list complete. The Kasbah, located at 15th and Locust, is an upscale restaurant, jazz club, and lounge with a quite sophisticated and intellectual clientele. The wonderful thing about this place is that you can walk up to the second floor lounge on Wednesday through Sunday nights and find a live jazz band for no cover charge. The only possible downfall about The Kasbah is that there is no draft beer. But what else would you expect in a classy joint like this?

Regardless of where you go, Philadelphia is definitely a great place to visit, since it is not so large that you find yourself lost, and it is not so expensive that you go broke. So this Valentine's Day, why not try the city of love...brotherly love, that is.

This stock game plays with real money

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell Investment Club has initiated an Investment Partnership that will allow students to pool capital in order to purchase stocks.

While such a project may appear to be geared primarily toward business, accounting, and economics majors, turnout at Tuesday night's initial meeting showed that interest in the partnership is distributed among a wide range of students. An informal introduction of all those present at the meeting revealed biology, English, Russian, history, and engineering majors, along with those of more traditional business-minded disciplines. In addition, all four classes were represented.

According to Steve Godfrey '93, president of the Investment Club, investment partnerships are often used by first-time investors as a means of purchasing stock despite limited funds and limited knowledge. Says Godfrey, "Partnerships provide the opportunity for members to gain insights from more experienced members of the group."

To aid in the education of project members, the partnership will sponsor workshops by several members of the Bucknell faculty. Such instructional sessions will allow investment novices to become more informed, making it possible for them to contribute to the group in a meaningful fashion.

Already planned is a lecture by Mark Bettner, assistant professor of management, on basic financial statement analysis. The lecture will be directed toward individuals with no prior investment experience, but will allow for more detailed questions from those more familiar with investment strategies.

According to George Kester, professor of finance, "Although the partnership will provide an opportunity to make money, the main objective of the partnership is education. The investing itself creates an interest. It motivates students to keep up with the stock market, the economy, and specific companies."

The group, which has met twice already, will meet again at 9:30 p.m. on Tuesday in the Gallery Theatre of the Langone Center to discuss specifics of the partnership agreement, including voting procedures, group education, and capital contribution. Although a preliminary version of the partnership has been written, anyone present at Tuesday night's meeting will be encouraged to make alterations to the agreement with the consensus of the group.

"We want to encourage people who have not already attended an information session to attend Tuesday's meeting," says Godfrey. "The success of the partnership is dependent on participation. We are looking for as much input as we can get."

The partnership will be officially formed on Tuesday, Feb. 25, also at 9:30 p.m. in the Gallery Theatre. At this time the agreement will be signed, partners will contribute capital, and leaders will be elected.

Women's hoops upsets Cross, falls to Army

Joy Sandler '92 earns Athlete of the Week honors; Bison will host Patriot League rival Fordham tomorrow at 5:15 in Davis Gym

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball team, still suffering from inconsistent play, won its fourth game of the season last week by upsetting the number two team in the league, Holy Cross. That surprising win was followed by a 69-50 loss to Army, bringing the team's record to 4-17, 2-8 in league play.

Last Saturday, the Bison came onto the court after an exciting men's victory over Holy Cross, and intensity lingered in the air of Davis Gymnasium. Bucknell was to face a much taller team which had blown the Bison out in their previous meeting in Worcester, MA. Under such pressures, the Bucknell women got off to a rocky start. Holy Cross capitalized on three Bucknell turnovers in the first three and a half minutes of play to take an early eight-point lead.

After that, Bucknell's offense kicked in. The Bison cut the Crusader lead to four, causing Holy Cross to take its first time-out. The lead stayed at four throughout the next four minutes as the two teams traded baskets before Bucknell went on a 7-0 scoring run. That run was sparked by tri-captain Kirsten Ellison '92, who sunk a turn-around lay-in and drew the foul at the 8:39 mark. Ellison converted on the free-throw, making it a three-point play.

Tri-captain Lisa Fink '93 goes up for two during Bucknell's first Patriot League victory of the season against Lehigh two weekends ago. The soft cast on Fink's right hand has since been removed.

After tri-captain Joy Sandler '92 added two more from the foul line, and Juliet McGee '93 made a lay-up off of the offensive boards, the Bison enjoyed their first lead of the game with six minutes left in the half.

However, following a 17-foot jump shot by Carolyn Mangan '95 Bucknell saw its defense slip. The Crusaders then went on their own 9-0 run, led by the efforts of 5'9" guard Meghan Sullivan, who scored seven in that minute and a half period of play.

Bucknell head coach Juliene Simpson countered by calling a time out to regroup her team. The decision paid off. Ten seconds after the teams took to the court, Anne McGovern '93 dished off a perfect pass to Ellison, who made an easy lay-up. Next, Bucknell took advantage of three over-the-limit Holy Cross fouls and converted on six attempts from the charity stripe, tying the game at 30.

Holy Cross, one of the league-leaders in shooting from three-point land, answered with a Dawn Hoegh basket from that territory. In response to his reaction to a call by the referees ten seconds later, the Holy Cross coach was charged with a technical foul, giving Bucknell two free-throws and possession of the ball with 1:09 left to play.

Although McGee had two successful attempts at the line, the Bison could not capitalize on their subsequent possession, and the half ended with Holy Cross barely holding onto a 33-32 lead.

The Holy Cross women controlled the ball at the start of the second half of play and scored four quick points then McGee hit a turn-around jumper, assisted by Sandler. The Bison, facing a seven-point deficit at 16:26, cut the Holy Cross lead to two behind a Sandler three-pointer and an Ellison lay-in off of the glass.

Soon after, McGee got called for her fourth personal foul and came out of the game. The Bison were faced with the prospect of playing for 14 minutes without the power-foward's aggressive inside play, and they rose to the occasion.

At 12:31, Ellison dished off a pass to Monica Nawarskas '94, who sunk a turn-around lay-in to give Bucknell its first lead of the second period, 48-47. Following another big basket by Nawarskas, the Bison began to falter, and Holy Cross outscored them 7-0 in the next three minutes.

Sandler responded by hitting a jumper just inside the three-point arc. Her team was then down by six when she nailed a three-pointer, followed by a turn-around jumper in the paint by McGee, who had just reentered the game. Those two baskets rendered the score 58-57 in favor of the visiting team, which forced Holy Cross to take a time-out.

Sullivan had a successful shot for the Crusaders after the time-out, but Sandler answered that shot with a driving lay-in, where she drew a foul. At the line, the guard made it a three-point play.

Tri-captain Lisa Fink '93 then began her trips to the free-throw line, starting with two conversions, which gave Bucknell a two point lead. Things swung back in the other direction when Holy Cross's Norinne Powers made an easy basket in the lane, accompanied by a Bucknell foul. The Bison were down by one at 2:38 after Powers made her lone free-throw. Once again, Sandler made her presence known and sunk another three-point shot 20 seconds later.

The Bison were up by one with 1:48 left to play when Ellison was fouled and made two important, successful shots from the charity stripe. After a Holy Cross turnover, the ball was again passed to Sandler, who netted a jumper from in the paint, bringing the score to 67-64.

The two teams then traded fouls, keeping the Bison lead at three. In the final 30 seconds of play, Fink was fouled twice and converted on three attempts, sealing the 72-66 Bucknell victory.

Against Holy Cross, Sandler scored a career-high 28 points, 21 of which came in the second half. She netted 11 of Bucknell's final 22 points of the game, and tallied a career-high five three-pointers; the senior also scored a team-high 20 points against Navy in a narrow loss earlier in the week, all of which earned her Patriot League Player of the Week honors. In more recent action, Sandler also led the Bison, with 14, in their loss at Army.

Ellison's play was another key factor in the Holy Cross victory. She pulled down a team-high 11 rebounds, to keep Bucknell within one of its taller opponent. Ellison also had 11 points and a game-high four assists. Those points, along with the ten that the senior tallied at Army, leave her 18 points shy of the 1,000 point-milestone.

McGee, the team's leading scorer averaging 15.8 per game, contributed 14 points and seven rebounds against the Crusaders, despite being hammered inside most of the game. The junior also notched a career-high 16 rebounds against Navy earlier in the week.

According to Sandler, "The team was really excited about beating Holy Cross. The win should give us more confidence going into the tournament because now we know we can do it." About tomorrow's league game against Fordham, the tri-captain says, "I think we need another big win before the tournament, though, and we'd like to knock off Fordham. We played tough against them in our last meeting, coming back from a 17-point deficit to within two at one point, so we are capable of playing at their level." Bucknell fans can catch women's basketball action Saturday, at 5:15 in Davis Gym.

Juliet McGee '93 controls the rebound and goes back up for a bucket during a game played earlier this season. McGee, a strong candidate for All-League honors, currently leads the Bison in scoring and re-bounding.

The Collegiate Perspective (and other fairy tales)

Peter Lalos

This week's column is dedicated to the subject of sports. Why? Because I wanted to be in the same section as the story about beating Holy Cross in basketball. Besides, I mean, sports, so... It just had to be done.

•It seems to me that a high-five during the course of a basketball game is in order for slam dunks, reverse lay-ups, and when you windmill an opposing player's shot into the third deck. This having been said, why is it that you sometimes see guys slapping hands when one of them has just fouled another player? This type of positive enforcement just may encourage them to do it again! Stop that. Don't do that.

•Why do television football broadcasts repeatedly show ground-view camera angles from behind the returner for kickoffs? That's got to be the worst shot ever conceived of in the history of competitive games. And another thing, why do all the fumbles and monstrous hits occur when these views are being given to the fans at home? Stop that, too.

•A USA Today'/ "Jeff Sagarin Division I basketball ratings" update: With a stranglehold on the number 300 ranking in the nation, the Prairie View hardwood juggernaut (0-23) is still fending off a determined Bethune-Cookman squad (1-21) for last place honors. March madness is just an airball away for one of these two teams.

•Isn't it sad when you tune in to a basketball game on T.V., and the score that they show is 2-0? Why bother showing it? Maybe it would be more appropriate in these situations to just put up a graphic that reads, "Game just underway; as yet, score is deemed to be inconsequential in the general scheme of things."

•The luge is an officially-sanctioned event in the Olympics. The luge. That would, in all likelihood, explain why CBS is already writing off their coverage of the games as a financial loss.

•Can we really, with our consciences still fully intact, refer to curling as a sport?

•Not many people truly appreciate the unique variety of playing surfaces offered in professional tennis play and the resulting sense of versatility inherent in this sport. For example, try to imagine ice hockey played on clay. Aha! Was that appreciating that you were just doing?

•But I guess the question on everyone's lips is, are the Knicks for real? Well, let's go about this by means of the Socratic method of problem solving. It is a known fact that we can hear them, see them, and feel them. We interact with this team as if they were living, sentient organisms. So, yeah, I guess they're real.

•Is it just me, or is Michael Jackson looking more like Diana Ross every day? I mean, I know that this has little to do with sports, but you certainly need a scorecard to keep up with the number of times that this guy has gone under the knife. I realize that it doesn't matter if you're black or white; however, doesn't it matter if you chuck half of your face into the dumpster, along with much of your ethnicity and melanin to boot? Cathy Rigby and Mary Lou Retton together didn't perform more tucks.

•Why do inebriated fans sitting beside you at sporting events always feel that they have to introduce themselves to you after having embarrassed themselves? "Hi, I'm Ted, and I'll be your drunken annoyance for this evening. Our specialties tonight are stale breath and blowing chunks."

•To be honest, I was kind of hoping that the trendy quality of the stories in the Miami Vice television series would succeed in popularizing the sport of Jai-Alai in parts of the U.S. other than Florida. I suppose that I was thinking, "Vibrant pastels, outfits without socks, white, ground-hugging Ferrari Testarossas... Jai Alai's a shoe-in." Can't figure out what went wrong, other than to postulate that our citizenry's shameful cultural ethnocentricity simply impeded us from sampling something new.

Then again, the fact that the only Vice episode dealing with the sport entailed a guy getting beaned in the head during a match and dying may have had something to do with it as well.

Next time: This column will appear on the front page, above the fold. Hah! Not.

Editors' Note: This column regularly appears in the Features section of The Bucknellian and will return there next week.

Track works toward post-season berths

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's and women's track and field teams participated in three non-scoring meets over the last two weeks, with several Bison performing well enough to qualify for post-season action.

This past Saturday at the 26th annual Delaware Invitational, Tameka Hinton '95, the newest sensation on the women's squad, obliterated the Bucknell record in the 200-meter dash, and achieved a career best in the shot put. Hinton flew through the 200 in 25.55 seconds, shattering the old mark of 25.79, established by Sue Rowland in 1989. The time also qualifies Hinton for the ECAC Championships in that event. In addition, the versatile freshman put the shot 40' 7", placing her second on the Bucknell all-time list.

Three other career-best efforts were established by the women in Delaware. Among them was the 4X800-meter relay team that finished first with a time of 9:31.75, thus missing a school record by less than two seconds.

Kathy Wurster '94, Beth Muehl '94, Becky Tobin '95 and Gina Abraham '93 set the 4X800 mark, and Wurster, Muehl, Abraham, and Kristen Opdyke '93 qualified for the ECAC's in the distance medley relay, finishing in a time of 12:15.1. That ranks fourth on Bucknell's all-time list for that event.

Other career-best efforts came from Carla De Biasi '94, who finished second in the 55-meter high hurdles (8.57), and Bridget Dean '95, who placed fifth in the 500 meter dash (1:20.30).

Also in Delaware, the men's team had several strong individual performances. Matt Deardorff '92, Bob Kelly '92, and Jason Cahilly '92 placed 1-2-3 respectively in the 5000-meter run. All three distance men qualified for the IC4A Championships, with Deardorff leading the trio with a time of 14:37.42.

Additionally, Tom Eagleson '93 won the 1500-meter run (3:54.3), Jim Farrer '93 broke the tape first in the 1000-meter run (2:33.93), and Mike Bronson '93 took the 3000-meter run (8:34.26). Pole vaulter Joe LaBarge '93, a native of Lewisburg, finished sixth in the event with a vault of 13'11 1/4". On the down side, LaBarge, who set a career-high one week earlier with a 14'6" leap at the Syracuse Invitational, injured a knee in Delaware that will most likely sideline him for the rest of the year. This will hurt the Bison as a team, as LaBarge's success consistently brought in team points.

On Sunday, February 2 at the Princeton Relays, the outstanding distance trio of Deardorff, Kelly, and Cahilly once again finished 1-2-3, this time in the 3000-meter run. Again, all three qualify for the IC4A Championships, with Deardorff's winning time 8:23.96.

The Bison's distance medley team also qualified for IC4A's. Brian Breslin '95, Kristofer Fischlein '95,

Men's volleyball cruises past top teams

Bison spike last season's top three teams without dropping a game; improve their record to a perfect 5-0

BY MIKE LUTZ AND JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Bucknell Men's Volleyball "Blue" Team won five consecutive matches with triumphs over Franklin and Marshall, Bloomsburg, Shippensburg's A and B squads, and Messiah. By defeating last year's division champ Shippensburg and runner-up Bloomsburg, the Bison have undoubtedly established themselves as the favorite to win their division and advance to the EIVA Championships in April.

Bucknell's Blue and Orange Teams played Bloomsburg and Franklin and Marshall on Saturday, February 8 in the fieldhouse. After crushing Bloomsburg 15-1 in the first game, Bucknell had to rally from a 13-7 deficit in the second to win 16-14. The third game again proved to be close, with the Bison edging out another 16-14 win. With the team having a lot of confidence after handily beating Bloomsburg, the Bison tromped the relatively weak F&M 15-4, 15-7, 15-2. The Orange team did not fare as well, playing for the first time ever as a team. After winning the first game against F&M, the Orange team dropped the next three games in a row.

On Sunday, February 9, the team traveled to Shippensburg and started off hot against Ship's A team and won 15-0. The match seemed to strongly resemble the Bloomsburg match the previous day and the Bison had to pull out two closer games at 15-9 and 15-11. Then Bucknell defeated Shippensburg's B team 15-9, 15-12, 15-7. So Bucknell ended the weekend without losing a game and finished the weekend out 12-0 in games.

"The team is much more aggressive from the start of matches this semester," stated Chris Dycka '93. "I have never experienced us coming out in the beginning of big matches and having that complete concentration right from the start."

In the team's first 12 games, outside hitters Brian Sell '94, Dice Nishii '94, and Keith Martin '92 have totaled 64 kills and hit at a percentage of 0.483. This number represents the number of times the hitter ended the rally, minus the number of errors he had, divided by the number of attempts he had to hit the ball.

A hitting percentage of 48% is outstanding. This number is very comparable to a batting average for a baseball player. It is obvious that BU's outside hitters have done a wonderful job all season.

The middle hitters have also been stellar. Glenn Gesek '94 and Chris Dycka have been totally dominant at their positions. The two of them totaled 61 kills and 35 blocks in the first four matches. Their blocking has simply been crushing to the opposition. When you have blockers like Dycka and Gesek it makes it much easier for the defense to dig balls because the team's overall confidence skyrockets. Dycka, one of the more well-rounded players in the league, also had 13 digs vs Shippensburg B, 6 against Bloomsburg, and 7 vs. F&M.

And last but certainly not least, Ben Jarosz '94, the team's offside hitter, has been the most potent offensive threat the team has to offer. He racked up 36 kills in four matches. Considering that every match has only lasted 3 games (best of 5) he is averaging well over 3 kills a game (he has not played in every game).

Another reason for Bucknell's success has been their newly acquired coach, Pat Musselman, who resides in Lewisburg. She has been an assistant coach here with the women's volleyball team and was the assistant to Susquehanna University's women's team. Coach Musselman has been coaching both the Blue and Orange teams, and has been doing the statistics for both teams when possible. Since both teams occasionally play at the same time, Coach Musselman must focus her attention on one team at a time. She has done an excellent job at keeping the player's heads in the game.

This past Saturday against Messiah College, the outlook was not as bright early on. The team started off slowly and was down in the first game of their best of five game match, 7-1, but the Bison were able to outscore the Falcons 44-7 and cruised to a 15-8, 15-3, 15-3 triumph. This marks the first time Bucknell has defeated the Falcons and now the Bison have defeated the first, second, and third place finishing teams (Shippensburg, Bloomsburg, and Messiah) from last year's league.

"The starting six are all doing a great job," says Dycka. "Their passing has been outstanding. More importantly, when we near the end of the game we are really closing out well. We are doing well under pressure and playing with consistent confidence."

The Bison have two schools to play yet before the halfway point of their regular season. If the Bison can keep their winning streak alive for their next two games they will finish the first half of their season undefeated. This will put the Bison into the driver's seat for the second half of the season and place them as the favorite to advance to the Eastern Intercollegiate Volleyball Association (EIVA) championships.

The EIVA consists of 11 conferences along the east coast. Bucknell's conference consists of Shippensburg, Bloomsburg, Scranton, Kutztown, Millersville, Messiah, and Franklin & Marshall. Three of these schools (including Bucknell) have two teams. The EIVA's conferences span from Maine down to the southern-most conference in North Carolina that includes Duke, North Carolina, and N. C. State. Other teams include University of Buffalo, Univ. of Rochester, Villanova, Penn, Delaware, Temple, LaSalle, Drexel, Univ. of Rhode Island, Maryland, Virginia Tech, and many more.

Wrestling falls to Navy

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Following another disappointing performance in the lower weight classes, the wrestling squad dropped its second contest of the new semester last weekend. For the second consecutive outing, the team scored no match points throughout the bottom four bouts and went on to fall to the Midshipmen of the United States Naval Academy in Davis Gymnasium, by a 27-9 count.

The loss to Navy, currently ranked 16th in the nation by the *Amateur Wrestling News, (AWN)*marks the sixth of the Bison's seven season defeats that have come at the hands of a team rated among the nation's elite. The only loss that did not come to a Top 25 team was a 19-17 defeat at Rider on the February 1. In that contest, Bucknell trailed 13-0 after the first four bouts before tri-captain Mike Van Doren '92 earned a major decision at 150-pounds that triggered a near comeback. The setback, to the three-time defending East Coast Wrestling Association champion, left the Bison with an even 1-1 in the conference.

The Navy contest started in a similar way, as Navy's Jeff Stepanic was able to top Russ Parker '93 at 118-pounds to open the scoring with three Navy points. A one-point win and three major decisions later, the Academy held a 14-point lead heading into the match's first Main Event.

The bout pitted the teams' respective 167-pounders, James Cummings for Navy, facing Bucknell's Ken Herceg. Early in the bout it appeared as if Herceg would be able to get the fall that would not only stop the Bison skid, but also move him into first place on the school's all-time career pin list. A second period pin against Rider had given the Bison captain a total of 11 on the season and 41 for his career, tying him with former All-American, Tom Marchetti '91.

The Midshipman was able to withstand this early barrage and soon wore the Bucknell senior down, eventually earning an 8-5 victory. Despite the loss, Herceg is still 17-6 on the year and is ranked 12th in the nation by the AWN.

The Navy dominance was slowed by Van Doren in the 150-pound bout, the opening match-up of the second half. However, the win was not able to spark the Bison as the visitors again scored victories in the next three bouts, making the score at 27-3, before Bob Ferraro '94 closed the scoring by recording a fall with two seconds remaining in the second period.

The 190-pounder's pin was his eighth of the season, ranking him second to Herceg on both the team and conference lists, and raised his overall mark to 21-1. Ferraro's lone defeat on the year was a 6-5 decision that came during the team's tournament season at the hands of John Curtis of George Mason, now rated sixth in the nation at 190-pounds.

The victory over Ryan Christopherson of Navy kept Ferraro's dual record perfect through the team's ten matches and should solidify his standing as the eighth ranked wrestler in the nation.

The pair of decisions for Van Doren not only broke the Bison into the scoring column in both cases, but also raised his season record to 6-1. All of the senior's competition has come in dual matches because he was forced out of action for the first six week's of the season due to a preseason knee injury.

Another Bison who sustained an early knee injury was 158-pound Mike Salone '92, who should be ready to compete soon, possibly in this weekend's Husky Duals to be held at Bloomsburg. Bucknell will follow that competition with a pair of home matches next week against conference foes, Hofstra and Central Connecticut State.

Joy Sandler '92

Joy Sandler '92, a member of the Bucknell women's basketball team, has been chosen as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of February 9-14.

Sandler was named the week's Patriot League Player of the Week for her performances against Patriot League rivals Navy and Holy Cross. The guard was Bucknell's high scorer, with 20, in the narrow 77-74 loss to Navy before enjoying even more success in the Bison's next game.

Sandler led Bucknell to a surprising 72-66 upset over Holy Cross, the number two team in the Patriot League last Saturday. The tri-captain once again was the team's high scorer, with 28, a career-high. In that game, Sandler scored 21 of her points in the second half and sank a career-high five three pointers.

More recently, the senior led the Bison in scoring, yet again, in their 69-50 loss to Fordham last Tuesday.

Swim teams prep for league meet

Women sweep Colgate and Fordham while the men split final two regular season meets

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's and women's swim teams finished their dual meet seasons with meets against Patriot League rivals Colgate and Fordham. The women swam to victory over both squads, while the men split the meets, beating Colgate and losing to Fordham.

Against Colgate, both Bucknell teams enjoyed many outstanding performances. The women won nine of 13 events in their 152-87 victory. Those individual victories were highlighted by that of Linda Fink '95 in the 1000 freestyle. The freshman's time of 10:45.50 was fast enough to break the Bucknell school record that had stood for nine years. Fink then went on to win the 500 free in 5:15.13 and was a member of the 400 free relay that captured first place.

The team's other triple-winner on the day was co-captain Margaret Grunow '93, who took the 200 individual medley (2:14.08) and the 100 free (:53.40). Grunow also swam the fly leg of the victorious 400 medley relay.

Rounding out the list of individual event winners for the Bison were Anne Marie Nielson '94, Kathleen Hartnett '94, and Jessica Liss '95. Nielson, who has been swimming superbly as of late, won the 200 free in 2:01.28, her in-season best in that event. Hartnett took the 50 free (:25.58), and Liss captured the 200 butterfly (2:19.18), marking the first victory of her collegiate career. Hartnett and Nielson also swam on the victorious 400 medley and 400 free relay teams respectively.

En route to their victory over Colgate, the Bucknell men won all but three of 13 events. Leading the Bison in typical fashion were the three triple-winners, brothers Don '92 and Rick Steenson '95 and Jay Gross '93.

Don, a co-captain at Bucknell, took the 200 free with an impressive in-season time of 1:45.81. He then went on to capture the 200 backstroke in 1:55.57 before having a hand in the winning efforts of the 400 free relay. Rick continued his outstanding freshman season against Colgate, winning the 200 IM (1:58.66) and the 200 fly (1:56.91). He also swam the fly leg on the 400 medley relay that took top honors.

Gross, Bucknell's premier sprinter, took the 50 free with a time of :21.48 and the 100 free in :47.86. Bucknell's other individual victories came in the distance freestyle events, where Stew Harris '95 took top honors in the 1000 free (9:59.29) and Dietrich Conze '94 won the 500 free (4:50.55). Harris was the only Bucknell distance swimmer to break the tough ten-minute barrier in the 1000 this season, a feat that he accomplished on more than one occasion. Cozne and Gross also teamed up to help the 400 free relay squad take first place.

The Fordham meet was a more difficult win for the Bucknell women's team, who had to swim hard for their 133-110 victory. Against Fordham, Fink and Grunow once again stole the show, each swimming at record-setting pace. Fink reset her own school record in the 1000 free by shaving 1.5 seconds off her time against Colgate (10:44.00). Grunow followed that example by breaking Freas-Rooke pool records in the 50 and 100 freestyles with outstanding, personal-best in-season times of :24.23 and :52.52 respectively.

Grunow also won the 200 free (1:56.02), the event just prior to the 50, making her performance in the 50 even more impressive. Fink also took the 500 free in 5:13.99, a time which not only places her fourth on the Bucknell all-time list in that event, but is also the fastest that Bucknell has seen in years.

The final individual victory for the Bison came in the 200 back. Hartnett's first-place time of 2:11.19 marks a personal-best in that event and is second on Bucknell's all-time list. The sophomore also swam the backstroke leg of the victorious 400 medley relay.

Liss and Colleen Brooks '95 also turned in notable times for the Bison. Liss's third-place time of 2:18.48 in the 200 fly is ninth on the Bucknell top-ten list, and Brooks's third-place time of 2:15.92 in the 200 back moved her to sixth on the all-time list in that event.

Although the Bucknell men did not fare as well as did the women against Fordham, the team enjoyed yet another impressive performance by Gross. The sprinter was again a triple-winner, anchoring the victorious 400 free relay and taking the 50 free in :21.46 and the 100 free in :48.47. The 1992 season marks the second consecutive season that Gross has gone undefeated in dual meets in the 50 free, one of two individual events that he won at last year's Patriot League championships.

Bucknell's only other event-winner was Conze, who won a close race in the 200 free with a time of 1:47.53 before leading off the 400 free relay that took top honors.

Both Steensons also had swims worth noting for the Bison. Don broke his own Freas-Rooke pool record in the 100 back with his lead-off split of :52.35 in the 400 medley relay. Rick moved to eighth on the Bucknell all-time list in the 200 fly with his second place time of 1:56.47.

In two weeks, the two teams will travel to West Point for the annual Patriot League championship meet. Going into the meet, the women boast not only an 8-2 record, their only losses coming at the hands of non-league teams, but also the highest win-loss percentage in the league.

Grunow, the 1991 conference champion in the 100 and 200 freestyles, is favored to win almost any event that she may enter in 1992. With the addition of Fink, as well as the depth that the team enjoys, the Bucknell women, who took second in the league by only a 14-point margin last year, seem in the running for first place at the championships. Army, the 1991 champion, and Navy will be the other top contenders for the 1992 title.

The Bucknell men's team, which placed third in the conference last season, is also looking to improve upon its 1991 performance. The Bison return two conference champions in Gross and Don Steenson. Gross, the runner-up for the 1991 high point award, was the champion in both the 50 free and the 100 fly, while Steenson garnered champion status in the 100 and 200 backstroke races at the 1991 league championships. The Bucknell men also return their entire 200 medley relay squad that captured a gold medal in 1991.

Both Steensons also had swims worth noting for the Bison. Don broke his own Freas-Rooke pool record in the 100 back with his lead-off split of :52.35 in the 400 medley relay. Rick moved to eighth on the Bucknell all-time list in the 200 fly with his second place time of 1:56.47.

Eagleson, and Jeff Loomis '92 ran the race in 10:06.6. Eagleson and Loomis also ran on the 4X800-meter relay team, which missed qualifying for IC4A's by one tenth of a second.

On Saturday, February 1, the both Bison squads competed at the Syracuse Invitational. It was at this meet that LaBarge had his career-best pole vault. His jump of 14'6" was six inches higher that his previous best of 14'0", set several times last year.

Also in Syracuse, Kristen Opdyke qualified for the ECAC Championships in the 5000-meter run. Opdyke finished in a time of 17:36.7, ranking her fifth on the all-time Bucknell list in that event.

Both the men's and women's squads will be in action tomorrow in the Bucknell Winter Track and Field Classic, which will take place in the fieldhouse. Over twenty different colleges will be represented at this meet, and it should be a good indication of how the runners will do in the post-season.

Tomorrow's meet will be one of the final tune-ups for the Patriot League Championships, which will be held on Saturday, February 29 at Lehigh. The men's IC4A Championships will be on March 7 and 8, and the women's ECAC Championship meet will be held on the same days. The following weekend, March 14 and 15 will be the National Championship for both men and women.

The team's fabulous four freshmen (Williamson, Sinn, Siefert, and Rosen) are emerging as stars of the conference. All placed in the top ten in their races on Saturday.

As both teams ready themselves for the season finale this weekend, thoughts have already begun to turn to next weekend's regional championships, to be held at Silver Creek, West Virginia. The top four teams from the conference will represent the ACSC; both the men's and women's teams have already received berths for these races scheduled for February 22 and 23. Mistake-free skiing will be required in order to advance from regionals to the National Championships in Lake Placid next month.

"Now that our team is at full strength, I think our chances of making nationals look pretty good," said Sinn.

"I believe we're becoming close as a team," noted McCahill. "Everybody is skiing well, and we're looking forward to regionals. Most of all, I think everyone's having a great time."

The top two teams from each of these conferences will meet at the EIVA championships during the first weekend in April. The site for these championships has not yet been determined. However, the Bison seem to be headed for the post-season with an untarnished record.

Bucknell has two teams this year even though there were no funds given to their second team. The team is running a fund raiser at this very moment and will raise exactly $900 dollars to fund the traveling expenses, tournament fees, etc. of their second team. Also, some of the money will go towards paying the salary of first year head coach Pat Musselman.

Bucknell's Orange team has come very close to winning matches and is improving rapidly with every outing. The team is led by Rob Winchell '92, Paul Kosempel '93, Ari Lewis '93, and club founder Brad Wealand '93. Ali Pashapour '95, Andrew Kolp '95, Chris Forvour '95, Gabe Miller '95, and Jim Kochman '95 are the youngsters that will eventually carry the blue team in the future. Kochman, Miller, and Forvour have started virtually every game for the orange team. Kolp is also getting valuable time in the setter's spot, and will run the blue team within a few years. With their athletic ability there is a lot of hope for the success of the men's volleyball team to carry into the future.

Bucknell plays Shippensburg and Millersville this Sunday in the fieldhouse. The first match is scheduled to begin at 1:00 p.m., and will continue into the early evening. Come out on Sunday and support your fellow Bison. You may be surprised, even amazed at the athletic ability and skill level of the athletes on the men's volleyball team.

other 13 points. The Crusaders were never able to cut their second half deficit to less than nine points. The half was highlighted by dunks from Raymond Brown '94 and Bright and several driving lay-ups from the likes of Simpson, Courtney and Russell Peyton '93. Despite one of the most exciting eighteen minute stretches in recent Bucknell history, the icing on the cake was not supplied until the game was all but decided. With just over a minute left to play, Courtney broke out of the defensive end with one purple shirt in front of him and Bright trailing. Courtney went to the goal and flipped the ball high of the glass. Bright came streaking down the lane, picked the ball out of the sky, and sent it down with authority. The crowd erupted, almost engulfing the court before the end of the game.

The game sent a message to the Crusaders who had been entertaining thoughts of a Patriot League championship. It also propelled the Bison into a two way tie for the League lead with Fordham. That tie was broken Wednesday night when Lafayette upset Fordham. Bucknell now leads the Patriot League by one game over the Crusaders, Rams and Engineers. Fordham will enter the Davis madhouse Saturday evening with revenge on its minds. " We beat them pretty good in their building. They'll beat looking for a little revenge on Saturday," remarked Courtney after Tuesday's game. Ordinarily, the revenge factor might give the talented Rams the advantage, but if last week's crowd returns to Davis, that would wipe out any advantage any visitor could have.

Fordham will also have to contend with the combination of Courtney and King. King has won or shared Patriot League Player of the Week honors for the past four weeks. After scoring just fourteen points Tuesday night, he'll undoubtedly have a big night so he can make his bid for a fifth straight award. Courtney has scored twenty-four points in the last two games. "Pat and I know we're the seniors and we're going to be the ones getting the ball in crunch time. We just have to make good decisions."

With the tournament just three weeks away, many fans are already making plans to travel to Lehigh to cheer the Bison. The team is also doing their part by playing their best basketball of the season as they sprint towards the finish line. With only one League game remaining on the road, the Bison are now the favorites to secure the first seed in the tournament.

Commentary
Davis Gym stifles fans and program

For a university which prides itself on its facilities, last weekend's home basketball crowd should have sent a strong message to The Powers That Be up on The Hill that one facility is grossly inadequite.

Davis Gymnasium opened in 1939 and hasn't been (aside from a few cans of paint and wood finish) touched since. College basketball and more specifically the Bison have enjoyed unprecedented popularity and success over the past ten years let alone 53. The school's failure to update the "facility" has prevented both the fans and the team itself from taking complete advantage of the sport's popularity.

A great portion of last Saturday afternoon's crowd of 2,792 (official capacity in Davis is listed at 2,100) witnessed one of the more exciting games in recent memory from the floors and aisles. These people should be thankful that they got in at all. Many would-be spectators don't even bother to walk (driving and parking is out of the question) to a game because they know they won't be comfortable even if they do get through the narrow doors.

One person, who thankfully gets a good seat every game, is the fire marshall. Should a fire ever break out during a basketball game, the television networks would have a bidding war for the rights to this massacre.

The team and athletic department not only suffer from lost revenues that a bigger crowd would create, both for concessions and ticket prices, but the inability to draw the top out of conference teams to Lewisburg. Only 12 of Bucknell's 27 regular season games are at home. Fewer games means fewer dollars and less opportunity for fans to watch games.

The reason for this becomes painfully obvious to those who try to make up the team's schedule every season. No coach in his right mind would subject his team to playing in a gym not suitable for high school playoffs. That explains St. Francis (PA) and Penn State's refusal to play in Davis. Not even Prairie View or Bethune-Cookman, respectively ranked 300 and 299 out of 300, would think twice about coming.

When you have to play the quality opponents such as Georgia or SMU (teams that the Bison are capable of beating) on the road it becomes difficult to improve yours or your conference's rankings. Low rankings lead to less respect from the NCAA come tournament time. When you're constantly receiving the 15th or 16th seed at "The Big Dance", your chances of advancement are minimal. I won't mention the only 15 or 16 seed to win a first round game because I'm a Syracuse fan.

Speaking of post-season play, ESPN avoided a potential nightmare when last year's NCAA Tournament Play-In between the winner of the Patriot League and the Northeast Conference was set for the latter's home court. In other words, the question of where to put the cameras in Davis never had to be answered. The Bison will also never have the opportunity to host the league tournament, yielding such an unfair advantage to Lehigh, who is only 11-11, but undefeated at home.

The less than state of the art gym also has to hinder recruiting efforts. To quote one of the assistant coaches, "It's a great place to bring a prospective student-athlete during a game, but a definate disadvantage when the building is empty, like practice times."

Renovations to Davis have been on the agenda longer than any of us have been on campus. However, serious rumors of "some renovations" have been circulating recently. The proverbial-check's in the mail. No one is going to hold his breath over the summer.

Stop wasting money on such things as the repainting of every parking space each summer and do something about the dinosaur down the hill from the admissions office. The atmosphere wouldn't change if it went from 2,100 to 3,500 seats. When is the last time 2,800 people ever crammed a chemistry building?

Bison blow out Holy Cross, defeat Army

First Place Bison (16-6, 8-2) host second place Fordham (11-11, 7-3) tomorrow night at 7:30 at Davis

By Kirk Peters
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Saturday was a day that Bucknell basketball fans will not soon forget. They crammed into Davis Gym for an afternoon game, but they saw a show that appeared ready for prime time. A crowd of 2,792, which is believed to be a record, packed Davis from the hardwood to the rafters, and they saw the Bison dominate Holy Cross from the opening tap. Bucknell avenged an early loss in Worcester by posting a seventeen point victory.

Just three days after the emotional win over the Crusaders, the Bison were back on the court. Leaving the friendly confines of Davis Gym behind, Bucknell traveled to West Point to engage the Cadets of the United States Military Academy. The slow, physical style that Army played provided a stark contrast to the up-tempo affair just a few days before, but the end result, a victory for the Bison, was the same. Though Bucknell had some trouble adjusting to the different style, the victory proved that they could get the job done playing any style of basketball.

In the first half of Tuesday evening's game, Army controlled the action by dictating the tempo. The slower cadets were able to make good use of the shot clock on offense, and stifle the Bison defensively. Despite playing at the slower tempo, Bucknell was able to keep the game close by trading baskets for most of the first half. Co-captains Bill Courtney '92 and Patrick King '92 accounted for fourteen of the first sixteen points for Bucknell. Taking advantage of Army's defense, which had point guard Craig Rose guarding the taller King, the Bison looked for their leading scorer. King responded with four straight hoops midway through the first half.

After that flurry from King, Army's Kevin Frycka scored two straight buckets to help the Cadets open a five point lead with six minutes left in the half. Army, however, missed an opportunity to extend that lead, and then they got a taste of why Bucknell is the highest scoring team in the Patriot League. Mike Bright '93 hit a trey, and Bill Courtney followed up by stealing the ball going strong to the goal for a hoop and some harm. Courtney hit the free throw and two more on the Bison's next possession to turn a five point deficit into a three point lead in a span of 52 seconds.

The Cadets, however, would not be easily turned away in their own building. They regained not only the tempo, but also the lead as Nico Harrison hit a shot at the buzzer to give Army a 28-27 advantage at the intermission. The Bison were lackluster in the first half. Courtney scored fourteen and King added eight points, but the rest of the team didn't contribute much offensively. They were rarely able to get into any offensive flow, and their defensive posture was also somewhat passive due to the style of Army's offense. Despite all the negatives, the Bison started the second half only trailing by a point.

In the beginning of the second half, things began to swing in favor of the Bison. Paul Olkowski '93 launched the first shot of the second half from three point land. The shot was off, but Olkowski was fouled. Although he has displayed a good shooting touch all year, but fouling a center beyond the arc was probably not a strategy discussed by the Army coaching staff in the locker room. Olkowski hit two of the three charity shots to give the Bison the lead. Harrison answered for Army in its next possession to regain the lead. However, that would be the last time the Cadets would own the lead. The Bison stepped up the defensive pressure which increased the pace of the game. Using the quicker tempo to its advantage, Bucknell went on a 14-2 run. The Bison got four points each from King, Courtney, and Chris Simpson '94 during that run. Though Bright was unable to contribute offensively, he was crucial during that run on the defensive end,pulling down rebounds and causing turnovers. "The best way to force the tempo is to stop them first. So we tried to step up the defense and push the ball off of that." Courtney said. At the ten minute mark of the second half, the Bison held a 47-36 lead and appeared very much in control.

Though the Academy may sometimes lack the athletes to reign victorious in an athletic forum, they never lack the intensity necessary to remain competitive. After opening the double digit lead, Bucknell began to relax, and Army crawled back into the game. Army went on a 9-2 run which left them trailing by only four points with 2:46 left to play. Despite being frustrated and somewhat fatigued by the physical play, the Bison were again able to answer the challenge. Although they were unable to produce offensively, the Bison stepped up the intensity on defense. Army was unable to score from the field for the remainder of the game. Their only points in that stretch came on two meaningless free throws made by Harrison with twelve seconds left. Despite being somewhat erratic from the line late in the game, Bill Courtney was finally able to hit four free late free throws to put Army away. For the game, Courtney went 14-19 from line. In doing so, he tied the Bucknell and Patriot League records for free thro s attempted, and Courtney finishe as the game's high scorer with 24 oints. King finished with fo rteen, and Olkowski scored ten.

With only three Bison reaching double figures in that hard fought win, it was a far cry from the contest last Saturday. Against Holy Cross, five players reached double figures in scoring as the Bison raced to a 95-78 victory. Holy Cross began the game tied at zero, and that was as close as it would get. The game began with King hitting a twelve foot jumper and Bright dunking savagely in transition. The Crusaders called a timeout just 1:03 into the game in fear that crowd noise would cause structural damage to Davis Gym. Though the Cross managed to tie the game at four, and again at 12, the first half belonged to Bucknell. The Bison benefitted from many fast break opportunities as well as the usual great play from King in the half court offense. King would finish the half with twelve points. In addition to King, the entire squad thrived in the up-tempo game. Olkowski and Simpson each scored eight points whiole Bright added six. Bright benefitted from getting high percentage chances, as all his points came via the spectacular dunk. As the result of one of their best halves of the season, the Bison led 44-31.

The second half bore a striking resemblance to the first. More transition hoops drove the already excited crowd into a frenzy, and King again pleased his Court adding an-

Skiers conclude regular season this weekend

Men's and women's teams gear up for the post–season at Silver Springs Mountain in Champion, PA

After steamrolling its many challengers into the snow last weekend, the Bucknell ski team travels to Seven Springs in Champion, PA, today for its final regular-season weekend of racing. The giant slalom/slalom format will serve as a tune-up for the Mid-Atlantic Regional Championships to be held next weekend.

On February 8th and 9th, the men's team accomplished a rare back-to-back slalom victory at Wisp, MD, giving the squad the momentum it needs as it passes the halfway point of the season. Bucknell was led both days by Chris Williamson, who twice placed second out of a 41-skier field. The Vermont native has served notice to the rest of the ACSC that he will be a major force for many years on the collegiate ski circuit.

On Saturday's technical slalom, Bison teammate Carver Sinn '95 placed third overall while captain Mark Abrahamsen '93 finished eighth, giving Bucknell its first team victory of the season, winning by a combined 4.31 seconds over runner-up Penn State.

Sunday provided unprecedented drama for the Bucknell men's team, as it had to wait for over an hour after the race was completed until a jury reversed two controversial disqualification judgments against Williamson and Abrahamsen in their races. The decision crowned Bucknell champions for another day, as Williamson and Abrahamsen finished second and fourth, respectively. Mark Ralston '94 had two clean runs to place 11th and round out the scoring for the Bison, which defeated archrival UPenn by a miniscule 0.98 seconds. Penn State finished third in the ten-school field.

The women's team also performed well at Wisp, placing third on Saturday and fourth the following afternoon. Pacing the Lady Bison Saturday once again was Adrienne Siefert '95, who skied to a third-place finish from the 24-racer field. An aggressive Hilary Rosen '95 skied to a season-best eighth-place finish. Captain Sarah McCahill '93 rebounded from a difficult morning run to place 13th. UPenn and Penn State captured the top two spots in the team standings.

Again racing with just the minimum three racers, the women's team fared well in the extremely fast Sunday races. In the afternoon's second run, McCahill had her best race of the year, powering her way to sixth place. Rosen finished in the top ten for the second consecutive day, placing tenth in the 22-woman field. Overall the Lady Bison finished fourth, behind Penn State, West Virginia and UPenn.

Bucknell appears to be in terrific shape for future winter campaigns.

Housing crunch may result in more doubles

25% drop in students living off campus

By Jamie Diaferia
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Craig Bitter–The Bucknellian

Due to an unexpectedly low number of applications to live off-campus next year, the possibility exists that nearly one-hundred students will be forced to live in converted doubles, according to Gerald Cummerford, assistant dean for housing.

Cummerford maintains that the application process, necesitated by the implementation of the four year residency requirement, is not at fault for the potential rooming problems.

Only four-hundred applications have been approved for next year, which is sixty less than the number projected last year by the Office of Residential Life. Of the accepted applications, close to forty are "soft," according to Cummerford, meaning that the students may still choose to live on-campus.

If no more applications are submitted and accepted, it is possible that nearly one-hundred students would be forced to live in doubles that are currently singles.

"If my worst fears are realized," Cummerford stated, "the first place we would look at would be the Swartz A and B wings," due to of the relative comfort of the rooms. In comparison to the singles of Roberts, the rooms in Swartz have more subtle luxuries, such as carpeting, though they are basically the same size. He downplayed the idea that the rooms would be too small as doubles, citing that at one time they were used in that capacity.

While Cummerford admits that the estimated number of people who wish to live off-campus is down by 25%, he quickly dispelled the notion that this was a result of the four-year residency requirement. "The conclusion people will make—which is incorrect—is that the application process has affected the number of people living downtown. That is just not the case," he said.

"Student's preferences have changed markedly from last year." To demonstrate that the application process is not at fault, he added that of the four-hundred applications, only four have been turned down.

Associate Dean of Residential Life Edward Dadez agreed with Cummerford that the residency requirement was not directly at fault, though he speculated that sophomore rush may be a controlling factor. "The reason we're having problems moving off campus is because juniors and seniors that would typically live off are having to live in their houses" due to mandates set forth by their respective Alumni Greek Councils. Under these provisions, no one can live off-campus until the house is filled to capacity so that they fulfill their financial obligations with regards to property maintenance. Since sophomore rush will reduce by nearly one-third the number of active members, many houses are finding it increasingly difficult to reach capacity without forcing all of the fraternity members to stay on-campus.

Additionally Dadez noted that the sophomores that would normally move into the fraternity houses are being forced to live in the residence halls, creating what he called a "crunch."

This, coupled with the need to fill the houses, has resulted in a general trend to move the students out of the town and back onto the campus at a time when there are not enough rooming accommodations to accomplish such a move.

Cummerford emphasized that the number of students that would be affected is purely speculative, stating that there are many variables that must be considered.

First, he believes that if Residential Life receives and accepts 460 applications to move off-campus, "we should be in decent shape." However, there are several other demographic considerations that are uncontrolla-

University refuses renovation of Davis Gym, risks State legal action

By John Godbout
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell has no plans to renovate Davis Gym despite recent basketball crowds exceeding the maximum capacity by as much as seven hundred people, says Vice President for Administration Barry Maxwell.

The school could be fined for consistently disregarding the occupational limit set by the state, but according to Terry Fisher of the State Department of Labor and Industry, Buildings Department, who sets the limits, such punitive action is dependent on complaints being filed.

"The only reasons that the Fire Marshal would inspect the gym would be if someone complained to us or got seriously injured. Another scenario would be if the Fire Marshal happened to be in the crowd for entertainment purposes and felt the number of people excessively high," said Fisher.

The Buildings Department uses Title 34 of the State fire code to calculate the maximum capacity of a room. Arenas for congregation such as Davis Gym require ten square feet per person in the room.

The school recognizes that a larger facility is necessary, but is unsure that a renovated Davis would be capable of handling dramatically more people. The possibility of a new off-campus facility has not been actively pursued, but excessive costs would likely deter the administration from seriously considering that type of proposal.

"We recognize the increasing crowds, but recent crowds have been well-behaved and we do not consider them a safety concern," said Maxwell.

Director of Physical Education and Athletics Rick Hartzell agrees. "There is some risk involved, but our students are rational, intelligent people. I don't think anyone will insight a riot or try to start a problem," said Hartzell.

The issue with which the administration and athletic department are presently grappling is the magnitude of the problem. They are questioning whether increased fire risks are serious enough to merit turning away the extra few hundred people.

"The alternatives cause concerns. If we limit the attendance, then we will have to shut people out, which we don't want to do. The last crowds have been very responsible, and there seem to be adequate exits, so while there are no easy solutions, we don't want to set limitations at this point," said Maxwell.

Fisher says that the main concern is if the exits are able to handle the oversized crowd. "We do calculate the egress capacity of the room in determining the occupational limit. If it can be proved that there are enough exits to service the crowd, then a couple of hundred people over the limit may not be a serious concern," he said.

Hartzell believes that renovations to the gym should be a priority, but describes himself as a team player who will wait until the school is in a better financial posi-

Search begins for gay/lesbian/bisexual adviser

By Micki Hamilton
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In response to a need for a university official to be hired to address the concerns of gays, lesbians, and bisexuals on campus expressed last semester, the Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual Task Force has issued the preliminary job description of such an offical and begun searching for a candidate.

According to the description, the advisor would "spend 4-5 hours per week ...to provide guidance and support for gay/lesbian/bisexual students; to help in collaboration with the Division of Student Life to implement cultural, educational and social programming for the university community; to address issues related to the safety of all students, harassment and homophobia; to serve as a strong voice for gay/lesbian/bisexual concerns."

The members of Friends of Lesbians and Gays(FLAG), and the Gay/Lesbian Awareness Group expressed their needs for recognition, safety, and other issues to the administration last semester.

In turn, President Sojka requsted the creation of a Task Force to explore these concerns and assigned this duty to student services.

The task force, co-chaired by Acting Vice President for Student Services Barbara Shailor and Professor of English Marilyn Mumford, is made up of seven other members of the university community. Shailor explained that the task force has both short and long term goals for meeting the needs of students: "We've determined that there are certain areas of concern we want to work on."

"We see that there is a clear need to bring someone in now to work on these issues."
—Barbara Shailor Acting Vice President for Student Services

She noted that some of the areas of concern include preventing harassment, promoting support, and advising gay, lesbian, and bisexual students. "We recognize there is a clear need to bring someone in now to work a certain part of the week on these issues."

Gema Perez, a member of the task force, said that safety is important and that an advisor would be able to address this and other concerns, similar to the work that Janice Butler does for women through the Women's Resource Center.

Perez added that the task force wants, "to provide a positive social atmosphere to be comfortable about being gay, lesbian, or bisexual." Perez also thinks it is important to educate the campus about these issues to eliminate stereotypes.

Perez said, "It is important to convey that being gay, lesbian, or bisexual is okay and is not an illness. It is just another cultural group that has their own needs and deserves to be recognized as such."

Another issue for the task force to tackle, according to Perez, is coming up with solutions to make the campus atmosphere more inclusive of gay, lesbian, and bisexual students. The advisor will be able to address this concern.

Acclaimed TV producer stresses value of history

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Emmy Award-winning producer Ken Burns addressed the Bucknell community at the Weis Center Sunday, where he discussed his critically acclaimed documentary The Civil War, as well as his views on the country's waning knowledge of American history.

Burns blamed the television industry for creating "dozens of clone-like channels" that have no historical or social value, and called for quality programming to accurately portray personal histories and social movements.

Burns' comments echoed statistics showing that nearly 40 percent of graduating high school seniors did not know which half of the century the Civil War occurred in, or who the U.S. fought against in World War II. He argued that personal histories have "dried up," and that historical events have become "like castor oil to society" that is force-fed, and unpleasant in taste.

The producer distinguished between what he termed "top-down" and "bottom-up" historical accounts, demonstrating that the latter is a more useful and compelling narrational device on account of its decidedly personal nature.

His documentaries, he added, are an effort to utilize bottom-up history, which bring life to the stories, rather than simply rehashing old news. Burns claims that television has fallen into the trap of presenting top-down news where "issues are merely pushed around, but never digested."

Noting the potential power that television wields over society, he expressed his hope that it can someday be the "Homeric form...so that stories can be told in an honorable fashion."

The Civil War documentary was a reflection of Burns' desire to personalize history and make it interesting to the public, while also maintaining its historical value.

The result took everyone involved with the project by surprise, including Burns himself. While he claims that it has been difficult adjusting to the fame he has achieved overnight, it enables him to lobby in Congress for the preservation of Civil War battlefields as more than just a voice.

He remarked that is was painful to look out from the fields of Gettysburg and see "golden arches in the distance." He quipped, "Hamburgers are fine, just not at Gettysburg."

Burns is currently working on a project that is another passion of his, a documentary on the history of baseball. He says that he will attempt to show a different aspect of the American experience through an in-depth study of the game.

ble, according to Dean of Enrollment Planning Richard Skelton.

Citing that they were over their target number for the class of '95 by thirty-nine students last year, Skelton hopes to decrease the number of incoming students by aiming for a class of 850. This would be the lowest number in recent years, as the target was 865 last year, and 870 the year before that. Additionally, he hopes to monitor that number more closely than usual by accepting less off the waiting list.

Skelton will meet Monday with Cummerford to officially discuss how much room for error the Admissions office will have. It is hoped by both men that the situation will remedy itself with a greater influx of applications to live off-campus in the coming weeks.

Cummerford noted that he would continue to accept applications for as long as it takes to fill the 460 spots.

Lack of funds, space force action on campus childcare

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Sunflower Childcare Center is currently facing several challenges that must be addressed soon in order to continue to provide high-quality day care for all Bucknell families.

Established as an independent day care center by Bucknell parents in 1978, Sunflower rents the basement of Tustin Gym from the University in return for giving the children of Bucknell Administration, Faculty, and Staff preference for enrollment in the center. Sunflower provides care for children ranging in age from infants to kindergarten age.

Several concerns about the future of Sunflower have been raised and were addressed in a May 1991 report by a Committee to Review Childcare Facilities. Although Sunflower is supposed to be a child care option for all Bucknell families, there is a consensus that the center is too expensive for the University Support Staff to afford.

Sunflower operates with tuition money and some money from parent fund raising, and is barely surviving financially.

Fees for child care are as low as possible and are mainly to cover the staff's salaries, yet many members of the Bucknell community with children are unable to afford Sunflower.

Low salaries and a lack of minimally adequate benefits for the Sunflower staff are also a concern. Sunflower cannot afford to offer health care benefits for its employees. According to the Committee's report, "staff retention is a critical element in the success and quality of a childcare program" and the absence of decent benefits seriously hampers the program's ability to attract and retain high-quality personnel.

Richard Mannarino—The Bucknellian

Crowded conditions inside the Sunflower Childcare Center, located in the basement of Tustin Gymnasium, coupled with a new law could force the center to cut its population by 13 children.

New state regulations on child care may pose more problems. Judy Peeler, Director of Sunflower, says "new regulations are imminent" that would require the center to either eliminate 11 of the 43 spaces available or build partitions in the one large room of the center.

Neither option is desirable, especially as the room already lacks windows and the addition of partitions would only make the room "crowded and claustrophobic," according to Peeler.

The Committee to Review Childcare Facilities recommended that Bucknell provide on-campus day care for all University employees and a subsidy for those families who cannot afford the current fees of Sunflower and other day care centers.

Finding a new site adequate for Sunflower's needs and state regulations "should be made a priority."

There is also a possibility that Bucknell may help Sunflower with costs, eliminating the rent and providing custodial services.

Peeler also points to the fact that the center is used by the Psychology and Education Departments, and as such is instrumental in the training and education of Bucknell students.

Although these options could be useful now, concerned faculty and staff believe that more than a "quick fix" is needed.

At the recommendation of Barry Maxwell, Vice President of Administration, a subcommittee will be investigating the possibilities and costs associated with two other campus sites for Sunflower for a long-term solution.

Phi Psi rennovations more than$50,000 over budget

Sprinkers, asbestos removal raise costs

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The cost of the recent rennovation of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house has surpassed the $352,500 orignally allocated for the project by $50,830.

Final figures on the cost of the project will be higher than those originally projected because of what Maxwell described as "two administrative decisions made while construction was in progress."

The Phi Kappa Psi construction project was originally budgeted and approved by the trustees at a cost not to exceed $350,000.

As of November 1991, the projected cost for completion of the construction was only slightly over budget at $352,500.

However, two unanticipated costs incurred during construction of the house will bring the final cost above projected figures.

These additions consist of the introduction of a sprinkler system and the removal of asbestos found within the building.

"There were two types of asbestos found in the house," said Manager of Construction, Jim Hostetler. "The building contained asbestos pipe insulation and asbestos floor tile in the old kitchen."

The additional decision to add a sprinkler system to the house, made after the project had already begun, was also done out of concern for student safety.

"Considering the fires we have had both in fraternity houses and in places like Vedder Hall, it was felt that it would be money well spent if it protected a student life," said Hostetler.

According to Maxwell, the Phi Kappa Psi project was paid for through the Plant Fund Reserve, a fund used for building renovations and modifications.

"This is the same money as was used to renovate the Bison, the stadium, the bookstore, and Swartz Hall," said Maxwell.

The reserve fund, which is completely separate from the operating budget and does not include money from student tuition, is obtained through gifts from friends and donors of the University.

According to Maxwell, although the final cost of completion of the house is not yet certain, it is estimated that the additions will add an additional $50,830 to the projected $352,500. To date, $385,000 has been spent on the Phi Psi construction project.

President's Forum to examine environment

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Critically acclaimed botanist Lynn Margulis will present the inaugural lecture of the President's Forum on Tuesday, Feb. 25, speaking on the controversial Gaia Hypothesis.

Distinguished University Professor of Botany at the University of Massachuttes, Amherst, Margulis is "widely respected as a scientist, but the academic community tends to shy away from the Gaia Hypothesis—it is definitely highly controversial," President Gary Sojka said last week. "She's not afraid to ask the big questions, namely, 'is the earth the ultimate organism.'"

The lecture is the first in the year-long forum focusing on the theme "The Environmental Imperative," during which a series of diverse speakers will present various hypothesis and proposals in an attempt to begin to address the problem of the environment.

"We are not necessarily focusing on the crisis per se," says Director of Corporate and Foundation Relations Jim Rice, who spearheaded the organization of this year's forum. "Rather, we are presenting authorities who have recognized the environmental predicament we face and are saying 'here is how we can approach a solution.'"

The selection of speakers in the forum was an attempt to combine the efforts of the sciences, humanities, and social sciences as well as those of the corporate/industrial framework to formulate such an approach.

"We have combined the work of our faculty in many disciplines in an attempt to 'thematize' the campus in this endeavor, pulling together vast resources which are not always joined otherwise," said Sojka. "It is my hope that by creating a common experience for students and faculty, issues such as the environment will become one for all of us to discuss and contribute to."

Rice points to the role of the faculty as crucial: "Before each speaker faculty members will hold seminars introducing students to the problem being addressed and the position of the speaker in solving that problem. The fruits of the forum will be preserved in the teaching of our faculty long after the end of next year."

The forum will continue on a yearly basis, each year examining a new issue from an interdisciplinary prospective. "By structuring our examination as a year-long forum, we can acquire more highly-qualified speakers and take advantage of the 12 month period to assimilate and synthesize the material," says Sojka.

Future lectures in this year's forum will address issues such as biodiversity, the relationship between religion and ecology, the corporate role in environment, and the place of economic growth and incentive in environmental programs.

Fun Flicks hits campus today

BY DARREN MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Have you ever wanted to squeeze into a pair of black leather pants, slip on combat boots with three-inch soles and jump around with an electric guitar just like your favorite headbanger on MTV? Or perhaps you would rather put on a Los Angeles Raiders jacket, hang the hood ornament of your choice around your neck and impersonate the rapper you deem the freshest.

Fun Flicks
TOTALLY INTERACTIVE VIDEO
LIVE, PROFESSIONAL, MOBILE VIDEO RECORDING STUDIO

Wherever your tastes may lie, from 3 p.m. to 9 p.m. today in the Terrace Room, the mobile video recording studio, Fun Flicks, will be fulfilling all sorts of musical fantasies.

Sponsored by the Bison Programming Committee, Fun Flicks travels to college campuses around the country taking along professional video camera equipment along with thousands of special effects and hundreds of costumes.

With all the costs underwritten by the programming committee, the student body is invited to participate free of charge. All participants will also receive a six-minute videotape of their performances.

Jen Silver '92, chairperson of the programming committee, explained that Fun Flicks "will have any song you would like to use, but if you are worried that they won't, just bring along your own tape or CD."

Noting the impressive track record of the recording studio which bills itself as "totally interactive video," Silver stated, "Almost 100% of the schools which have hired Fun Flicks ask them to return the next year."

Silver added that although "students at most schools have to pay to participate, their involvement is overwhelming."

Participants will be taken today on a first come, first serve basis.

The student video performances will become the focus of an awards ceremony Saturday at 9 p.m. in the Vaughan Literature Auditorium.

Comedian Eddie Feldman will be the master of ceremonies for the evening, during which a total of $1,000 in cash prizes will be awarded to the eight winning videos. Award categories include Most Original, Most Professional, and Audience Choice which will be determined by an applause meter.

Participation with Fun Flicks is not contingent upon participation in the awards ceremony.

tion to undertake the job.

"Renovating Davis gym has been a 'priority' since 1974, but 18 years later, still nothing has happened. Everyone realized that the Bison and the library had to be renovated, so we'll just have to wait until we fall into the cycle," said Hartzell.

He says that gym renovations are always a topic of discussion, but renovating would require adding additional exits and modifications to make the facility handicapped accessible, factors that could nullify the effort to add seats.

The next major financial campaign that the school will begin is not scheduled for a few years, so any hopes of a new facility in the near future are dim at best.

"This is really a bit of a sore spot for me. Students deserve a better place to watch basketball and exercise. The subject should have been addressed before now," said Hartzell.

Some students feel that a larger facility could help bring more established musical groups to the campus. Right now there are no places big enough to gather adequate fans for a "big name" performer to break even.

Although programs like concerts would help the University in its mission to minimize the role of alcohol in the Bucknell social scene, Maxwell says this has not been a consideration. "A larger and improved basketball facility would be the major consideration for construction of any new building," he said.

Rape incidents grow at Clarion

Fourteen women students at Clarion University of Pennsylvania reported being raped last semester. University officials also reported that since 1973, twenty to thirty-one percent of women students have been raped at least once.

Dr. Donna Ashcraft, a psychology professor at CUP, does not expect these numbers to decrease soon.

Dr. Ashcraft cites deficiencies in rape education as the cause, including too many programs being geared towards women. "The primary reason for rape is the assailant," she said.

Rotary announces scholarships

The Rotary International has announced the opportunity to compete for fully funded scholarships for college or graduate level study in another country.

The ambassadorial scholarships worth approximately $22,000 are available to Bucknell University students; preference will be given to students with an interest in international study or international business.

Interested students should contact the Rotary International Foundation Committee before the Feb. 27 deadline.

Race becomes an issue at PSU

A Penn State Daily Collegian writer criticized for a column that asked black students to arm themselves for a race war will not be disciplined by the managers of the paper.

The column stated that 85-90 percent of white people are "devout racists" and "devils" who should be killed if they pose a threat to blacks.

Repesentatives of the paper maintain that the column is the opinion of the author and chances are "incredibly improbable that anyone would go out and start a riot because of this column."

False alarms bugging CMU

Bugs in the fire alarm systems have officials at Carnegie-Mellon University concerned.

"We have a system for repairing fire alarms," Wilson says.

ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

Solano proves himself more than a playwright

NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Rehearsals for the staged reading of Buenavista began a week and a half ago, with a twist. Playwright-in-Residence Bernardo Solano, the author of Buenavista, will also be playing a leading role. The reading is scheduled to run Feb.28 and 29 in Tustin Studio Theatre in conjunction with the Department of Theatre and Dance's Latin American Project. Tickets are $4 and available at the Elaine Langone Center Box Office.

As the author of a dozen plays, the recipient of a Fulbright Fellowship in Colombia and the national playwriting award from the Mixed Blood Theatre in Minneapolis, as well as a graduate from Yale, Solano has the qualifications to direct the production, but chose instead to take a more passive role. "There's a certain point where you just have to give yourself over and assume the director knows what he's doing."

While on campus, Solano will assume many functions, the least of which will be actor in the production. Last night Solano presented "Estado de Sitio," an hour long lecture which he described as 'anecdotal.' Having spent the last ten years going back and forth between Colombia and the States, his lecture consisted mostly of personal stories and situations. Returning from the rain forests of South America, Solano based his latest play, Entries, on the observations and experiences he brought home.

Solano has also been conducting workshops for beginning playwrights in Tustin. Through the workshops, which will consist of nine or ten people, Solano was, "trying to lead them into writing exercises that will help tap into a more organic process of writing with as little self-censorship as possible...writing with the mind's eye." Each workshop opens with an exercise in yoga to relax the members of the group, a ritual he developed by accident while studying in New York.

Heavily involved in the Latin American Project with Gary Grant, Chair and Professor of the Department of Theatre, Solano is working as a consultant, writer, and collaborator for both Buenavista and El-Arte Escenico Sobre Latino America, a collage of music, dance, and theatre targeting an array of Latin American views. "I'm a sounding board, offering suggestions and feedback. He (Grant) seeks out my participation and wants to know my opinions."

Ironically, it was another of Solano's plays that kicked off the Latin American Project. His previous work, Speak Spanish For Me, opened with Pedro Salinas' The Price, translated into English by Nina Knoche '93, during Cap and Dagger's Evening of One Acts earlier this month.

The Latin American Project is a new venture for the department, but Grant hopes that it will, "move the campus into inter-culturalism, while raising the possibilities and problems of the meeting of different cultures."

Gallery features work of Latin America

The Center Gallery's current exhibit of paintings by six Latin American women artists is viewed as "a wonderful opportunity for Bucknell students and the entire community to view art that is rarely seen in Central Pennsylvania," according to Robert P. Metzger, director of the gallery. Six Latin American Women Artists will be on display until March 30. The Center Gallery, located on the third floor of the Elaine Langone Center, is open weekdays 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. and weekends 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.

The exhibit showcases the works of contemporary artists representing five countries in conjunction with the Latin American Project, a University-wide focus on Latin America in connection with the recognition of Columbus' arrival in the Americas. "The works parallel North American and European art, but have a unique expression, mirroring the artists' Latin American roots," said Metzger.

The works range from the geometric abstractions of Colombian Fanny Sanin to the figurative paintings of Cuban Ana Albertina Delgado. Of note is the art of architect Ana Tiscornia from Uruguay. Al Margen (On the Margin) "explores the automatic writing of technical memory," according to curator Richard Humphrey '74 of Humphrey Gallery, New York City. This painting resembles a giant sketch pad, complete with phone numbers and a grocery list. Other artists include Argentina natives Sarah Grilo and Liliana Porter, and Catalina Parra of Chile.

"The distinguished history of Latin American arts has been, not surprisingly, male dominated," said Humphrey. "This exhibition is an opportunity to look beyond the obvious and explore some important women's contributions."

Fire & Rain show returns to the Bison

Dave Binder echoes style of James Taylor

KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Saturday, musician Dave Binder performed his "Fire & Rain" show to a capacity crowd in the Bison. Binder, who is no stranger to Bucknellians, captivated his audience with his renditions of the music of the great James Taylor.

Although the show began at 9:30, the Bison was filled by 9:00 as students poured in to listen to the musician warm up. Interspersed between musical numbers were anecdotes about the life of James Taylor.

The performer had the audience singing along to such songs as "Paradise by the Dashboard Light" and "You've Got a Friend." Binder also impressed the crowd with his original "Song for You and Me," a song that addresses issues of prime importance today, including the environment and world hunger.

Binder concluded his two-hour performance with a song that has become a staple in his performances, "The Unicorn Song." The enthusiastic audience eagerly participated in the popular camp song.

Binder's "Fire & Rain" show has become an annual event at Bucknell. He also performed during Orientation last August.

Housing crunch demands attention

Homelessness... it's a nationwide problem, but one which has not touched Bucknell directly. Or has it?

The current problems in the implementation of Bucknell's new four-year residency requirement may leave dozens of students without rooms come Labor Day.

The four-year residency requirement was one of eighteen major planks in President Gary Sojka's May 1990 proposal to redesign Bucknell's social-residential system. Under the plan, students were expected to reside on campus during their entire University career; students wishing to live off campus would have to apply for permission through the Office of Residential Life.

The goals of the new regulations were two-fold. First, the University could screen disciplinary records to prevent problem students from moving into town, thereby smoothing town-gown relations. Secondly, Bucknell had a new way to ensure that its beds remain full, since the college-age population continues to decline and the University must face the prospect of declining enrollment.

Unless the numbers change significantly, however, the University's residence halls will be severely overbooked for the 1992–93 academic year, with the prospect of having all lounges disappear, along with the conversion of one hundred singles in Swartz Hall into doubles. This may be Commerford's "worst fear," but it can't compare with that of students seeking a room. He says he wouldn't mind living in one of the converted doubles; most students will probably feel very differently.

The University should have given more consideration to the process before implementing it this year. Another year should have been spent to review the regulations before implementation.

The process has been further complicated by the switch to sophomore rush. This move has also disrupted the normal flow of students wishing to live off-campus, since next year's Greek juniors and seniors will have to fill fraternity houses and sorority suites; in previous years these upperclassmen would be among those most likely to live off campus. Sophomores, who traditionally fill these slots in the Greek system, will be forced into other housing on campus.

The TIP recommendations also recognized the importance of hall lounges as a focus for the hall group as a community. Freshman resident assistants report much lower vandalism rates on halls which have lounges, since the residents have a place beside the hall itself in which to hang out. Overcrowding in residence halls will have the same affect as it does in prisons or anywhere else—tensions rise, yielding more criminal incidents. This situation may create an ideal sociology experiment, but it certainly will not lead to an ideal community. The increase in disciplinary incidents will also mean that more students will be disqualified for off-campus living in subsequent years.

This situation will also be complicated by a larger-than-expected freshman class. This year the "freshman hall lounge" is only the distant memory of some juniors and seniors. The University cannot bank on an incoming class of 850 to reduce the crunch, because enrollment planning will always be an inexact science.

The University has only one choice—it must convince a sufficient number of students to live off campus. A serious effort should be made to solicit applications, and the Office of Residential Life should hold a "housing fair," to match students and rentors at this late date.

Bucknell must do everything in its power to remedy the situation, or next semester will fufill everyone's worst fears.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Bucknell doesn't meet upperclass needs

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing this letter from what I perceive to be a somewhat unique perspective in one respect. As a junior at Bucknell, I have spent all 3 years living in upperclass dorms (first Swartz, then Hunt, and now Trax). I haven't had the experience of living in freshman housing, so my comments are in regards to upperclass dormitory housing.

What I am referring to is the state of disrepair and dsyfunctionality that exists in each of the dorms I mentioned. My observations start with my freshman year in Swartz. The shower heads there would have been convenient if I was around 5'2", but alas, I am closer to 5'10." The contortions that anyone taller than myself would have had to undergo to take a shower could be considered humorous in hindsight. My next pleasure was finding out that a permanent part of my room's AC/heat unit was rotting and mold infested. The smell produced was less than pleasant and made the rest of the year was a constant struggle with my allergies, whenever the unit turned on.

My second year at Bucknell involved lesser annoyances such as the lack of something as basic as a bookshelf and an inability to turn down (much less off) my heater. The water pressure in one of the two showers was so miniscule that shower time would literally quadruple if one actually wished to rinse off. However, I must say that I got out just in time as in several bathrooms, the showers have backed up a few times this year and dripped water down to the lower floors.

I would like to say that this year has been different, but that would be a gross misrepresentation of the truth. I was looking forward to living in an upperclass dorm, especially with the planned renovations. In keeping with a common pattern at Bucknell, however, the renovations were "postponed," due to a lack of funds. I must say that the bathroom floors were redone, a nice change from the year before when the cleaning lady kindly invested in some rubber mats to cover the holes in the shower floor. The lack of hot water during the prime morning hours is rather annoying, but not quite the nuisance of losing all water pressure. The female residents of 4th Trax have often walked

The SATs are safeguarding academic standards

TO THE EDITOR:

Last month, Mr. Schroeder expressed his opinion that Bucknell should "reject the SAT" and other standardized admissions tests. In Mr. Schroeder's article ("Promote Racial Diversity: Reject the SAT", Jan. 17), he invokes the image of Dr. King. How strange that Dr. King would figure in an article which advocates preferential treatment for racial minorities. King asked people to "Judge us not by the color of our skins, but by the content of our character." If we believe in King's argument, we ought to believe in the SAT.

Mr. Schroeder claims: "One sure-fire technique of increasing minority matriculation is eliminating so-called 'standardized' tests like the SAT's and subject achievement tests from the Bucknell application."

Proponents of multiculturalism argue that the university has a responsibility to promote diversity. True. However, a university should promote diversity of mind, not simply skin. No idea is provincial; nor is any idea the property of a single race. According to College Board President Donald Stewart, who is black: "It is reverse racism that holds certain assumptions about what a race or gender should know." Diversity can be promoted without violating the central pillar of the American university.

The central pillar of a selective college or university is to provide a liberal education. Incoming freshmen are traditionally selected according to academic merit. According to Robert Klitgaard at Harvard: "Standardized tests usually do quite well, usually better than any other criteria, at predicting academic success at selective universities."

Dinesh D'Souza, in his book Illiberal Education, (1991, MacMillan) has examined the battle behind the SAT. He observes: "Ironically, when the SAT was introduced in 1926, the main argument for it was that colleges were admitting students based on highly arbitrary and variable criteria. Jews, Catholics, blacks and others complained of discrimination and disparate treatment...The SAT was aimed at eliminating arbitrariness, and thus reducing the risks of prejudice." Contrast that with today's admissions at schools (most notoriously Berkeley) which are committed to diversity and multiculturalism: When Berkeley and other selective colleges sought to impose ceilings on white and Asian student admissions in the 1980's, they did so by reducing their emphasis on measurable criteria of scholarship, on the grounds that these standards were unreliable, and that what counted was "diversity" and "multiculturalism." In reality, of course, Ivy League schools worried that they were admitting too many whites and Asians.

If we reject the SAT, colleges might once again use highly arbitrary standards of admission. According to D'Souza: "At Berkeley, black and Hispanic students are up to twenty times (or 2,000 percent) more likely to be accepted for admission than Asian applicants who have the same academic qualifications...At Ivy League colleges, which are among the most competitive in the nation, incoming freshman have average grade scores close to 4.0 and average SATs of 1,250 to 1,300. According to admissions officials, however, several of these schools admit black, Hispanic and American Indian students with grade averages as low as 2.5 and SAT aggregates in the 700 to 800 range."

Thus Mr. Schroeder is correct when he argues: "Eliminating the SAT of course will not solve the problem of discrimination in education." In fact, eliminating the SAT might enforce rigid racial quotas, putting ceilings on qualified students in the "wrong" or "overrepresented" races (i.e., whites and Asians) in order to make way for certain "correct" races. This won't eliminate discrimination; it will make it worse.

Professors question President Sojka's Commencement choice

TO THE EDITOR:

With great dismay we read in your last issue that, through the office of Gary Sojka, Bucknell University extended an invitation to Colin Powell, America's top soldier, to be its next Commencement speaker. And this dismay was only slightly relieved by the information that Powell had refused the invitation.

We would like to ask aloud a few questions regarding this invitation, hoping in doing so to provoke discussion of the matter. First of all, we wonder: what exactly did we want to learn from Colin Powell? Did those who invited him hope to get the inside story about, for example, how Colin Powell got together with Richard Cheney and Norman Schwartzcopf and constructed the strategy for using tanks to plow into the ground the terrorized and still breathing conscripts of the Iraqi army? Did Colin Powell also help form the decision to plow under, into mass graves, other Iraqi soldiers without first trying to identify them, in violation of the Geneva Accords, not to speak of its violation of decency?

Or perhaps we might have wanted to know how Powell and Bush and Sununu figured the best way to keep our reporters from knowing and telling us how violent and brutal was the American assault. Perhaps, even, Powell could have told us of his role in preparing the long string of innuendoes, half truths, and outright lies the Bush Administration promulgated in order to get the nation to support his war in the first place. Had Colin come to Bucknell, we too would have wanted to ask him, with a huge banner, if it was his idea personally to order American pilots to massacre the Iraqi troops who, already routed in the field, were trying to flee back across the border in old cars, broken jeeps, and battered troop trucks.

Whatever will be the lasting truth of this bloody, awful war, in judging those who made it happen, one can hardly ignore that, a year after the blitzkrieg, Saddam Hussein remains in his office, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait are yet ruled by authoritarian potentates, and most horribly, the innocent in Iraq, especially tens of thousands of its children, still suffer disease, face early deaths, or will bear the permanent psychological terror of the bombing. Do we really think our graduating seniors could have learned anything sustaining and life-giving from one of the planners of such a war, particularly one who early on opposed it but who, once it had begun, helped to bring forth its full measure of ferocity?

Last, a question to all of us at Bucknell who, through our chief officer, made this invitation to Colin Powell: Are we really that hardened by imperial arrogance, that willing to honor the Pentagon, that indifferent to the cries of children, that we would invite a warrior for Commencement? Why on earth would we want to do that, when there are so many people to choose from whose contribution to our world has been peace, or love, or conciliation?

Coffee with Alice

BY MARK LARSON

I feel that I must respond to what seems to be a growing number of articles and people decrying the horrors and evils of what is labeled "political correctness." The story goes something like this: There is this group of radical/fascist leftists in this country who have taken control of the thoughts and language of our country and are in the process of secretly manipulating our minds at the expense of freedom and democracy. This, I must say, is nothing more than a myth. How could anyone really believe this to be true after the past 12 years of Conservative control in our country? In fact, if we are interested in finding those people who are posing the greatest threat to the First Amendment and to freedom in this country we need look no further than the White House. The Republican party has consistently been a threat to these freedoms. Let me just point out two of the most blatant cases.

> In fact, if we are interested in finding those people who are posing the greatest threat to the First Amendment and freedom in this country, we need look no further than the White House.

For 12 years, the Republicans have assaulted artists' freedom of expression, through the manipulation and control of the National Endowment for the Arts. Spearheaded by Jesse Helms, but with the endorsement of the White House, they have limited the creative expression of ideas and thoughts by artists throughout our country, all in an attempt to impose an extremist conservative morality on others. The second, and maybe the more offensive case, has been that of the "gag rule." Again the Bush Administration and the conservatively controlled courts have imposed a rule with the explicit intent of controlling what a doctor can and cannot say to a patient, who by no surprise is a woman. Such a fundamental assault on the freedom of speech and the right of a woman to be fully informed about matters concerning her health so that she can make her own decision is a clear case of fascism, for it is both anti-democratic and denies the full equality of a group of people, namely women. And to make things worse, there has been an increased effort over the years by the "Justice" Department to extend the logic of "gag rule" to issues such as banning books from public libraries and other such cases. In fact, Evan Maloney's past comparison of PC to the Nazis is helpful, for one of the steps the Nazis took in gaining power was to burn all the books they disapproved of. I must wonder how far George and Jesse would go in their moral crusade! My point here is that there simply is no group of radical leftist who are in control, and that we need not search our country endlessly to find people who are a threat to the basic freedoms of our country, for they are residing in the White House itself.

But there is more to be said about the issue of the First Amendment and the freedom of speech, and I think there is an issue at stake. It should be clear that no right or freedom comes without a corresponding responsibility. For instance, the right to vote implies the responsibility of being an informed voter. When I hear people (usually from a dominant social category) arguing for their right to call another person (usually from a subdominant social category) a "girl," a "fag," or a "Jew" or other such derogatory names, I wonder whether they have forgotten the responsibility which comes along with the freedom of speech. Such callous speech seems only to have the intent of demeaning and offending another person. I would simply like to ask these people how they see their insistence on using this specific type of derogatory language as responsible use of their freedom of speech. What is the point behind your argument that makes the use of "woman" versus "girl" the focus of your argument instead of the "gag rule"? Are you trying to preserve the right to disempower people because you feel they are not equal to begin with? I simply do not see how your efforts are constructive.

I am also concerned that the discussion of politically correct language often gets so caught up in the Constitution that it avoids the more basic and human issues that are at stake. There is a movement that is encouraging us to think about the way we think about and speak to other people, but its true name is Multiculturalism. It is in the most basic sense the growing awareness that we are multicultural peoples, and that every person has the right to respect and have dignity in their personhood and cultural heritage. I consider a college-aged female a woman because I feel that she deserves the title which connotes respect and maturity. I also would call her a woman, or someone else African-American, or lesbian, or Native-American, because I respect their right to determine what they wish to be addressed as. It is a matter of respecting their dignity and full cultural personhood. That is the fundamental difference between Multiculturalism and political correctness. In fact, I think that we can consider the concern about "political correctness" as the reaction to Multiculturalism of those people who are unwilling to accept the dignity and respect which are so central to understanding Multiculturalism. Obviously we all have the freedom of speech, but we also have a responsibility to use it thoughtfully, which means thinking respectfully about how your language affects others. If you feel that you must use disrespectful language please explain to us why, or else we are left with the conclusion that it is simply because you do not respect them.

BY RICHARD SWERSKY

I don't know about you, but I was looking forward to last weekend immensely. It was supposed to be a great weekend kicking off a great semester. Valentine's Day. Parties before the game. Parties after the game. The actual game!! The freshman formal. Even the sophomore formal (did anyone go to that??). But after having the traditional "Week in Review" with my friends last Monday night, I realized that last weekend was, unfortunately, just another weekend.

It all started on Friday. This was supposed to be the kickoff to the weekend. The day of love. That special day to be spent with the one of your choice. A happy day. Yeah, right!! Actually, when I looked up the word "valentine," Webster told me "a sweetheart chosen or complimented on St. Valentine's Day; also: a greeting card sent on that day." Hey, a greeting card. I could handle that. As I walked to my mailbox on Friday, I was hoping for some type of valentine. When I opened my mailbox, I found nothing. Not even my daily newspaper! So I figured, well, it's Valentine's Day and the mail is probably slow and...wishful thinking!!! When I checked back after dinner_ nothing.

Actually, this is probably all part of a cycle that most guys are used to by now. The whole idea of sending Valentine's Day cards but not receiving any. Guys send Valentine's Day cards for a variety of reasons, but with one central theme. Guys want to let it be known which girls they are thinking about. It's as simple as that. Valentine's Day is an excuse for guys to say "Hey, I care" or "I'm interested." And some guys (being the insecure creatures that we are) would love to know that someone out there is thinking of them. And even though guys won't tell you, ladies, they take it personally when they do not receive these cards. Guys think, "Well, no girls are thinking about me this year." So next year ladies, do guys a favor and send those cards. It means a lot more to guys than you think.

Reader doubts that there is liberal bias in the media

TO THE EDITOR:

The essay by Assistant Professor Dean Baker in the February 14th issue of The Bucknellian ("Coffee With Alice") should not go unchallenged, for it has many inaccuracies, significant omissions, and a lack of intellectual integrity.

Let me start right off by saying yes, we do have a democracy, Mr. Baker, and while it's not perfect, it's the closest thing to it that humans have currently devised. And it's full of interesting surprises, as your "sure thing" media-guaranteed "winner" Bill Clinton, just demonstrated in the New Hampshire primaries.

Briefly, the Baker thesis seems to run as follows: 1) The media are controlled by rich people, and they and other rich people want to retain their current "tax advantages"; 2) Media moguls and other rich folks therefore insure "conservative" primary winners by giving them a lot of campaign money; 3) The media titans go one step further, by directing the vast band of mindless, unprofessional drones in their employment to promote the favored candidate, and ignore the others; 4) Finally, the mindless, brainwashed voters march in lock step to the voting booths and elect the pre-determined candidate. All of this is constantly accompanied by as much rich-bashing as Baker can muster; and at the end, the fore-ordained conclusion is arrived at: Democracy does not exist in America.

Only things seem not to be working out as our ivory tower academic predicted. To see why not, we must examine Mr. Baker's faulty argument, segment by segment. To add a bit of seasoning, let us first note, somewhat parenthetically, what one writer for that conservative bastion (!), the N.Y. Times, (R.W. Apple, Jr., Feb. 16 issue) had to say on much the same subject. This observer, too, seemed to see Clinton as the "probable early victor...months before any votes were counted," but for different reasons. With possibly somewhat more 'justification, this Clinton "victory" was attributed to "Candidacies hav[ing] become poll-driven and consultant-crafted...". Perhaps writer Apple was overly mesmerized by now-Senator Wofford's (surely no one's conservative candidate, Mr. Baker!) out-of-obscurity victory last fall here in Pennsylvania. In any case, his projections were no more accurate than Mr. Baker's.

Now let's look at the claim that there's a "conservative bias" in the media favoring "the rich." Surely this must be news to all those conservative commentators who have regularly, for countless years, complained of a liberal bias in the media. And indeed, one seldom sees the opposite claim, even among liberals. Mr. Baker's perceptions aside, the N.Y. Times is in fact generally regarded as a—if not "the"—stronghold of liberal thought and opinion. To suggest that the family which has long controlled this publication is in fact obsessed with little beyond promoting tax laws favoring the "rich" is patent nonsense of staggering magnitude. This must surely be news to the Times' editorialists, who have been regularly and adamantly advocating soak-the-rich tax policies at least as long as I've been reading that paper: 35 years. Or has that escaped their employers' notice all these many years?

One other timely example of which way the media bias tends to run, compliments of an essay by Dorothy Rabinowitz appearing in the February 10th issue of the Wall Street Journal, involves the Clinton sex scandals. Here, we saw the media filled with sneering and dismissive "spin control." We were told we had nothing but the words of a "cash for trash" bimbo to rely upon; and words such as "sleazy" and "tabloid" accounts were much in evidence. "Let's ignore this and get on to issues of substance" seemed to be the clear message. After all, this was a Democrat we were talking about. Yet it was not long ago that another woman had some sexually-tainted things to say about another man. Only that man was perceived as a conservative. His name was Clarence Thomas; hers was Anita Hill. Here, Ms. Rabinowitz reminds us, the press corps gave the accusing woman "near reverential sympathy," even though her recollections did not go beyond "a sexually charged atmosphere and suggestive "conversations." But, obviously, Clinton's accuser lacked "the advantage of an unpopular Supreme Court candidate as her abuser." Anyone with any further doubts as to which way the media bias in fact flows should read Ms. Rabinowitz's entire piece.

> One other timely example of which way the media bias tends to run, ...involves the Clinton sex scandal. Here we saw the media filled with sneering and dismissive "spin control." We were told we had nothing but the words of a "cash for trash" bimbo to rely upon.

Next, what about those campaign contributions (which are obviously, in any case, no guarantee of anything)? It is true that campaign money does flow rather heavily to some candidates. But what Mr. Baker doesn't care to divulge, or doesn't know, is this: the money comes from virtually all the special interest groups, not just the "rich". It also comes from well-financed labor unions, for instance. And the primary determinant of how much goes to whom often has little to do with a candidate's stated views, and a lot to do with how he or she is faring in the polls because first and foremost, these monied groups want to "go with a winner," in the hope of later having some influence on him/her.

As for those mindless, hopelessly brainwashed voters that are the endpoint of the apparent Baker thesis—the ones who aren't participating in anything resembling a democracy—we can only ask Mr. Baker to explain what just happened in New Hampshire. Evidently, Mr. Baker's ideas are more the creation of a fertile imagination, and/or a very selective eye, than anything grounded in broad truths and solid evidence.

A final word on the media "all but ignoring" those other candidates. An unscientific, casual perusal of two recent papers (USA Today, Feb. 17; and the N.Y. Times, Feb. 16) finds both of them devoting pages to full and equal coverage of all the Democratic candidates' views on all the key issues—and nothing regarding "smut". And what of that, Mr. Baker?

This letter would be incomplete without taking a closer look at the "rich" Mr. Baker loves to hate. For one thing, the truly rich, the ones who, say, might own large media firms, would be primarily interested in capital gains tax relief. Mr. Clinton, it should be noted, is only on record as favoring any kind of such relief for new businesses; not large, established ones. Again, so much for the Baker thesis.

Mr. Baker really comes into his own as a half-truth artist, though, when he discusses those "Reagan-era tax breaks" and those purportedly steep tax rate decreases. For what he obviously chooses not to mention is any of the following:

1) The Reagan "tax cuts" were followed by several massive tax increases in the 80's and since many (particularly that of 1986) were designed, very effectively I might add, to extract far more from upper-income people. For example, the '86 "decrease" took away many deductions, as well as the "capital gains exclusion," all of which hit the rich particularly hard.

2) Every drop in the nominal tax rate was accompanied by offsetting features, such that for many, the left hand gave what the right hand took away and the right hand took away more than the left gave for many or most upper-income taxpayers.

3) According to Treasury data—and these figures varied slightly from year to year—throughout much of the '80's,

a) The top 5% of U.S. earners paid 35% of all personal taxes in the U.S.;

b) The top 10% of these earners paid over half of all such taxes; and

c) The bottom half of U.S. earners paid less than 10% of all such taxes.

To put this in better perspective, anyone earning about $75,000 in 1990 was in the top 10% of all earners—a good deal less than most people would regard as "rich."

4) Additional insight is gained if one takes a look at the net gain or loss for those in the top 20% of income brackets and those in the lowest 20% after deduct-down to the 2nd floor to complete their shower. This cessation of water pressure has occurred as early as 8:15 a.m.

Seeing residents going up or down stairs in full shower gear is no longer a foreign sight in Trax. The showers on my floor have backed up 4-5 times this year, leaving several inches of water that take hours (or a plumber) to drain. Occasionally we have had the pleasure of foul-smelling black sediment from the aging pipes back up and lie stagnating on our shower floor. Fifty-plus women sharing 3 showers is less than convenient.

There is also the problem of the inconsistency in heating. Individuals on the 4th floor can only keep their room below 80° by opening their window, when at the same time I am lucky if my room reaches 70° on a day with no winds. On windy days the breeze coming through my window is enough to move my shade. Case in point, one weekend my room was cold enough to freeze a plant I had five feet away from the window. Just as when lettuce freezes, the leaves were translucent. By the end of the weekend I had developed my first and only illness of the semester, complete with fever and my first ear infection in eight years. The temperature in individual rooms on one hall varies in temperature as much as 100°.

None of what I have mentioned is life-threatening, just extremely unsanitary, unhealthy, and disruptive. As a student at an institution of higher learning, I do not expect one of my primary concerns to be whether or not I will have hot water, or be able to finish my shower without water up to my ankles, or have to leave my door open so the hot air pumped into the stairwells and hallways will reach my room.

All these conditions are especially frustrating when I can walk 100 feet from my dorm and see the enormous sums of money the University has spent to renovate a building that may hold a fifth of the number that reside in Trax. The new wallpaper and other "cosmetic" renovations to Larison are quite nice but rather hard to fathom when most campus rooms don't even have a rug on the floor.

As a student and future alumna of Bucknell University, I must seriously question the priorities this institution presents through its actions. I am left with two options as I view the conditions around myself. One, the University, through some incredible lack of contact with student life, is unaware of the prevailing conditions. Or two, the conditions are known and the decision has been made to please a select group, keep up appearances for the numerous visitors to freshman dorms, and ignore the basic needs of a rather sizable number of students. In either case, the conditions remain the same and should demand immediate action (not just attention). My experiences are limited to three dorms, yet I imagine similar conditions could be detailed by other students.

> As a student at an institution of higher learning, I do not expect one of my primary concerns to be whether or not I will have hot water, or be able to finish my shower without water up to my ankles...

I have said my piece and given description of what I have seen, but without similar outcries from my fellow Bucknellians and interest being taken by the powers-that-be, conditions can only go downhill.

Seniors reject President Sojka's proposal

TO THE EDITOR:

As members of the Class of 1992, we have been anticipating Commencement Weekend as a time to celebrate, reflect, and to say goodbye to friends and to a university which has been our home for the past four years. Yet after reading last week's article ("Commencement speaker is named over student objections"), we began to wonder just how "instrumental" the senior class is in planning its final weekend at Bucknell.

Although we can appreciate the fact that commencement, as Barbara Shailor put it, is "a university event," we do not appreciate the administration's actions of late, implying that those attending graduation are being given more respect than those graduating. It appears that naming an uncontroversial speaker, assuming he will be agreeable to the trustees and alumni, is a priority, and seriously considering the opinions of the senior class is not.

President Sojka, at last Monday's faculty meeting, emphasized the administration's desire to press forward with policies of diversity, equity and affirmative action. He also explained that during these difficult economic times, Bucknell would not change its priorities, as named above, so as to come out of the recession a stronger and more competitive university. His actions in overlooking the overwhelming student choice, Bertice Berry, belie his words. What better time to emphasize and enact those policies, by naming someone who promotes the acceptance of diversity, than during a weekend when the university and its students are celebrated?

Commencement Weekend is a chance for faculty, students and administrators to come together as one and appreciate all we have given to each other. Yet it seems that, once again, these administrators are unwilling to value the opinions of the very people without whom there would be no Bucknell.

Although we realize that this situation, at least for this year, will remain unchanged, we hope that in future years the graduating seniors will be respected enough to help make graduation "ours" and not "theirs". Perhaps then we will be able to look at our future alma mater with affection and pride as an institution in which there is an honest, open give-and-take between all who call Bucknell home.

Professor reaches enlightenment

TO THE EDITOR:

Over two months ago, in the last issue of the first semester, The Bucknellian ran an opinion piece by Evan Maloney, President of the College Republicans. The article attacked my role in the matter of the "churro" advertisement for a student project, drew an analogy between my behavior and that of Adolf Hitler, and called me a racist. I was amazed by Evan's penetrating insights into twentieth century history and into my psyche. (Never mind that I grew up in Latin America or that my mother is Latin American—it took Evan to show me that I was prejudiced.)

> ...I have decided to resign my job as a professor and try to get an internship with the College Republicans.

The future sure looks rosy for Evan. He could be a political analyst, or a psychiatrist, or maybe even a White House staffer. Perhaps he'll get a job in the State Department, where his sensitivity to cultural differences will surely make him a star diplomat. For my part, confronted with such a dazzling display of logic and such sophisticated analysis, I have decided to resign my job as a professor and try to get an internship with the College Republicans. Maybe after further enlightenment by Evan and his cronies, I'll be smart enough to get a job as an advisor to Dan Quayle!

President of '92 wants to clarify situation

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to take this opportunity to clarify a few points discussed in the article "Commencement Speaker Is Named Over Student Objections" (The Bucknellian February 14). While most of the article accurately reflected my comments to The Bucknellian, two inferences in the article call for clarification.

First, the article stated that ". . . Barbara Shailor denies claims that the administration did not consider Berry." I do not know who stated that Bertice Berry was not considered by the administration as a potential speaker. Based on the comments I gave to The Bucknellian, I clearly stated that Berry was considered by the University Commencement Committee, composed of administrators and the Senior Class officers. In fact, Berry was discussed at great length at a November meeting. Therefore, it disturbs me that this incorrect inference was communicated to Vice-President Shailor, thus placing her in the unfortunate position of having to react to a statement that I never made.

Second, the title of the article ("Commencement Speaker Is Named Over Student Objections") was completely inaccurate, as it implied that I, as the representative of the Senior Class, objected to Joseph Reed speaking at Bucknell's Commencement. When I communicated my reaction to The Bucknellian, the issue I raised was not one of Reed himself being selected, but rather the process of how Reed was selected. Unfortunately, due to President Sojka's busy travel schedule on behalf of the University, I have been unable to discuss this process and ascertain if there was any misunderstanding in our communication.

I am certain that this issue will be resolved shortly. However, at this time, I think it is important for our class to wholeheartedly welcome Mr. Reed as our Commencement speaker. As a man of stature in the United Nations, he will certainly be able to speak on important global issues in an academic year that has seen such dramatic change.

I look forward to working with you as we plan for a spectacular Commencement weekend. Thank you for your interest in this important issue.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION 92

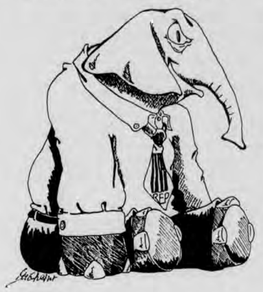
The road to the White House...

President Bush's choice for health care will affect the election

BY JOHN SHIRE

Less than a year ago, in the wake of Desert Storm, our President appeared to have the support of most citizens in the country; however with the nation's lack of economic growth, an increase in unemployment, and continued deficit spending, the popularity of the Bush administration has decreased significantly. The rising cost of health care is also among the most significant issues that will affect Bush's popularity in the 1992 Presidential campaign. It is significant, and to his favor, that the President has addressed the health care issue with serious proposals.

Second of a Series



Hands down, it is true that America can provide the best medical care available anywhere in the world. Unfortunately, health care is costly and is only available to those who can readily pay for it. The dilemma that faces our government is that lower-income and even middle-income earners are incapable of affording desperately needed medical care. Additionally, people are finding that the effects of the present health care system are forcing them into "job lock" and "jobless lock." As defined in the Washington Post, "job lock" occurs when people are afraid to change jobs for fear of losing health care benefits and "jobless lock" occurs when an unemployed worker who has a chronic medical condition, or has a family member with one, cannot find work because employers do not want their insurance rates to skyrocket. The decisions that the government makes now about health care will certainly affect where we will seek employment in the future.

Bush's five year, $100 billion plan would provide tax refunds to help low-income earners buy insurance, and it would provide tax deductions for middle-income purchasers of health policies. Individuals earning up to $60,000 and families earning up to $80,000 would get tax deductions for insurance premiums. The approach would: 1) place a limit on what a company could deduct for contributions it makes to employee health benefits, 2) tax a portion of benefits received by high-income earners, 3) charge the wealthy higher Medicare premiums, 4) provide more money for health centers and services for low-income people and 5) revise plans for group health insurance, allowing small companies to band together and form pools to get insurance more easily and less expensively.

Bush stated that his plan, "...assures that Americans will have access to basic health insurance even if they change jobs or develop serious health problems," but the flaws occur in two areas: 1) Where is the money coming from to pay for the tax deductions? and 2) If low-income earners could not afford health care initially, then why would a tax break allow them to purchase a health plan? At most, low-income earners would receive $300 more each month and that money would probably be used to pay rent or to purchase food rather than health care, unless there was a requirement that the deduction was conditional upon purchasing health care.

> The dilemma that faces our government is that lower-income and even middle-income earners are incapable of affording desperately needed medical care.

The alternative, as proposed by the Democrats, is the "play or pay" approach which would require most employers to provide private insurance for their employees and families, or to pay a tax so that the government could insure them. This would result in large public programs, rather than insurance from the private sector exclusively. Bush believes that the "pay or play" system will result in higher taxes, fewer jobs, and eventually a system under complete government control. Some, like the Bush administration, believe that a health care system controlled solely by the government would reduce the quality of the medical care available today. For others, like the Democrats, the most important issue is that health care should be available to everyone.

Both approaches have both positive and negative aspects. From the Democratic perspective, it is true that if health care falls under government control (i.e. eventual socialization), there may be less motivation for people to endure the many years of training that are required to work in the field of medicine, and the quality of medical care may decline slightly. However, anyone could receive medical care. If the government were to follow the Republican proposals, the quality of health care would remain top notch, but those who could not afford it, still would not be able to receive it.

Because the Congressional majority is in the hands of the Democratic party which has different plans than the Republicans, it does not really matter what Bush's approach to health care reform is. It would be reasonable to assume that a compromise can be reached. What is important is the fact that our President has finally acknowledged the desperate need for health care reform. He has demonstrated that he is willing to work toward meeting the desired ends of the whole nation, which can be viewed as some federal intervention in the health care arena.

Tsongas is the best of the weak Democrats

BY STEPHEN WISE

Who are these guys? Gerry Brown? Bill Clinton? Bob Kerrey? Tom Harkin? Paul Tsongas? (Yes, Tsongas with a "t.") He is an ex-senator from Massachusetts, and he is running for President. As many of you might be aware, the first primary is almost upon us, and the Democrats have the task of choosing a candidate to challenge George Bush. Instead of offering a formidable challenger, when the President is at his weakest (only 44% of Americans believe he is doing a good job), the Democrats are presenting five lackluster candidates.

Here is a quick run-down of the candidates for those of you who have not been following this tour de force.

If any of you have seen the movie JFK, you will recall that Oliver Stone has a theory that the entire "military industrial complex" plotted to assassinate John F. Kennedy. This is very implausible and borderline neurotic. Gerry Brown is a bit like Stone in that he believes there is a major conspiracy on Capitol Hill in which every candidate but himself is involved. He is determined to rid the federal government of its inefficiency and corruption. The former governor of California, nicknamed "governor Moonbeam" for his off-the-wall ideas, ran for President in 1976 and 1980, and was less than successful. He is a bit too far to the left to be taken seriously. I have this fear that if Brown were elected President, Jim Garrison would be appointed Attorney General, and everyone who ever lived in New Orleans or visited Dallas would be indicted on charges of conspiracy to kill JFK. Enough of Gerry Brown. We will discard him from further discussion of the candidates as we would David Duke if evaluating the Republicans.

Senator Tom Harkin of Iowa claims to be the "only real Democrat." Perhaps he is the only real liberal. Harkin is the self-proclaimed hero of the working class. He is pro-government, pro-heavy regulation, and favors huge public spending for domestic programs. He is also in favor of a federally funded health care system.

Most people would agree that the current health care system needs to be changed, but full public funding is not the answer—it would be more costly and less efficient. Harkin also favors huge welfare programs for the lower class and those below the poverty line, but has no macro-economic plans for economic stimulation other than to practically bar all imports of Japanese products, an action which would do more harm than good.

Senator Bob Kerrey of Nebraska is a war hero who lost part of his leg in Vietnam. He is very outspoken and plays the "angry American" role well, but is accused of lacking specifics when it comes to plans to pull the economy out of the recession. Kerrey is a strong advocate of the belief that a hefty tax cut to the middle class will bring us out of the recession (as if consumers will be fooled by this tactic and go right out and spend their new-found wealth).

Governor Bill Clinton of Arkansas is thus far the most well-known candidate, possessing a Ronald Reagan-like charisma. He has a three-point plan for every question a reporter can throw at him, but often comes across as too groomed in his responses. Even worse, he has some skeletons in his closet. Gennifer Flowers, an acquaintance of the Governor, has made claims that she had a long-lasting affair with him. Possibly facing the same demise as Gary Hart, the Democrats may have to look elsewhere.

Paul Tsongas is by far the most reclusive candidate. He does not possess the charming characteristics of Bill Clinton. In fact, he is as charismatic as lint (or Michael Dukakis, for that matter) and simply doesn't impress voters. Tsongas used to be a senator from Massachusetts but

Tom Harkin is the best choice for president

BY DEAN BAKER

Most of us know enough about politics to have rather low expectations concerning the individuals who are in a position to become the presidential nominees of the major parties. This year, however, there is one candidate who stands apart from the opportunists, liars, and crooks that ordinarily crowd the field. Unlike the other candidates, Tom Harkin can actually boast of some accomplishments other than being elected to office. He can also point to situations where he acted out of principle rather than political ambition.

> Unlike the other candidates Harkin has also been specific in saying where he will gain the needed revenue. He has called for eliminating the hundreds of billions of dollars that the U.S. spends annually to defend Europe and Japan from a now non-existent Soviet Union.

Harkin got his start in politics working as a congressional aid after graduating from law school. In this capacity he went on a fact-finding trip to Vietnam in the height of the war. While there, he came across "tiger cages" where thousands of political opponents of the South Vietnamese government were being detained and tortured. Harkin had these cages photographed and passed the story, along with the pictures, to Life magazine. The resulting publicity helped intensify and solidify opposition to the war. This action also cost Harkin his job as a congressional aid.

A couple of years later he got back to Congress, this time as an elected representative. Running as a Democrat he won in a heavily Republican district. In this role, he continued to work for more humane foreign and domestic policies. He was always an outspoken critic of U.S. aid to repressive military regimes throughout the world, and helped to call public attention to large-scale human rights abuses in places such as Chile, Guatemala, and El Salvador. Harkin was an early advocate of using multi-national institutions to resolve international conflicts, instead of always having the U.S. act unilaterally.

When Reagan took office, Harkin was one of the few members of Congress who was willing to speak up strongly against Reagan's tax breaks to the wealthy and his enormous military build-up. While Democrats like Bill Clinton were arguing that the party had to adopt many of the Republican's policies, Harkin insisted that these policies would be disastrous for the nation. He consistently opposed the Reagan-Bush era cuts in education, health care, nutrition, and housing that were used to finance the tax breaks for the rich. He was also a strong advocate of the rights of minorities, women, and the disabled. His work on behalf of the latter is particularly impressive. He was the primary sponsor of the Americans With Disabilities Act, which just went into effect. This legislation should allow millions of partially disabled individuals to gain regular employment and live independent lives.

Unlike the other Democratic candidates, Harkin has made reversing the disastrous economic policies of the Reagan-Bush years the centerpiece of his campaign. He has called for returning federal support for state and local governments back to its pre-Reagan levels. This should allow for the rebuilding of the nation's infrastructure, as well as its health care and education systems, all of which is essential to revitalize the economy. Unlike the other candidates Harkin has also been specific in saying where he will gain the needed revenue. He has called for eliminating the hundreds of billions of dollars that the U.S. spends annually to defend Europe and Japan from a now non-existent Soviet Union. He has also called for moving tax rates on the rich back toward their pre-Reagan levels.

These proposals have not made Harkin very popular with the wealthy individuals that control the media, which explains why he receives so little coverage. For example, when The New York Times, National Public Radio, and CBS News did major pieces on the Americans With Disabilities Act last month, not one of them mentioned even once that Harkin was the principle sponsor of the legislation.

The media is the biggest obstacle that Harkin will have to overcome in this election. While most polls indicate that a populist like Harkin would be the most difficult candidate for Bush to defeat, the media has been absolutely shameless in its effort to denegrate Harkin's candidacy. The media have continually treated his platforms with tones expressing skepticism, if not outright contempt, even though they are far more coherent than those of any of his Democratic contenders. They have ignored or trivialized his landslide victory in his home state of Iowa last week, and instead decided that his fourth place showing in the much smaller state of New Hampshire is of infinitely greater significance. In fact, many commentators have already claimed that Harkin is out of contention because of the decision of barely 100,000 voters in New Hampshire. This is at a time when Harkin has four times as many delegates as his nearest rival and significant campaign organizations in every major state in the country.

With some determined effort and a bit of luck we may actually be able to thwart the media's plans. There is an active Harkin group in Lewisburg which will be preparing for the primary in Pennsylvania in April, as well as sending people to help out in primaries elsewhere. So, if you're one of those old-fashioned sorts who believes that voters should have something to do with who holds office and are interested in the Harkin campaign, please join us.

ing the average taxes paid (state and federal), and adding back all government benefits received. It turns out that the richest 20% of all households are "in the hole" for an average of $22,000, while the poorest 20% are ahead by an average of $8,000.

This data generally strikes most people as indicative of a rather progressive tax system. Which is doubtless why those of Dean Baker's persuasion prefer not to cite them; indeed, they prefer to speak only of an entirely misleading drop in nominal tax rates, refer to tax decreases, but never increases, and so on. Most of these people have graduate degrees in specious argumentation. You might be less inclined to agree with them, you see, were you told the whole story.

In sum, I submit that we do have a reasonably functioning democracy for the most part; our elections are neither pre-determined by the rich, nor a "joke." If there is a media bias it is most certainly a liberal one. Neither journalists nor voters are mindless pawns. Media owners are hardly focused on virtually nothing beyond favorable tax laws; the "rich" do indeed pay very progressive taxes (does anyone recall that when Reagan first proposed those "cuts", the very same folks who'd told us for years that the "rich pay no taxes!" now suddenly were screaming that the "cuts will favor the rich!" Ahem....); and a case may be made that some academics may only be very tenuously connected to the real world. Indeed, the Baker thesis reminds me of nothing so much as that old aphorism: Better to remain silent and be thought possibly a fool, than open one's mouth and remove all doubt.

Finally, we do not know where Mr. Baker studied economics, but we will concede that he presents a very strong prima facie case for a full tuition refund.

What's wrong with ethnocentrism?

BY DAVID ROYSE JOE

Since I arrived here, people have warned me of the pitfalls of ethnocentrism. Professors have started semesters this way and authors have stated this position in their introductions. As a political science major, this subject has arisen more times than I like to remember. The argument always follows along these lines: America does not have a superior culture, nor does any other country have an inferior one. What we Americans see as unusual is merely the norm for someone else, and these differences in lifestyles, striking as they may be, do not justify our thinking that they would be better if they were more like us. Now I will not say that ethnocentrism is exactly like patriotism, but it sure is close. I have only the utmost admiration and devotion for America. I hold it in esteem far beyond that of any other country and consider myself very patriotic. I was taught to love this country from kindergarten through high school, as most of us were. Now that I am in college I keep hearing that perhaps I love America too much. In my opinion, that is far better than not enough. I do feel that we live in the best country. If you love something, it is only natural to favor it and regard it more highly than others. I have no problem with other people loving their country more than they love America. The world would be a better place if people were more devoted to their own countries and stopped trying to undermine other's confidence in their home as many self-proclaimed intellectuals are doing here.

I am also not convinced that just because I know America is the greatest country, I am somehow hindered from learning about and appreciating other countries and their cultures. I feel that overall, Texas is our nation's greatest state, yet I appreciate New York's international dimension, Montana's beautiful scenery, and Pennsylvania's fine schools. Countries and cultures are no different. So if you were considering calling me ethnocentric, please refrain because I already know I am, and I won't call you unpatriotic, because you already know you are.

From Friday, the weekend did not get any better. After arriving about an hour early to find a seat, my friends and I were all set to go crazy at the big game. The game that would virtually clinch the Patriot League title. The game that would surely break the Davis Gym attendance record. The game of the semester. But just like on Valentine's Day, many were let down. Bucknellians walked away from the gym that night a dejected group (but we all know that, come the Patriot League tournament, the Breakin' Bison will be back on track).

Anyway, the social scene after the game was just like any other weekend. You pre-party in your room and get a cool buzz. Then off to the fraternities where you lose your buzz and suddenly realize that you are bored. Weekend after weekend after weekend. I mean, whatever happened to dating on weekends? You know, dating?? No?? Let me refresh your memory.

Remember in high school when you would actually ask people out on dates? All your friends would encourage you to ask someone out. And then when you finally got up enough courage to do it, you were shocked when that person actually said yes. And then you would spend the whole week worrying about the date. What are we going to talk about? Where should we go? What should I wear? How should I act? And then driving over to that person's house and meeting the parents (come to think of it, that was my favorite part). After comes the actual date, which usually turns out fine. The ending is the tricky part. Should I kiss him/her good night? Should I invite him/her in? Should I ask him/her out again? Don't you miss worrying about all these things? Instead, on weekends at Bucknell, we ask: Should I get drunk or buzzed? Should we play circle of death or thumper (now there is a dumb game)? Should we go to Perkins or Hardee's?

Oh well, so much for the big weekend. Or any weekend for that matter. I mean, they're all the same, aren't they?? Whatever the case may be, I wish you all the best in having good weekends in the future. But at Bucknell, you must make a good weekend because if you just go with the flow, before you know it, it will be Monday morning.

What is at the forefront of everyone's mind these days is the economy. Why have we been in a recession for three quarters? Why are more than 7% of Americans unemployed? Why won't the Japanese buy our products? Most people tend to take the easy way out on this last question: blame the president. Sure, George has been overseas too long; he has forgotten about America. He has let us down; now let us lynch him. However, in the United States, the federal government is not heavily involved in the economy. Big business and industry are mostly responsible for economic growth, and they are the ones who have let us down.

The recession is not due to the four years Bush has been in office. It was caused almost wholly by the greed of the 1980's, which has finally caught up with us. When Ronald Reagan deregulated most industries, he gave them the freedom to "do business their way." When American businesses were given tax breaks and the lure of low interest rates, they did not modernize plants or expand infrastructure. They bought Michael Milken's junk bonds and destroyed each other through leveraged buy-outs. American businesses did not put money into research of new technology in order to make production more efficient. The Japanese did. That is why they are the world's economic leader, not because of their trade restrictions. The country has forced George Bush to go to Japan and essentially beg them to buy our products. We are the laughing stock of all the industrialized countries. Why should the Japanese buy our products? Theirs are better.

Many of the Democratic candidates are trying to convince voters that a hard-line approach with the Japanese is necessary. The United States, however, is not a pawn in the trade game like the politicians would like the public to think. Since 1985, exports have nearly doubled from $219 billion to $422 billion in 1991. House Majority Leader Richard Gephardt has proposed a bill that would require the Japanese to eliminate their trade surplus with the United States. What Gephardt fails to realize is that with the present global economy, some countries will always have a surplus over others. If we impose restrictions on the Japanese, who says the Europeans will not want to impose them on us? We have a trade surplus with most of those countries.

Strict rules and heavy regulation are not the answer. The problem with the economy is a long-term one that does not require a quick fix. A quick fix, unfortunately, is what most Democratic candidates, in order to appease angry Americans, are proposing.

Bill Clinton and Bob Kerrey are cut out of much the same cloth. They both favor tax cuts for the middle class. They want to spend their way out of the recession. Kerrey also wants to get tough on the Japanese and start putting embargoes on their goods. Unfortunately, they do not see the real problem with the economy. A tax cut will not bring us out of the recession, and an isolationist viewpoint on trade will only shrink the world market upon which the United States is dependent.

Paul Tsongas is the only one of the candidates who really understands the nature of the economic problem. He does not favor a tax cut for the middle class. He wants to put money towards the infrastructure of the country as well as towards education. He wants to spend money where the country needs it, in research and development. American industry needs to become more competitive on a global scale. Tsongas does not believe in a protectionist economy. He realizes this will only shrink our markets. The process of economic recovery will take time and Paul Tsongas is aware of this reality. He even has an 86-page plan for economic recovery.

Unfortunately, if you have ever listened to Paul Tsongas, he is not the most enthralling orator. Americans tend to elect charismatic leaders, whether they are competent or not (Ronald Reagan is a textbook example). If, however, on election day, voters went with the candidate with the best ideas, they would see Tsongas, and a brighter future.

Professor John Wheatcroft's fourth novel, Killer Swan, chronicles the turbulent marriage of Nita and Davis Thornton.

Bucknellian Staff Writer

John Wheatcroft, director of the Stadler Center for Poetry at Bucknell Hall and professor of English, has recently published his fourth novel. Titled Killer Swan, the novel chronicles what may be the final vacation of the Reverend P. Davis Thornton and his wife Nita, a Pennsylvania couple whose 25-year marriage is rapidly approaching its end. The events that Davis and Nita encounter in the British locales of London, Salisbury, and Yorkshire will determine the course that their rocky marriage will take.

Wheatcroft has penned several books, including novels and volumes of poetry, short stories, and plays. "Circumstance determines what I am working on at a specific time," Wheatcroft stated. "I can prepare to write a novel while working on other projects, but actually writing a novel is an uninterrupted process."

The first draft of Killer Swan was completed during a four-week period at Yaddo, an conference in Saratoga Springs, New York. Wheatcroft said that when he does not have an extended period of uninterrupted time, he is more apt to write poetry.

Wheatcroft began teaching at Bucknell in 1949 and returned to the University in 1952 after a brief absence. The author has also taught at Rutgers University and the University of Kansas. Although most of his undergraduate studies were completed at Temple University, Wheatcroft studied as an undergraduate student at Bucknell for a year after World War II before continuing his studies as a graduate student at Rutgers.

As a youngster, Wheatcroft enjoyed writing. However, the author explained that when he entered the Navy at age 17, he was "stunned out of writing." Wheatcroft did not write at all during his three-year involvement in World War II, nor did he write for the few years immediately following his stint in the Navy.

He has never written a war novel but is quick to acknowledge that his experiences during the war creep into his works. Wheatcroft's collection of short stories, titled Slow Exposures, contains two stories about war. "I write for the sake of writing," Wheatcroft stated, adding that he is always working on some kind of project. "I'm encouraged to go on by new opportunities to do better."

Morris travels as a one-man blues band

BY CARL WALKER

It is so easy, in an age of computers and synthesizers, for today's musicians to become a one-man band. All you would have to do is load a night's performance into a computer, and then play along with the prefabricated rhythm section. But, in the transformation from human to computer, the magic of music is lost. Though the music can sound rich, and, though the music is performed with a digital precision, it comes across as sterile and uninspiring.

But look at bluesman Roger Morris, a keyboard player who plays one of those newfangled gadgets that does anything for you. Morris exploits the fat sound and the improved logistics (try fitting a grand piano in the back of your Escort) of this instrument. However, the integrity and the emotion of the blues rang throughout his performance. How did only one man do this?

For Morris, that's easy. With his own two hands, and a little help from his vocal cords, he delivered the performance of a quartet. With his shuffly-rythms and his pumping bass lines, I was left looking for the drummer and bassist.

Morris's performance Sunday night was almost a history of the blues. His selections ranged from a Fats Domino-like cover of the Ry Cooder tune "You Might Have Made Your Move Too Soon" to an Oscar Peterson-ish Delta John cover called "If I Don't Do It (Somebody Else Will)". He entertained the crowd with a little comedy too; in an original composition, "If Things Could Talk", he facetiously poked fun at those blues songs that facetiously poke fun at life.

Morris is a fantastic keyboard player, and he gave nicely improvised solos in each of his songs that were fresh and tasteful. He is a technical wizard, not in the modern sense, but in the old-fashioned, hard-working way.

Bertrand Library offers a host of new exhibits

BY BETH B. MORILLA

The Ellen Clarke Bertrand Library is host to several new exhibits this semester. Currently on display in the Main Lobby is The Lesher's Mission in China. This exhibit showcases the medical equipment and collected art objects of Doctors Charles B. and Mabel G. Lesher, members of the Bucknell Class of 1901. The Leshers were stationed in China from 1910 to 1927. Their collection will be on display until Apr. 16.

On display in the periodical section of Level Two is a poster series featuring the various artworks of Klaus Staeck, a German graphic artist. These posters are primarily concerned with environmental issues. The poster collection is on loan by Assistant Professors of Modern Languages Helen G. and Peter Morris-Keitel. Staeck's series will be exhibited for the remainder of the spring semester.

"A Child's World" will be shown to the public until Mar. 6 on Lower Level One. This exhibit contains antique games from the collection of Lindy Van Fleet of Mifflinburg. Also featured are classic editions of children's literature from the Bertrand Library's Special Collections.

Coming to the Bertrand Library from Mar. 16 to May 5 is The Life and Art of Dante Gabriel Rossetti. The exhibit will be on display on Lower Level One and is presented in conjunction with Lafayette Butler's lecture "Pre-Raphaelite Pleasures: Researching and Writing About Rossetti." This lecture will be given on April 9. In addition to conducting the lecture, Butler has donated a portion of his personal book collection to the Bertrand Library.

What the Health is Going On?

The Dangers of Passive Smoking

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI

For many years smoking was thought of as glamorous. But as time has gone on and scientists have begun to question the safety of smoking, studies have proven that smoking is indeed hazardous to the health of smokers.

However, smoking not only directly affects those who smoke, but it also affects the people around them. Non-smokers have long complained that smoke is irritating, without being aware of the physical harm. Acute symptoms reported by non-smokers include irritation of the eyes, nose, and throat. Non-smokers with conditions such as asthma or emphysema experience even greater sensitivity.

Such acute symptoms may be the result of only one exposure to ETS (Environmental Tobacco Smoke). What is more important to examine is the chronic, or, long-term symptoms. While most studies are controversial, scientists will agree that non-smokers exposed to long-term ETS do run a higher risk of lung cancer. Both the U.S. Surgeon General and the National Research Council of the National Academy of Sciences agree that children whose parents smoke show an increased frequency of ear infections, acute respiratory and early infancy respiratory infections, as well as increased coughing, wheezing, and sputum (mucus) production.

Due to difficulty in obtaining accurate measurements of the volume of ETS, scientists must look at trends, and not at concrete figures. Often, study results are interpreted in combination, allowing the scientist to draw an overall conclusion, while no one particular study solidly reflects such a conclusion.

However, if there is indeed physical harm from ETS for non-smokers, they want to know about it. While cigarette smoke does contain carcinogens and harmful particulate matter, the question is whether or not the concentrations in the ETS are high enough to actually cause lung cancer and the conditions smokers experience themselves. Cigarettes left burning in an ashtray emit smoke with much higher concentrations of harmful particulate matter than those that are smoked.

Although many laws have been passed prohibiting smoking in public places, laws are nil in private homes. Because of this, children sometimes become involuntary smokers. It has been suggested that children be educated about the harms of passive smoking, so they will know enough to leave smoky environments.

Perhaps the most detrimental case of passive smoking occurs when a pregnant mother smokes. One of the results of passive smoke in the fetus is a tendency of low birth weight. The Surgeon General has even alerted expectant women of the possible repercussions of their smoking with warnings on cigarette cartons and advertisements.

While passive smoking is a concern among non-smokers, it must be kept in perspective. Due to conflicting studies, it is difficult to determine the truth. However, new tests are being designed so that researchers can get a realistic measurement of ETS and its effects.

The Collegiate Perspective (and other fairy tales)

"Bathroom Talk"

Well, not exactly "bathroom talk," per se, but rather talk about bathrooms. These little ambiguities have to be cleared up quickly when you know your mother reads the paper, you see.

•Amongst other milestone achievements, our race has sent people to the moon, developed artificial heart implants, and perfected those little plastic daisies that wiggle around when you talk to them. So why can't we come up with an effective method of searching for an unoccupied shower stall without embarrassing the cholesterol out of ourselves? You'd think that the film developing room technology of litup "In Use" signs would have trickled down by now. Sheesh.

•Forget about Salman Rushdie. Some radical religious faction should target the loser who came up with automatic shut-off faucets. This guy must have thought that people could wash their faces with one hand, I suppose. Basically, trying to get wet under one of these things before the water stops is about as easy as turning off your light at night, leaping across the room, and sliding under the bed covers before everything goes dark. Kinda difficult to do. I think that this was the device that Big Brother used to break Winston Smith's will in 1984 .

•Here's a stumper for Miss Manners: What is the proper etiquette for what to do when you walk in on someone popping zits in front of the bathroom mirror? Do you do that Good Samaritan thing, and help the person play it off, or do you lay into the guy because he's bursting with flavor? I guess that this is what you come to college for... to learn the answers to the great philosophical questions of our age.

•Then there are those people that you find talking to themselves when they think they're alone in the bathroom. Eek.

•Why is it that your shower water becomes scalding hot whenever someone flushes a toilet? (Right at this moment, some engineering major is reading the paper in the L.C. and jumping up and down. "I know why! I know why!")

•Hearing a lone voice laughing uncontrollablyin the bathroom: Be afraid. Be very afraid.

•How familiar is this scenario: You're sitting in a toilet stall going about your business and talking to a friend, who is at the sink. Unbeknownst to you, he walks out to go back to his room, leaving you to unwittingly carry on your oration with the towel dispenser. Which, of course, makes you one of those goobers who talks to himself.

•Why don't dorm bathrooms have numbers, while all other rooms do? This is what sociologists would refer to as "institutional discrimination." To the layperson, however, this same phenomenon would be referred to as "inane space-filler."

•It's amazing to me that the producers of the Friday the 13th movies haven't employed the scare tactic of dropping a loaded soap dish in the shower. Man, those things sound like someone's snapping a bullwhip right behind you. Then, of course, you check to see if the case is cracked, which it inevitably is, and then you have to buy a new one. It's just like they say— you drop your soap dish, buy a new one, and then you die. Life stinks.

Or... Or not. Sorry.

•Just by a show of hands (that's a dumb directive... like people would use their feet), how many people out there have tried to look in one of those clouded bathroom windows from outside a dorm, even though you know that it's impossible to see anything through it? Okay, put 'em down, put 'em down.

You guys disgust me.

Next time: We will be celebrating that extra 29th day that comes in February every leap year. As a result, I'll be taking the week off.

Editor's Note: The views expressed in this column are in no way representative of* The Bucknellian editorial board.

Dear Faculty, Students, and Countrymen,

Here at the editorial board of The Bucknellian, we do indeed recognize the existence of smaller, more specialized on-campus publications. And we sincerely applaud their feeble little efforts.

In fact, we feel it is our paternal duty to help nurture these flowering buds of journalism...to let people know that after they have completed a thorough, article-by-article scrutiny of our own newspaper, there are still other periodicals which they can feel free to peruse at their leisure...or leave on their toilet, just in case. However, we at The Bucknellian must not be content with our superiority. We have an obligation to make these "newspaperettes" feel warm and welcome at Bucknell, to listen to their suggestions and to note their comments. Well, we have done just this. Yes, we have. We have allotted this week's ample column to serve as a type of suggestion box, giving voice to all those other publications. Well, without any further bravado, here they are, printed exactly as they were written.

The Bucknellian:* What A Swell Investment Of Time!
By Bucknell World

Students, Faculty, and Alumni alike should all applaud the diverse treasure-trove of top-notch quality that is minted every Friday and met with the same enthusiasm as a big, fat paycheck. Of course we're talking about The Bucknellian. The pure beauty of this splendid and diverse paper is enough to make you want to sit down and send seven thousand dollars to good old Bucknell University, isn't it? Isn't it? We thought so. It would be a shame to tell those diligent and diverse students making up the editorial board that their beloved paper is being cancelled due to lack of funds. Wouldn't it? Ha. Ha. Enough said. Anyway, the one quality of The most heartily, alluded to above, is the diversity of the staff. This school sure has come a long, long way. To give you an example, working together at The Bucknellian are:

A. Students who have parents that give our school millions of dollars a year.

B. Students who have parents that don't give our school millions of dollars a year.

Wow! And they both play and plan together! Side by side!! Sometimes even using the SAME COMPUTER!!! So please send in your checks, or God will take them home.

The Bitemynailian:* A Nasty Non P.C. Habit
By The University Messenger

We think The BeltBuckleian stinks worse than stale beer and mucus mixed together in a toilet stopped up by the noisome movement of a large, hirsute man. The content of The Burninhellian lacks that cynicism and laconic irreverence which we inject into the veins our own publication with the excoriating cut of a used and rusty hypodermic syringe wielded by a barely audible dying cow of a junkie named Ferdinand. The humor in The Boyyousmellian is hackneyed and cliche and lacking in originality. They need top ten lists, or quotes of the week, or articles about beer. Then they could be original. Also, when they do happen to foment a halfway decent article they only print it just ONCE, rather than TWO or even THREE times in the same issue like they should. Also, when they do happen to foment a halfway decent article they only print it just ONCE, rather than TWO or even THREE times in the same issue like they should. In short we think The Butterbrickellian is P.C: Pretty Crappy.

The Bucknellian:
Moving Beyond A Psychoanalytically Diplomatic Approach to Calumniating A Tyrannical and Oppressive Paper.
By The Catalyst Collective

Although we admire the staff's admirable ability to meet rigorous deadlines, a fascinating but profoundly disturbing trend has manifested itself into the deepest and most deconstructionalized paradigms of their paper's core. We are, of course, talking about The Bucknellian's redundancy, of course. Week after week, it is the same mindless, day-glow dribble. If they truly wish to be truly progressive, they must immediately destroy all their -isms, immediately. They must carefully take great pains to carefully eradicate their latent racism, sexism, plagiarism, and reduncyism, and moderate their unique voice into a tone that can be understood by all members of a "discursive community" if you will. This fact has become profoundly obvious to we, The Catalyst Collective. Indeed, the only way to truly 'Catalyst' social change is through voices and writing style that are stripped of self-applauding and narcissistic eruditeness, and quickly and forcefully get directly to the point. Thank you for your concern, and good luck in your arduous endeavor which will, in fact, be difficult.

Bucknell welcomes cultural diversity

International Students unite at BU

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Let's face it...adjusting to life at Bucknell is rarely easy. Even if you came from a high school in which you had a multitude of friends and considered yourself a fairly affable person, you have to start from scratch at college. This, as we all know, can be quite a feat to accomplish. The common scenario can become even worse if you have spent much or all of your life outside the U.S. Most of us could never imagine what it would be like to spend all or most of our collegiate days in a country so different from our own. In response to this curiosity, an interview was conducted to assess the attitudes of some of the international students on campus.

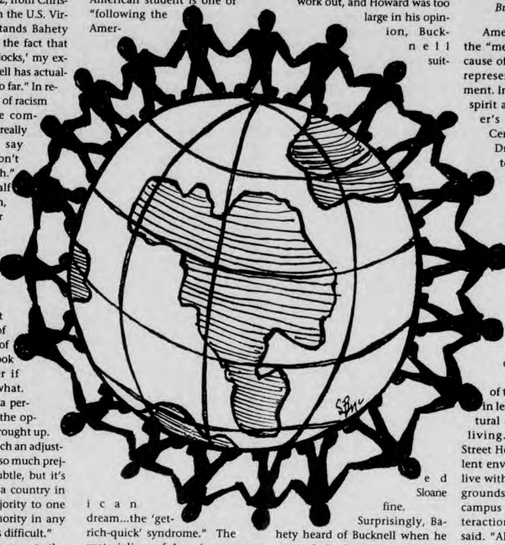
For these students the real culture shock set in when they realized how rural central Pennsylvania is. Thus, the grievances of these international students are quite similar to those of many students who come to Bucknell— the size of Lewisburg and all of the inconveniences which accompany it. Sanjeev Bahety, a first-year graduate student from Hyderabad, India (with a population of four million people), is still trying to get over the shock of being in such a small town. He feels that, "although it's good to be at Bucknell, it's a small place and there's nothing much to do except your academic work. I'm used to life in the big city." He also feels that social life at Bucknell is limited for a graduate student because, "Bucknell undergraduates think that we are more serious minded...only into research." Despite diligent work toward a master's degree in civil engineering, Bahety does not agree with this image of the graduate student.

Yancey Sloane '92, from Christiansted, St. Croix, in the U.S. Virgin Islands, understands Bahety exactly. "Except for the fact that we're in the 'boon docks,' my experience with Bucknell has actually been pretty good so far." In regards to the problem of racism on campus, Sloane commented, "If it's ever really blatant, then I'll say something, but I don't really see it that much."

Having spent half of her life in Kingston, Jamaica, and the later half in Brooklyn, New York, Kari-Ann Kerr '93 has a particularly interesting perspective of Bucknell. She said, "In Jamaica, there wasn't prejudice in terms of skin color, but rather of class. Here, people look at you and wonder if you're Chinese or what. They look at you as a person second. This is the opposite of how I was brought up. Freshman year was such an adjustment because there's so much prejudice. I mean, it's subtle, but it's there. Moving from a country in which you are a majority to one where you are a minority in any kind of atmosphere is difficult."

Dan Kim '93, who came to the U.S. from Jeon Ju, South Korea feels that he was able to transcend this difficulty. He said, "In my case, it's a little bit different. I became involved with InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, so I did not have much of a problem in making friends. I got to know them closely. So now, if someone asks me if it was a wise choice to come to Bucknell, I would definitely say yes. The number one reason is the support from Christian fellowship."

Kim expressed an interesting comparison between American students and South Korean students. His "impression" of the typical American student is one of "following the American dream...the 'get-rich-quick' syndrome." The materialism of American young people was something which struck Kim immediately in adjusting to this way of life.



For this particular group of international students, Bucknell was not only challenging on a social scale, but academically as well. Although it was difficult for the students to compare the caliber of the Bucknell curriculum with those of universities abroad, it was Bucknell's superior reputation which brought them here in the first place. For Sloane, the choices were narrowed down to Princeton University, Howard University, and Bucknell. Since Princeton did not work out, and Howard was too large in his opinion, Bucknell suited Sloane fine.

Surprisingly, Bahety heard of Bucknell when he was in India from Peterson's Guide to Colleges. He was also aided in the application process by the U.S. Educational Foundation in India. The process of applying to colleges was also made easier for Kerr, who had been living in New York since she nine, and Kim, who was helped by a guidance counselor in his New York high school.

Asres emphasizes community living

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

America was once referred to as the "melting pot" of nations because of the vast array of cultures represented under one government. In keeping with the original spirit and intent of this foreigner's land, the Multicultural Center, under the direction of Dr. Alem Asres, is dedicated to promoting and developing a culturally diversified community on campus.

Asres believes his main responsibility as director of the center is to "sensitize" the campus. His purpose is not only to increase the awareness of cultural differences on campus, but also to make the different students realize how much they have in common.

According to Asres, one of the most important factors in learning about the multicultural experience is community living. Edwards and Seventh Street Houses, he noted, are excellent environments for learning to live with people of different backgrounds. "I wish we had all the campus mixed. It is a positive interaction between students," he said. "Also, you learn about your own culture and its plusses and minuses."

Asres noted several differences between his previous experience as assistant director for the Center for Minorities at the University of Maryland at College Park and his new position at Bucknell. The percentage of minority students at Maryland is somewhat higher than Bucknell, generally because of the difference in the size of the schools. Because Bucknell does indeed have a smaller minority population, Asres feels that multicultural harmony and understanding are better.

Asres' plans for the Multicultural Center at Bucknell are numerous. His projects include revitalizing the Giving Voice journal and organizing an intercultural exchange program for faculty, staff, and students. This type of community-building activity, he says, will offer a free exchange of experiences.

The Multicultural Center focuses on three service areas to provide students with a broad spectrum of opportunities. The center promotes academic excellence by working in cooperation with campus-wide programs that provide culturally relevant information and academic support. It solicits personal services through counseling and advising on issues related to culture, race, and ethnicity. Social development is another aspect of multicultural concern. The center advises student organizations and special interest houses on social, cultural, and organizational issues.

Alem Asres came to Bucknell last semester and plans to organize an intercultural exchange program for the campus.

This year's Breakin' Bison squad, locked in a fierce battle for the Patriot League regular season title, has many on campus (especially seniors) recalling the last Bison league title. In 1989 the Bison defeated Lafayette to win their last East Coast Conference tournament and grab the coveted invite to the NCAA tournament, where they fell to Syracuse in Dallas, Texas.

Women's hoops split two close league games

Bison fall short in upset bid against Fordham; knock off Colgate to move into a fifth-place tie in the Patriot League

The Bucknell women's basketball team split two Patriot League games last week, losing to Fordham, 80-70 and beating Colgate, 83-78. En route to its victory over Colgate, Bucknell witnessed tri-captain Kirsten Ellison '92 surpass the 1,000-point milestone. The senior has now racked up 1,008 points in her four-year stint at Bucknell. In addition to that honor, Ellison has also become Bucknell's all-time leading rebounder, with 857 at last count.

Last Saturday, the Bison hoped for an upset similar to the one against Holy Cross, but were stopped in their tracks by Fordham, the number-one team in the Patriot League. The Bison and the Rams played an evenly matched game for the first half and much of the second, with both teams fighting hard for the win. Unfortunately for the Bucknell women, their opponents went on a late-game run to take the victory.

According to tri-captain Joy Sandler '92, "We learned in our first game against them that we match up well with Fordham man-for-man, more so than with Holy Cross or Lafayette due to their size. We'll be confident if we end up facing Fordham in the tournament, especially since we were never outplayed in our second game against them."

The Fordham game marked the eleventh double-double of the season for Juliet McGee '93, who scored 13 points and grabbed ten rebounds. The junior has scored in double figures in 19 of the team's 23 games and has played in a starting position in all 23.

Carolyn Mangan '95 brings the ball up court against Colgate last Wednesday. She chipped in 12 points in helping the Bison defeat the Red Raiders. Mangan has stepped in for the injured Kelly Dee '94 to pick up some scoring slack in Bucknell's backcourt.

With last Wednesday's victory over Colgate, the Bison notched their fifth win of the season. Although they were beaten badly by Colgate on its home court earlier in the season, the Bucknell women entered Wednesday's contest with the confidence that they needed to play well and win. "We knew that Colgate was a team that we're capable of beating. Our game plan was to stop their penetration, which I think we did fairly well—a majority of their points came from outside shots," said Sandler.

The game began with an early six-point Colgate lead before the Bison would go on an impressive 13-point scoring run led by the offensive efforts of McGee, tri-captain Lisa Fink '93, and Ellison. McGee began the surge by sinking a jumpshot off of an offensive rebound, followed by a Fink 12-footer. Fink, who played an excellent game on both the offensive and the defensive ends, then picked off the ball from a Colgate player and went on to score on a driving lay-up. To add to the play, the junior also drew a foul and converted on the free throw. Ellison next added four points to the effort with two consecutive lay-ups, before Fink would end the run by dishing off a pass to McGee, who scored an easy lay-in.

Following a three-point basket by Colgate's Patty Dandrea, who netted an impressive six treys on the night, Bucknell went on another run, outscoring its opponent 8-0 in the next two and a half minutes. Scoring then began to even out, as Colgate got out of its offensive rut. The Red Raiders cut the Bison lead to four when Bucknell took its first time-out.

Upon returning to the court, the two teams primarily traded baskets for the remaining three minutes of play. With 18 seconds left on the clock, Heather Ross '94 sunk a shot from just inside the three-point line to render the score 47-39 at the half-time buzzer.

For the first 12 minutes of the second half, Bucknell overwhelmingly dominated the action on the court. The Bison immediately opened their lead to 12, not slowing in momentum until more than half of the period was played. Bucknell's offense during that time was dominated by the scoring efforts of Fink and Sandler. Guards Fink and Carolyn Mangan '95 also dished off some beautiful passes inside to allow McGee, Ellison, and Monica Nawarskas '94 to get in on the scoring action.

As the half wore on, things began to go right for Colgate, who slowly chipped away at the Bison lead during the remaining eight minutes of play. The Colgate women cut their opponent's lead to five behind the scoring prowess of Dandrea and Shelly Collier, who accounted for all 12 of Colgate's points between the eight and the three-minute marks.

The rival teams again traded baskets as well as fouls during the final minutes of play, and the game ended with a five-point victory for Bucknell.

Fink was Bucknell's leading scorer against Colgate, tallying a career-high 21 points. The point-guard also handed out an outstanding eight assists. Also reaching double figures were: Ellison with 17, Sandler with 15, Mangan with 12, and McGee with 11. In addition to their offensive contributions, Ellison and McGee each pulled down nine rebounds, while Sandler added seven. Ellison also reached in for four steals during the game, and Mangan, who has been playing tough for the Bison as of late, passed off three assists.

The Bucknell women face Patriot League rival Lehigh tomorrow at Stabler Arena, site of the upcoming Patriot League Championship Tournament. In the team's first meeting in January, Bucknell came away with a win, its third of the season. Fink believes that "Since we won our last game and upset Holy Cross, we've been gaining much-needed confidence, and the team is looking forward to meeting Lehigh on its home court."

Ski team heads off to regionals

After a strong tune-up last weekend, the men and women shoot for nationals

BY MARK ABRAHAMSEN AND ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

It's all come down to this. The Bucknell ski team travels south today to Silver Creek, WV for the 1992 Mid-Atlantic Regional Championships this weekend, with a berth to the National Collegiate Ski Association (NCSA) National Championships on the line. Both the men's and women's teams will need to race error-free in order to qualify for the pinnacle in collegiate ski racing.

Two intangibles in the Bison's favor as they ready themselves for the season's most important race are that everyone is healthy and on a roll, with momentum picked up from last week, when the teams concluded their regular seasons in Seven Springs.

"I'm so proud of everyone on the team," said women's team captain Sarah McCahill '93. "Even though the 'A' team is in the spotlight, we couldn't have done it without our 'B' team."

The men's team was successful in the treacherous conditions last weekend, as it posted a second-place finish in Saturday's giant slalom and a victory in Sunday's slalom. There were ten schools represented at each race.

Saturday's weather was better suited for football than skiing, as a driving rainstorm during the morning run hindered many competitors and provided extremely soft snow. The inclement weather made for a slow course with large ruts, providing more of a test of survival for the racers.

Leading the men's team again was Chris Williamson '95, who overcame the elements by skiing to an individual second-place finish (out of 48 competitors). Williamson, who was in sixth after the first run, had a remarkable second run to overtake four rivals and place second overall.

Bucknell showcased its depth by placing four skiers in the top ten, as Mark Ralston '94, captain Mark Abrahamsen '93, and Carver Sinn '95 finished eighth, ninth, and tenth, respectively. Ralston's eighth-place finish was the best in his young career of racing. Abrahamsen, who had trouble in the first run (placing twelfth), "let the skis go" with the third-fastest clocking in the afternoon run. The move enabled him to move up to ninth overall for the day.

The consistent skiing afforded the Bison a second-place team finish, just a combined 1.74 seconds behind archrival University of Pennsylvania. Penn State placed third for the day, 2.40 seconds behind Bucknell.

Sunday's slalom had an inauspicious beginning for the Bucknell men, as Williamson's ski binding pre-released on just the third gate of the morning run, ending his day of racing while damaging Bucknell's hopes for a strong team finish.

But the rest of the Bison were undaunted with the most technically difficult slalom of the season, as Sinn, Abrahamsen, and Scott Perricelli '94 each raced to personal-best finishes in the tough conditions. Among a field of 45 racers, Sinn negotiated two strong runs for a second-place finish. Abrahamsen placed third, and Perricelli finished seventh.

With three racers in the top seven, Bucknell won the race going away by a margin of 31.15 seconds over West Chester. West Virginia placed third, while UPenn, Penn State, and Navy all had a difficult time with the conditions and did not mount a significant challenge. The 31-second victory was easily the largest margin of the year for any victorious team.

The women also registered a strong weekend in preparation for the regional competition. In Saturday's giant slalom, the women's team placed second in the eight-school field, finishing a scant 0.44 seconds behind champion Penn State for the team title. West Virginia and UPenn placed third and fourth, respectively.

Adrienne Siefert '95 continued to pace Bucknell, leading the Bison by placing second of 23 women. McCahill had two mistake-free runs to place fifth overall, while Hilary Rosen '95 finished eleventh.

The women's team found success in Sunday's slalom as well, placing second again as a team with Bucknell's threesome all placing in the top ten. Siefert repeated her second-place performance in leading Bucknell. It was the freshman's third second-place finish this season, and her sixth top-three finish in ten events.

Commentary ...

The "other" basketball team deserves respect, too

By now almost all of you have been a part of, or at least heard about the massive crowds at Davis Gym for men's basketball games. Unfortunately, the women have not had the same success at the gate.

It seems that many hoops fans look at their 5-18 record and assume that the women are not worth watching. I used to think the same thing, until this year when my new job as public address announcer called for me to attend several games. Much to my surprise, the games have been very entertaining. And while the Bison may not have the sheer talent to win the league title just yet, first-year coach Juliene Simpson has them going all out for 40 minutes every night. When these women lose a game, it is not because of lack of hustle or a mental mistake.

The veterans such as Joy Sandler '92 and Kirsten Ellison '92 keep the group together, while the younger talents like Juliet McGee '93, Lisa Fink '93, and Anne McGovern '93 play their roles well. Coach Simpson also realizes that success lies in the future, so players like Monica Nawarskas '94, Heather Ross '94, and Carolyn Mangan '95 all receive significant playing time.

It is sad that at a school as rich in basketball tradition as Bucknell, the women's team annually gets ignored. I overhear many fans say that the only time they have ever seen the women play is on their way home from the weight room, or to get a good seat for the men's game. Why not make game nights on campus an extravaganza? Students are permitted to make noise and ridicule opposing players just as they are at men's games.

I realize that it is a bit late in the season to make this cry for attention, but Bucknellians should realize that the women are improving at swift rates (witness their win over Patriot League power Holy Cross), and their games the rest of this year and in years to come are sure to be as exciting and as well-played as women's basketball has been for many years on our campus.

Grapplers finish second at Bloomsburg

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Throughout much of his Bucknell wrestling career, Ken Herceg '92 has been overshadowed by former school All-Americans Tom Marchetti '91 and Bryan Burns '91. The current Bucknell captain is making the most of his chance to be one of the leading Bison grapplers by passing over these wrestlers in the all-time Bucknell record books.

In leading the Bucknell wrestling squad to a second place finish last weekend at the Husky Duals, held in Bloomsburg, Pa., Herceg recorded a pair of falls and a 15-1 major decision in his three matches. The two pins raised his season total to 13 and his career mark to 43, two more than Marchetti's all-time school mark compiled through last season. The 167-pounder has compiled a 20-6 record throughout the season, pushing his overall career record to 81-32, tying him with Burns for third on the all-time school victory list. Herceg, currently rated 16th in the nation by the Amateur Wrestling News, has an outside shot at reaching Tom Scotton's second place total of 89 by winning the conference title and placing well at the national championships in Oklahoma.

Bucknell opened the competition by squaring off with California (PA), where the Bison tallied a 32-13 victory on the strength of three falls. Russ Parker '93 opened the scoring at 118 pounds by scoring a 4-4 draw, before George Swann '93 was awarded six team points for a forfeit. Junior Phil Elliott's second period pin at his new weight of 134 pounds gave Bucknell a 14-2 lead.

California scored victories in the next three bouts before Herceg recorded his record breaking fall with 1:11 gone in the second period. A 5-3 decision by Matt DiGiacomo '95 at 177 pounds put the match out of reach and moved the Bison into the tournament's semifinals.

Bucknell next met Liberty for the right to compete in the championship finals. Parker again opened the scoring for the Bison, this time on the strength of a 10-5 decision. After a major decision at 126 pounds put Liberty briefly in the lead, Elliott was able to win a 12-4 major of his own. After a second period fall by Ron Wellman '95 and a 7-3 decision by captain Mike Van Doren '92, Bucknell had a commanding 16-4 lead.

> ... the Bison tallied a 32-13 victory on the strength of three falls.

Falls by Herceg, in 1:21, and 190-pound Bob Ferraro '94, in 1:08, solidified the Bison lead, before Ben Myers '92 continued his late season rally by recording a 6-0 shutout to close the scoring at 31-13. Myers, the third Bison captain, was the only other Bucknell grappler, along with Herceg, to go 3-0 for the tournament, raising his season record to 7-9-1, including 5-1-1 in his last seven bouts.

In the championship match, Bucknell was held to only bout wins by the host school, as Bloomsburg won the title on the strength of a 25-13 victory. The 2-1 weekend for the Bison raised their overall season dual match record to 5-8.

The Huskies earned victories in five of the first six bouts, then Elliott wrestled to a 4-4 tie at 134 pounds to take a 20-2 lead before Herceg scored his major decision at 167-pounds. A 5-5 draw by Ferraro and a forfeit awarded to Myers accounted for the rest of the Bison scoring on the afternoon.

Ferraro used his 2-0-1 afternoon and two pins to raise his season totals to 23-1-1 with ten falls, second on both the school and conference lists. The sophomore remains undefeated in dual bouts (12-0-1), and is currently ranked eighth in the nation by the AWN.

This weekend, Bucknell will return to its conference schedule in matches against Central Connecticut State and Hofstra. The Hofstra match at 1:00 p.m. on Saturday will mark the final Davis Gym appearance for a number of senior Bison grapplers.

Tonight, Head Coach Bob Ferraro's team will take on last season's East Coast Conference runner-up, Central Connecticut, looking to improve its current 1-1 conference mark. The Blue Devils will enter the contest undefeated in ECWA action, with a 3-0 mark to go with its season total of 14-2. Most recently, CCSU fell at Brown University, 20-13, before rebounding to defeat Boston College by a 38-9 count last Wednesday in Massachusetts.

Leading the Blue Devils into Lewisburg tonight will be a trio of defending individual conference champions. Brett Raimondo is 24-4 this season at 126-pounds, including 11-2 during dual competition, and leads the squad with a total of six falls. The senior is currently ranked tenth in the nation by the AWN. Wrestling at 142 pounds against the Bison will be Mike Kocsis, up a weight class from 134 pounds, where he won top conference honors last season.

The ECWA's heavyweight champion last year, Kevin Mariner has continued his excellence into this season. Mariner, who defeated Myers on a one-point decision in the conference semifinals last year, is 14-5-2 this season and ranked in the nation top 20.

The Bison's final dual match of the 1991-92 season will be against 13th-ranked Cornell on Wednesday at the Shikellemy High School gym in Sunbury. The match will be a final tune-up for the squad before it travels to Rider College in Lawrenceville, N.J. for the ECWA championships.

marks, Grunow also took three East Coast Conference titles and set new conference records in all three of her individual events.

It was after the success of her first year at Bucknell that Margaret decided to devote more time to her sport. She attributes her decision almost completely to head water-polo coach and friend Jim Harvey, a 1988 Bucknell graduate. He worked to convince Grunow of her talent and, more importantly, of her potential. According to Margaret, "I became more interested in the sport every time he talked about it. He made it sound great—I'd be training with the team that Jim would be swimming with, with a great coach, in a great facility. He definitely didn't prepare me for how hard it was going to be!"

That summer, Grunow spent a grueling three months training with the New Jersey Wave. Although the 6:30 a.m. cold-water-work out experience was not terribly fun, her work with the distance-based team paid off, and she enjoyed fantastic swims at the end of the season. Grunow's ninth and tenth-place finishes at Junior Nationals were extremely respectable, especially considering that she had never trained or competed at the longer meter distance prior to that summer.

Upon returning to Bucknell for the next year, Margaret expected great things. Unfortunately for the sophomore, she did not enjoy as much success as she did during her first year. Grunow began swimming events in which she had never competed before, including the vigorous 500 free and 200 butterfly. According to Bucknell swim coach Lynn Kachmarik, "Margaret is very team oriented. It is really a statement about her character that she gets up and swims back-to-back events if we need her. Margaret's attitude has always been 'whatever is best for the team.' And she is just as good in the water as she is out of the water—she's there for everyone."

That year, Grunow also suffered from illness throughout most of the team's heavy training period. An "unsuccessful" season is, of course, a relative term when it comes to Margaret—the sophomore went on to take two individual Patriot League gold medals and was a member of four school record-breaking relays during the championship meet. Three of those four relays also went on to capture golds.

Grunow decided not to return to the New Jersey Wave the following summer. Instead, she went down to Fort Lauderdale to train with the team that Harvey was then a member of, the Fort Lauderdale Swim Team. It turned out to be a program much more suited to Margaret's needs. Jack Nelson, the team's head coach and perhaps the best sprinting coach in the country, concentrated almost solely on Margaret's 50, her strongest event. Grunow's team went on to win the prestigious Senior National title, a meet in which she placed 21st in the 50 meter free, just missing the Olympic Trial cut by .02 seconds.

When Margaret returned to Bucknell this season, she began swimming well right from the start and has yet to let up. She made another attempt to make the Olympic Trial meet at the U.S. Open in late November, where she was off by .13 seconds. Grunow continued to swim well in Bucknell meets, crushing all of her opponents, while also setting a new school record in the 200 individual medley.

On the spur of the moment, the co-captain decided to try one last time for the Trial cut. Last weekend, Margaret departed for a Zone meet in Syracuse with high hopes and few expectations. Those hopes were realized and the expectations shattered when she swam to a 26.83 in the 50 meter free, .06 under the Olympic Trial mark.

Right now, Grunow is concentrating on the upcoming Patriot League Championship meet, where it is expected that she will see little or no competition. About her premier athlete, Kachmarik says, "Making the Olympic Trials is a fantastic accomplishment for Margaret. It is a credit to her character—she set out to do it, and she did. We have no idea of her potential; two years ago, no one ever dreamed of such an accomplishment for her. Who knows what she could do next?" Over the next few years, Bucknell will have to wait and see.

Ken Herceg '92

Bucknell wrestler Ken Herceg '92 has been named The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week.

The senior 167-pounder led the Bison wrestling squad to a second-place finish at the Bloomsburg Duels while breaking the school record for career pins. Herceg earned a major decision and a pair of falls to raise his season total to 13, giving him 43 for his career. That enabled him to pass former All-America Tom Marchetti, who racked up 41 pins.

Herceg, a native of Nazareth, PA, now has a season record of 20-6, and he is currently ranked 16th in the nation by Amateur Wrestling News.

Track gears up for league meets

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

During the winter months, certain things such as snow and having to warm-up your car used to be guaranteed. For various reasons, now only Bucknell's track dominance remains a given, as both the men's and women's teams remain undefeated.

In preparation for the Patriot League Championships at Lehigh University next weekend, the Bison invited a few hundred of their closest friends to the field house for a non-scoring (essentially training) meet last Saturday. Like any good party, more people showed up than expected, creating more of a competitive atmosphere.

A glance at the Patriot League's top ten individual performance lists for each event shows a surprisingly low number of Bison atop the standings. In fact, the men's contingent has only pole vaulter Joe LaBarge '93 and the distance medley relay teams in first position. LaBarge's school record vault of 15'5" this past weekend puts him head and shoulders above the rest of the league. Sprinter Jim Bock '92 is tied for top honors in the 60-yard dash.

Despite this lack of early season outstanding performances, head coach Art Gulden's teams boast unequalled depth. "Depth is our biggest strength, and we will win some events that we're not leading in right now," commented Gulden. "But, perhaps our most valuable asset is the aggressiveness and competitiveness of the two teams. Our freshmen are running aggressively."

Obviously not overly concerned about the jump that some of the other schools have gotten off to at this point in the season, the teams continue to approach each invitational in stride. "We train to progress as the year goes on. It starts in January and goes straight through to the conference championships," said Gulden.

That progression continued in last weekend's meet as Mike Bronson '93 captured first in the two-mile run with a time of 9:10.51 and Jeff Loomis '92 in the one-mile run with an 1C4A qualifying time of 4:14.24. Tom Wuchenich '92 and Tom Eagleson '93 garnered first in the three-mile and 1,000-yard runs, respectively. Richard VanEmburgh '95 and the two-mile relay team also finished first on the afternoon.

For the women, Gina Abraham '93 cruised to first in the 1,000-yard run. Not to be outdone were the sprinters, led by tri-captain Tricia Plasko '92 and Tameka Hinton '95, who each placed in multiple events. Beth Muehl '94 ran to the front in the 600 as Jen Thomas '94 and Dawn Ellery '94 followed in the top four.

This weekend, the teams will invite more friends from Susquehanna, Bloomsburg, and Lock Haven over for training while some members of the team will travel north to Cornell for the Kane Invitational.

"Since we don't have a scoring meet every week, we don't have to get up for a team competition every week like some of the other sports. But we always seem to turn it on come conference time because we know what we have to do, and we do it," added Gulden. "We're still the favorites for the men's title, but not as much as last year. The women will be in dogfight with Fordham and Lafayette for the title."

Hockey still harbors playoff hopes

Bison icemen (7–9–1) need to defeat Loyaola for last slot in Mason–Dixon League

BY JEN WALSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After getting off to a strong 3-1 start in December, the Bucknell ice hockey team faltered over January, compiling a record of just two wins and five losses for the month. Now standing at 7-9-1 overall, the Bison players are looking to make amends for their season with just five games remaining.

When asked to comment on the team's weak performance over January, co-captain John Werring '93 offered no excuses, simply stating that: "It seemed as though we just didn't get any of the breaks we had been getting in December—things just weren't going our way like they were before."

Admittedly, Bucknell came away from its intended grinding style of play to become involved in several shoot-outs, even dropping one game by a final score of 11-7. Yet despite allowing so many goals against, the team denies the notion of poor defense as the cause of their stumble. "Our goalie (Alec Altman '94) has been playing strong in net, even though some nights he's faced about fifty shots," said Werring. "And overall, I'd say the defense really isn't bad."

Whether the defense was bad or not, the offense was definitely better, with outstanding efforts from several individuals carrying Bucknell through almost every game. Jamie Abrahamson '93 led the way in scoring with an amazing 17 goals in seven games, including three hat tricks. Also at the top of the list offensively was Trevor Quick '95, who single-handedly pulled Bucknell out of the gutter in a must-win game last week against Dickinson. Down by three goals with only two minutes remaining, Quick came up with an unbelievable, clutch hat trick to tie Dickinson 8-8 and keep Bucknell's hockey playoff hopes alive. The game was even more meaningful due to the fact that Dickinson is the team that Bucknell will have to beat for the last playoff spot in the Mason-Dixon League.

Goalie Alec Altman '94 watches as his team clears the zone during a home game this past January.

In their present struggle to make the playoffs, Bucknell faced-off against a couple of tough Maryland teams this past weekend in what turned out to be a very depressing road trip. After dropping a decisive 9-1 game to Towson, the Bison fell even further, losing 12-4 to UMBC, a team which they had previously beaten.

Trying to put a finger on why the Bucknell team has fallen apart so suddenly, Altman cited several possible factors, among those a drop in player attendance, a lack on nearly everyone's part of playing to their potential, and a general difficulty in playing well as a team. "Our attitude is definitely different now than it was before," said Altman. "There's really no excuse—we just haven't been playing well at all."

In their most recent game, the Bison hockey team suffered what was perhaps their most disheartening loss of all, against Loyola University on Wednesday. After a hard-fought first two periods, Bucknell entered the final segment of the game tied at two. However, playing with only nine skaters, Bucknell could not keep pace with a full team from Loyola and, despite a solid effort, gave up four goals that led to an eventual 6-2 loss.

Although Bucknell still stands a chance to make the playoffs, the loss to Loyola was especially disappointing because it insured the fact that Bucknell will finish under the .500 mark for the first time in many seasons. With one more game remaining at home this Sunday against Loyola, the Bison hockey team will be looking to salvage one last victory as well as clinch a playoff spot to close an otherwise surprisingly poor season.

"In this last game we played really hard, even though we lost," stated Altman. "The mood was definitely different. Hopefully we can carry that over to the game on Sunday and then the playoffs."

place, marking the best finish in her collegiate career. Rosen placed tenth to conclude the scoring for Bucknell. The latter has finished in the top 11 for four consecutive races.

With the regular season complete, five Bucknellians earned Allegheny Collegiate Ski Conference (ACSC) All-Conference honors for 1992. The top ten men and women (who accrued points for finishing in the top fifteen for each event) were recognized for their efforts.

Williamson led the Bucknell men, finishing fourth overall for the season. His movement into the elite of the conference was extremely quick, considering he missed the first four events during January. Abrahamsen placed sixth overall, marking the third consecutive season the captain has been named All-Conference. In addition, without a controversial disqualification call withstanding against him in one event, Abrahamsen was the only individual in the conference to place in the top fifteen in every race. Sinn was also named to the team as the number nine racer in the conference. His second-place finish on the last day of racing put him over the top. Navy freshmen John Townsend was the conference's overall champion, winning five of nine events.

Siefert and McCahill also garnered All-Conference honors for the women, continuing the University's rich tradition in ski racing. Siefert was the number two racer in the conference this year. Her season included one victory and three second-place finishes. McCahill was consistent all season and then surged late in the year, propelling her to the number six ranking in the conference, repeating her post-season honors of a year ago. She received points in all ten women's events this season.

The stage is set for this weekend: the top four men's and women's teams from the ACSC will meet the top four squads from the New Jersey and Southeastern conferences this weekend. The men's teams representing the ACSC are UPenn, Penn State, Bucknell, and Navy, while the conference will send West Virginia, Penn State, Bucknell, and UPenn for the women's events.

In order to qualify as a team for the National Championship in Lake Placid, Bucknell must finish in the top three from the 12-school race. There will also be one at-large bid for nationals distributed to the top individual man and woman who was not on a team qualifier.

For those that put significance on experience, Bucknell's history should work to its advantage: the men's team has qualified for nationals each of the last two seasons, while the women accomplished that status in 1990. Anything can happen (and usually does) at regionals, so what transpires promises to be interesting.

"I think the men have an excellent shot at nationals," noted McCahill. "With three women, it will be tough for our team, but we've still set our sights on Lake Placid."

Grunow swims to Olympic trial

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell swim program and the athletic department as a whole had something to be proud of after last weekend. On Sunday, February 16, swimmer Margaret Grunow '93 qualified for Olympic Trials in the 50 meter freestyle. Grunow is the only woman in the history of Bucknell swimming to earn such an honor.

It is a surprise for many to hear about Margaret's past with respect to her chosen sport. She, like so many others in the swimming world, entered the competitive arena at the young age of eight. However, for Grunow swimming was nothing more than "something to do over the summer." She never swam in the extremely competitive United States Swimming program and did not begin any serious training until she entered junior high school. "I'm very glad that I didn't start seriously swimming until high school. That may have been my saving grace—I know so many people who were pushed so hard when they were young that they were simply burned out by the time they reached the college level, " says Grunow.

Margaret tried out for her high school team when she was still in junior high, due to the fact that her town's school system incorporated ninth grade into that lower level. Never imagining that she would make the squad, Grunow quit on the first day of practice. "I remember I didn't even go to the pool for the first work-out because I was so scared! I had never trained hard a day in my life and was not prepared for what was going to come," admits Grunow. She later decided to give the Greenwich High School team a second chance. Neither the coach nor her teammates could know just how lucky they were.

The sprinter recalls that she did not break the one-minute barrier in the 100 yard freestyle until the start of that year. As her freshman season wore on, however, Margaret saw her times rapidly drop. The end of that season brought All-American status to a Greenwich 200 medley relay team—Grunow swam the anchor leg. When asked about that incredible turn-around in her early career, Margaret says that she believes that simple training was responsible. "I had never really trained before that year, never lifted weights, and definitely never swam double workouts." That extra work succeeded in bringing out the natural talent that Grunow has for the sport.

Grunow helped Greenwich take second at the state championships each of the four years that she was a member of the team. Margaret's personal accomplishments did not take off until her junior year. That season, the relative new-comer to the swimming scene, was seeded first in the 50 and 100 freestyle races at the state championship meet. Unfortunately, she false started and therefore was disqualified during the finals of the 50. Margaret then came back from the disappointment to take second in the longer race. "That 100 was the most terrible race because the false start in the 50 mentally killed me; I was so upset," recalls Grunow.

As a senior, Margaret made up for the mistakes of the prior year. In the state championships, she swam to victory in the 50 and 100 freestyles and anchored Greenwich's 400 free relay that also captured the state title. All three of those swims established not only Greenwich school records, but also Connecticut state records at that time.

When looking at and choosing colleges, Grunow says that she knew she wanted to continue swimming. "But not hard-core—I really just wanted to have a good time with it." That sentiment caused Grunow to shy away from schools with intense swim programs, such as Northwestern and Syracuse. Margaret decided upon Bucknell for numerous reasons including the quality of academics that the school offers. The swim program was also exactly what she was looking for.

The success that Grunow enjoyed in high school carried over to her college career. During her freshman year, Margaret took the Bucknell swimming scene by storm. By the end of the season, she owned three individual team records and was a member of three record-setting relays. In establishing those

Bison fall to Rams, slip by Colgate

Bucknell (17–7, 9–3) travels to Lehigh tomorrow night to break three-way tie atop Patriot League

BY KIRK PETERS AND JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The atmosphere in Davis Gym last Saturday was a true indicator of the state of the Patriot League. With the Bison in first place, but just one game ahead of three other teams, including Fordham, a win would have been oh, so sweet.

Fans packed the sweaty arena approximately 30 minutes before tipoff, all of them ready to rock the house. And boy did that house rock when, three minutes into the game, driving layups by Chris Simpson '94 and Bill Courtney '92, a jumper by Patrick King '92, and a three pointer by Mike Bright '93 put the Bison ahead, 9-2. Fordham coach Nick Macarchuk quickly called a time out.

That strategy was not initially successful as the Bison increased their lead. King hit a transition layup off a beautiful touch pass from Simpson, and Bright rocked the rim on a great assist from Russell Peyton '93. When Raymond Brown '94 scored two straight buckets midway through the half, the Bison led 21-12.

Fordham is an experienced team, and after an official's timeout, the Rams stormed back. They went on a 10-0 run led by center Sanford Jenkins, who nailed two shots in that run. Later in the half, he hit three consecutive shots to give Fordham a three point lead. Matt Clark '93 hit a hook shot before the end of the half, but the Bison went to the locker room down by a point.

The beginning of the second half was reminiscent of the end of the first half. Fordham pulled away from the Bison by dominating the game inside. Jenkins and power forward Fred Herzog scored at will in the paint against the Bison as Fordham stormed to a 52-39 lead.

The Bison would not go down easily in front of the still large, but much quieter crowd. A 9-0 run got Bucknell back to within striking distance at 52-48. Paul Olkowski '93 began to assert himself, scoring six points midway through the half. Peyton also played a major role in the Bison comeback by picking Fordham point guard Jean Prioleau's pocket twice. Peyton went the length of the floor after the second steal to score a layup, cutting the score to 61-57 with 2:05 remaining. Unfortunately that was as close as the Bison would get. Uncharacteristicly, they shot very poorly from the line when they had chances to trim the lead. Bucknell, who came into the game third in the nation in team free-throw percentage, shot only 4-11 at the line. Comparatively, Fordham shot 20-24 from the charity stripe. That difference, coupled with Fordham's domination of the inside game, provided the ten point margin of victory, 67-57.

The 2,963 fans who crammed Davis Gym watched Fordham play as tough a defense as the Bison have seen all year. Guards Prioleau and Jay Fazande stifled Bucknell's backcourt connection. For the first time this year, no Bucknell guard reached double figures in points. Fordham was also able to "shut down" Patrick King, who was coming off his fourth consecutive Patriot League Player of the Week award. In front of his "King's Court," the 6'6" forward scored 12 points, his season low, and grabbed nine rebounds, but he was held without a field goal for the final 18:09 of the game.

The over-capacity crowd at the Fordham game brought the season attendance average to 2,168, or 103% of Davis Gym's capacity of 2,100. Although no official attendance records exist, Saturday's crowd is believed to be by far the largest in the history of Bucknell.

The atmosphere on Wednesday night was a bit more subdued. A reported crowd of 1,958 came out to watch the Bison take on a surprising Colgate team. After going 5-23 last year, the Red Raiders were involved in a five-way tie for first at the midpoint of this year, with an 86-77 victory over Bucknell among their wins. They have fallen on hard times since then, however. The Bison's 90-84 triumph on Wednesday was Colgate's fifth loss in its last six games.

The weeknight crowd was fairly quiet throughout most of the first half, as Colgate hung with Bucknell. The Red Raiders were successful in running cutters behind back-picks for easy layups. In fact, ten of their 18 baskets were of that variety. Both teams shot very well in the opening 20 minutes, and neither team led by more than five points.

Colgate forward Darren Brown scored 14 of his 18 points in the first half, most of them from in the paint. For the Bison, Courtney and Simpson combined on eight of 11 shooting, and both were able to penetrate strong to the goal.

Bucknell trailed by three at the half, 44-41, and that was the deficit for most of the first six minutes of the second stanza. Then, beginning with Simpson's pull-away jumper at the 14-minute mark, the Bison went on a 16-5 run. That seven minute stretch saw them leap to a 69-59 lead.

Colgate would not quit, however. Two more layups and a Jonathan Stone three-pointer cut the margin back to three. Then, with 2:35 left in the game, Jack Ehretsman connected on a trey to tie the score at 77. Thirty seconds later, Bright answered with a three-ball of his own, and the game would never get any closer. Olkowski followed a Colgate turnover with a 15-foot jumper to bump the lead to five, and the Bison were able to convert their free-throws at the end to sew up the contest. Bucknell was 19-25 (.760) from the charity stripe for the game, but they went 10 for 10 in the last four minutes.

Bill Courtney led all scorers with 21 points, on 7 for 14 shooting, including 3 for 6 from three-point land. Bucknell is now 10-1 when Courtney scores 20 points or more, while they are just 7-6 when he does not. While Patrick King has certainly been the most consistent performer, Courtney continues to be a key. In fact, the Bison are 0-6 when Courtney shoots under 30 percent from the floor, and they are now 17-1 when he hits more than 30 percent of the time.

Chris Simpson was also stellar in the Bison backcourt. The 6'1" guard scored 20 points on 8 for 11 shooting (all three misses were from behind the three-point arc). Simpson also contributed two big blocked shots down the stretch.

Bucknell will travel to Lehigh tomorrow night for yet another huge Patriot League contest. The winner will remain in a two-way tie for first, while the loser will drop into a tie for second. The Bison beat Lehigh in Lewisburg earlier this year, and the Engineers are eager to return the favor. They will be looking to pack their gym, looking for a Davis-type atmosphere, but Lehigh can expect a large Bucknell contingent to make the two-hour road trip.

Tomorrow's game will be one of the final tune-ups for the Patriot League Tournament. A non-conference game at Drexel and a home game against Lafayette finish off the regular season schedule. There is sure to be a mad scramble for the top seeds in the tournament in the coming two weeks, and a win in Bethlehem would put the Bison in good shape to take the top spot.

Spikin' Bison remain undefeated at 7–0

BY PAUL KOSEMPEL

Last Sunday, the men's volleyball team posted an exciting victory over Millersville.

The undefeated Bucknell Blue team once again demonstrated its dominance in league play by extending its win streak to seven matches with the win against Millersville. With more than half of their season's matches completed without a loss, the Bison are looking to clinch the first-place position which would guarantee them a spot at the Eastern Intercollegiate Volleyball Association Finals in April.

The Bison started out slow and lost the first game to Millersville by a score of 15-11. Team captain and setter Mike Lutz '94 explained, "We were really cold when we started this game. Millersville came out strong while we idled in the starting blocks." Although outside hitters Ben Jarosz '94 and Keith Martin '92 combined for ten of the team's 12 digs, it was not enough to stop Millersville's attack.

It seemed that after losing the first game, however, the Bison got their wake-up call. The Bison were spiking suberbly, going 14 for 28, while setter Lutz racked up an assist percentage of .480. The Bison were still slow blocking at the net as evidenced by their five blocking errors. However, their powerful hitting was enough to overcome this as the Bison won the game, 15-7. Middle blocker Chris Dycka '93 said, "We were really hammering the ball against them. If we had a hammer trophy, I don't know who we would give it to, because everyone was pounding the ball."

Game three seemed to be off to a similar start as the Bison jumped to an 8-0 lead, but it was then that the foundation of the Bison offense crumbled. Coach Pat Musselman said, "Passing is really essential for the complicated offense we run, so when our passes weren't getting to our setter, we let Millersville get back into the game." Millersville ended up taking the game from the Bison with a score of 15-10.

Yet once again Bucknell took charge as it entered the fourth game. Sparked by unbeatable defense and an aggressive front line, the Bison trounced Millersville 15-5. Setter Lutz led the team's offense earning a .500 assist percentage, while middle hitter Glenn Gesek '94 had four blocks to boost the team's defense. "We definitely played as a team this game," commented Gesek. "We all knew it was goodnight for Millersville."

The Bison will carry their momentum into this weekend's four away matches. On Saturday, both the Orange and Blue teams will face Franklin & Marshall and Kutztown. On Sunday, the Spikin' Bison travel to Millersville for a rematch.

Black History Month mandates critical re-examination of the past

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As a month-long series of events focusing on the contributions of blacks to American civilization draws to a close, both professors and students point to the necessity of critically reassessing the role of blacks in the history of American civilization.

Concerns voiced about the concept behind a Black History Month point not only to generations of social suppression, but to historical inaccuracy and incomplete scholarship.

Setting aside one month to isolate and celebrate the significant contributions of an entire race of people encourages members of society to reflect on something other than the more commonly taught, all-white, all-male history of America, according to Alem Asres, recently appointed director of the Multicultural Center (MCC).

Asres points out that a belief that black individuals have been "equal to fight and die but unequal to share a victory" persists today, and that Black History Month offers an opportunity for all people to reflect on and question a slighted representation of black Americans in the history of our civilization. He said, too, that the month is "really aimed at European Americans" so that they can realize "that they are not the only makers of the United States of America; there are others who were involved in making America."

Richard Waller, assistant professor of history and acting chair of the department, cites several purposes for celebrating the month. "One, I think, is to give people pause to think of different aspects—what I suppose you might call national and community heritage... I think it's important that the community, generally, should mark these things," he said.

Second, Waller stressed that the month allows black Americans an opportunity to celebrate their own national heritage.

"The purpose [of Black History Month] is not to give a whole history within one month, but to spark an interest in learning more about black history since in the regular school history a lot of the contributions of blacks have been omitted," said Regis Bingham '94, president of African American Cultural Society.

"Without the inclusion of black history we cannot know our own history," according to Karen Dugger, co-director of the Race/Gender Resource Center and associate professor of sociology. Dugger believes that since we define ourselves in the context of others, a comprehensive reflection on history is essential to get an accurate picture of who we are.

Celebrated nation-wide each February, Black History Month has its own 66-year history. Carter Godson Woodson was responsible for intiating Negro History Week in 1926. Sometime during the 1960's, the event grew into a month-long celebration.

Just why is Black History Month the "shortest, darkest month of the year," as some have asked? According to Leslie Patrick-Stamp, assistant professor of history, Negro History Week, at its inception, was planned for the second week in February so that it could include the birthday of Abraham Lincoln; the celebration eventually grew to cover all of February.

Patrick-Stamp regards the timing of Black History Month as "ironic." Since the days of Woodson, historians have concluded that Abraham Lincoln, once supposed to be a champion of black rights, in reality merely used the emancipation of slaves in his greater goal to keep the union together. The "Great Emancipator" actually did very little to promote the welfare of black Americans.

The celebration of black history has grown from one week to an entire month, but most involved individuals stress the need to extend awareness past the confines of the 29 celebratory days of February.

"I'm quite sick of us being treated as a trend," said Patrick-Stamp, who presented a lecture as one of the events during the month. In that presentation, Patrick-Stamp "posited that we no longer need Black History Month... I think there's a harm in promoting certain kinds of black [history]." Rather than focus on one month, she said that people need to become generally more aware of the past and present contributions of black Americans.

Asres argued that Black History Month is necessary in raising awareness about black contributions, but that eventually the need for such a month will vanish. Once black Americans "feel like they are well-

Black History Month is seen by many as vehicle to spark interest in the problem of exclusion in the study of history. Careful examination of these issues occurs frequently in the classes of African American historian Leslie Patrick-Stamp.

Campus crime drops in '91

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Criminal incidents recorded by the Bucknell Office of Public Safety reached a four year low of 472 in 1991, according to the annual crime report submitted to the Pennsylvania State Police.

Offenses are divided into two categories, referred to as Part 1 and Part 2. Part 1 incidents, which include serious crimes, numbered 191, while Part 2 minor crimes numbered 281.

"I would consider it a significant reduction in minor offenses, but I see very little reduction in serious incidents," said Vincent DeCerchio, director of public safety.

Act 73 is the State law passed in 1988 that requires all police departments and departments of campus security to report crime statistics by calendar year to the State Police. The act also stipulates that the department must publish and distribute these statistics to the community.

A similar Federal law requires the school to report all criminal incidents that have occurred in areas contiguous to the campus to the Federal Government and to the local community, but the crimes are broken down in a slightly different manner.

"The purpose of that is to allow students and other members of the campus community to know if there are any hazards or problems existing near the campus," said DeCerchio.

Three years ago, the community found out more than it wanted to know about problems at Bucknell when USA Today published an article which reported Bucknell as having the highest number of crimes of any university in Pennsylvania.

DeCerchio believed that those numbers were flawed, so he trained two officers to examine all crime records for the years in question. DeCerchio reclassified cases which he did not accept as criminal incidents, such as sick calls.

"We didn't have the highest crime rate in the state; other places had shootings and robberies. The problem with the USA Today report is that it panders to sensationalism. It doesn't educate the readers as to the correct difference between a serious crime and a minor crime," said DeCerchio.

In a comparison with statistics from local schools such as Bloomsburg University, DeCerchio's corrected numbers do not appear to be excessive. While Bloomsburg did report fewer Part 2 crimes, they also reported more of the far more significant Part 1 crimes.

Bloomsburg's crime summary includes two rape charges, one robbery, and 20 assaults. Bucknell's report cites no rape charges, no robberies, and five assaults, but the larceny-theft total of 178 outnumbers that of Bloomsburg by 53.

According to the numbers, Bucknell's real problem is with minor, Part 2 crimes, which numbered 281. There were 210 vandalism offenses, 22 violations of liquor laws, and 34 cases of disorderly conduct.

Bloomsburg reported only 57 vandalism infractions, 13 liquor law violations, and 18 disorderly conduct charges. Cases of fraud, sex offenses, and all other crimes were virtually identical between the two schools.

"[Reclassifying the crimes] was not an attempt to disguise serious criminal incidents; it was an attempt to get a more accurate picture of our crimes on campus," said DeCerchio.

"I would consider it a significant reduction in minor offenses, but I see very little reduction in serious incidents."

First-ever Siblings Weekend begins today

BY SUZANNE W. O'NEILL

This weekend marks what the Residence Hall Association (RHA) hopes will be an annual event: Siblings' Weekend will provide the first opportunity for older and younger siblings to learn what life is really like on campus through first-hand experience.

"Basically, we hope to bring siblings onto campus to spend a weekend of fun with students," said Jen Heath '94, student organizer and RHA representative. She stressed that it is an activity meant solely for siblings—not for parents— and that similar activities have been successful at other universities in the past.

"It should be especially nice for younger kids to spend time here at school and for high-schoolers who are starting to think about college," commented Heath.

Cost for siblings will be minimal, as they will be provided free passes to all of the weekend activities.

Most events are being funded by the RHA, and T-shirts designed by Steve McNutt '95 are being sold to remember the event.

"A lot of the organizing of this event has been initiated by the students," commented RHA advisor Kari Kuehl, "which proves that there is a desire to show their siblings a big part of their lives here on campus."

The RHA has received an overwhelming response, according to Heath.

Currently, 255 people from the ages of three to thirty-three years old have registered, over twice the 100 people originally expected by RHA.

The Bucknell Activities Council, Bison Programming, and the RHA have planned activities for all ages including movies for younger and older audiences.

Musician Mark Rust will be performing in the Bison tonight at 9:00 p.m.

Saturday will begin with an indoor field day and basketball tournament for students and siblings in Davis Gym and the pool will be open for swimming in the afternoon.

The RHA is sponsoring a pizza dinner in the Terrace room before the last men's home basketball game against Lafayette at 7:30 p.m.

Later Saturday night, comedian/juggler Edward Jackman will be in the Terrace Room at 9:30 p.m.

Kuehl commented that other organizations on campus have been very cooperative in allowing the activities for the siblings to take top priority.

According to Kuehl, Siblings' Weekend should give students the chance to incorporate their families with the campus community and share the exciting experiences they have here at school.

All students are invited to take part in the activities, regardless of whether or not they have a sibling here this weekend.

Brian Sipes— The Bucknellian

Jen Heath '94, student organizer of the newly-created weekend, feels the interaction of students and their siblings on the campus setting will enrich the college experience for all involved.

represented, there should not be a need for such a month. But in the absence of such inclusion, what can you do except take a little time here or there to reflect on it."

Waller, on the other hand, said, "I would like to see a time, and I'm not sure that I will, in which the contribution of African-Americans and other minorities is fully acknowledged... And I think that Black History Month and the other such things are very important steps on the way to making people think. I don't, however, think that means that you don't have to have such things."

"I would say, go on with Black History Month forever, but let us hope that it never sticks out but becomes part of our normal understanding of the historical variety... I would think that Black History Month and other such months are always reminding us of the need to reexamine our heritage and to take possession of the past," he continued.

Chandra Guinn, co-coordinator of Bucknell's Black History Month, fears that Americans have not yet acknowledged contributions of black persons. And she said that Black History Month will not be fully effective "until the United States admits and apologizes for the injustice that it has contributed to African Americans."

"We're not melting... we live in a racist culture," said Guinn, stating that each minority group would have to look out for its own interests, developing its own community of traditions. Of white Americans, she said, "I think it's about time they look at different views."

The events of the month attracted a diverse audience, according to Bingham. "I felt that there was a good mixture of black students, white students—hispanic maybe—but I felt that the attendance and the number could have been a little better."

Bingham said that the service at Rooke Chapel was well-attended.

Noting the audiences, Guinn said, "I've attended all but two of the events and I guess the best I can say is that the crowds have been as expected."

On one night, organizers of the Black History Month showed the film "Cooley High." Guinn noted that the audience reflected interests of the campus community; a student will be inclined to attend this sort of event, "if [he] has an interest in black cinematography." The corollary can be made for other sorts of events.

Patrick-Stamp said that at the events she attended, she saw very few students other than the ones she knows from her African-American history classes. "As much as anything, that might suggest something about the circles in which I travel," she said.

Black History Month primarily focuses on the contributions of African-Americans, an appelation which is popularly used to refer to all black Americans. One lecture, "Traces of the Triangle," emphasized contributions of Caribbean-Americans. The lecture "gave a good perspective," said Bingham, an African-American, who admitted to having been ill-informed about the contributions of black Americans of non-African descent.

Funding for the events was provided by seven organizations: AACS, MCC, the Women's Resource Center, the Bucknell Activities Council, Bison Programming, and the Seventh Street House.

Serena Moore— The Bucknellian

Regis Bingham '94 felt that although the Rooke Chapel service was well-attended, crowds were "about what [he] expected" at other Black History Month events.

World-famous literary scholar awarded top honors at Bucknell

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

World-renowned literary scholar and Fellow at King's College, Cambridge University Sir Frank Kermode was presented the prestigious Bucknell Award of Merit this past Monday.

Since Bucknell ceased issuing honorary degrees in 1985, the Award of Merit has been considered the highest honor bestowed by the University.

"It's something that's given periodically to people who have distinguished themselves particularly in their service to humanity," said President Gary Sojka, who presented Kermode with the Award.

"There have been few persons to get it," noted Sojka. "The most recent one prior to Kermode was Takeo Shiina, president of IBM Japan—not for being president of IBM Japan, but for doing important work in bringing about interaction between the people of Japan and the United States."

Kermode's contribution to the fields of literary study have been both diverse and voluminous; he has authored or edited over 300 books, series, essays, and reviews since the publication of his first paper in 1947.

Kermode is respected worldwide for addressing with a critical eye most aspects of academia.

"It would not be an exaggeration to say that he is one of the top two or three people in the literary field," said Michael Payne, professor of English.

"Simply look at the scholarship and what he has done in what is sometimes a contentious field," noted Sojka. "He brings people together and helps them to find a common ground in the study of the humanities."

"The presentation of the award is, indeed, a mutual honor, both for the university and for Kermode," noted Harold Schweizer, associate professor of English. "It has been a great honor to have him work with us. It is a very prestigious thing for our school to have an official association with such a prominent scholar."

Kermode's relationship with Bucknell began in November of 1987, when he delivered the first series of lectures in the Andrew W. Mellon Lectures in Literary Theory, an annual series which will continue until 1993.

"The Mellon series was made available through a grant from the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation," according to Schweizer. "The purpose of the series is to educate faculty in the current problems and advances in literary studies."

Through a series of faculty seminars and other events surrounding each lecture series, the faculty has attempted to "educate each other; to confess to our ignorance on certain subjects and try to rid ourselves of it."

According to Schweizer, the series has focused on work in theory, criticism, hermeneutics, semiotics, and the relationship of these studies to poetry and literature.

Each annual series of lectures will result in the publication of a volume in the Bucknell series on literary studies, edited by Payne and Schweizer.

Other recipients of the Bucknell Award of Merit include vice-president Hubert H. Humphrey, Philosopher W. Preston Warren, professor of English, emeritus, Mildred Martin, and French scholar Gladys Cook.

Most recently, Kermode penned a review which critically examines works on multiculturalism and political correctness, which appeared in last Sunday's issue of the New York Times.

BSG acts to let freshmen into Greek parties

BY THERESA KANE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell Student Government (BSG) unanimously passed a motion last Sunday recommending that first-year students be allowed to attend fraternity and sorority parties where alcohol is present.

According to Dave Skena '92, co-chair of the Trustee Implementation Planning (TIP) and former president of BSG, the trustee mandate barring first-year students from fraternities where alcohol is being served is no longer "relevant in lieu of the BYOB policy," because fraternities are not serving alcohol.

Michael Thomas '94, president of BSG, said that, in addition to the BYOB policy, the over-twenty-one room further restricts first-year students' access to alcohol. He stated that many feel that the ban serves to "create animosity between the classes."

Skena also expressed concern that the ban is not "in the spirit of the TIP proposals" which stresses inclusion, not exclusion.

The way the policy stands, first-year students can attend alcohol-free Greek-sponsored events only.

Eva Szreniawski '93, president of the Panhellenic Council, supports the motion. She stated that the present ban gives first-year students the impression that the Greek system is "mysterious." According to Szreniawski, fraternity parties are a good opportunity for first-year students to meet fraternity and sorority members. She said that limiting the interaction of first-year students and Greek members can promote stereotyping.

Both Barbara Shailor, acting vice-president of student services, and John Dunlop, Dean of Students, said that the prohibition of first-year students from fraternity parties needs to be addressed. Dunlop stated that he has noticed much "dissatisfaction among the first-year students" and that "it is logical and appropriate at this point in time to review [the ban]."

When questioned about the effectiveness of the ban's enforcement, Dunlop stated that there "have not been any cases" that have required disciplinary action but he did say that "major among the factors [that suggest a review] is the extremely difficulty with respect to enforcement."

Speaking at last Sunday's BSG meeting, Denis Maguire '93, former president of the Interfraternity Council, emphasized this lack of enforcement.

According to Thomas, the BSG motion has been sent to President Gary Sojka, who will then make recommendation to the trustees in May. Any change in policy will probably not take effect until the fall of this year.

Seven Generations officially dedicated

BY JENNIFER HUNT AND JOEY KRAKOFF

The Seven Generations sculpture was dedicated Tuesday morning before an audience composed of approximately forty faculty, administrators, and students, including the sculptor, Dr. Frederick Franck.

The ceremony was organized by students in coordination with President Gary Sojka, vice president of academic affairs, Larry Shinn, and Mary Evelyn Tucker, professor of religion.

Sojka began the program by welcoming students and faculty to the sculpture, which was recently relocated between Kress Residence Hall and the Botany Building.

According to its sponsors, the artwork was moved from its original location, between Cargenie and Trax Halls, in an attempt to place it in a more "natural" environment.

Sojka saw the dedication as an appropriate introduction to his long-awaited President's Forum, entitled "The Environmental Imperative," which he hopes will have a lasting intellectual impact for both faculty and students. In his remarks, he thanked both Franck for the gift and the students for their involvement. "I am most delighted that the Seven Generations comes to us through the generosity of the creator and the enthusiasm of the students."

While Franck's sculpture was inspired by the Great Law of the Six Nation Haudenosaunee/Iroquois Confederacy, he admitted that the sculpture was initially the product of a telephone call.

"One night, while I was on a long and boring telephone call, I began doodling on a pad. I made a design very similar to the Seven Generations, and re-drew the design more carefully." The sculpture which Franck presented to Bucknell is the seventh and final replica of the Seven Generations.

While the sculpture appears to the naked eye as representing only the seven generations to come, symbolically, it represents fourteen generations. "Today, I didn't just give you seven generations," proclaimed Franck. "Rather, I gave you fourteen. For if you look at my sculpture from the front, you look at seven generations to the past, to the world at the time of the French Revolution and the founding fathers' hope for democracy, as well as their conviction of the United States as a land of unlimited opportunity. Now if you look at the sculpture from the point of the embryo, you look forward to the next seven generations, and the hope that the seven generations to follow ours will be more humane than the past."

Following Franck's statement, John Grim, assistant professor of religion, invoked the ceremonial Lakota/Sioux call of "hey." Grim explained that in the Lakota tradition, the sound of "hey" represents the calling of heaven and earth, and of all ancestors and present relatives, to a place. As a result of this dedication, the location of Franck's sculpture can itself became a sacred place for Bucknell's campus.

To close the ceremony, nine stu-

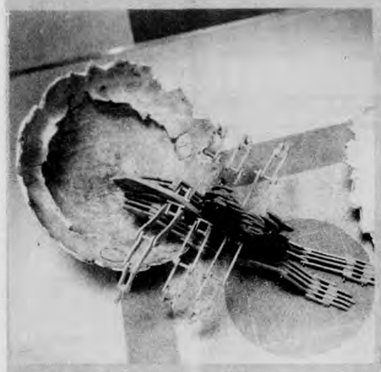
The Seven Generations sculpture was recently moved from its original location betweeen Trax and Carnegie halls. The new placement will be enriched by further landscaping later this Spring.



The wood and plaster work of Dee Scinta '92 fills the atrium of the Rooke Building. Scinta, a double-major in Biology and Art, describes the art as "a monster emerging." The creature is made primarily of wood, and is positioned in the center of a broken egg. The egg is constructed of plaster of paris and burlap, and was shaped in a two-ton sand mold. The work will be on display until March 6.

Margulis opens forum on environment

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK

Peter Ho—The Bucknellian

The Gaia Hypothesis, as put forth by Margulis, posits the earth as a phsyiological entity.

World-renowned botanist Lynn Margulis delivered the inaugural lecture of the President's Forum this past Tuesday to a crowd of almost 400 people.

The first speaker in the year-long investigation of "The Environmental Imperative," Margulis attempted to prove the credibility of the highly-controversial Gaia Hypothesis, an often discounted theory in what President Gary Sojka called "an issue that transcends departmental boundaries; the central issue of our age: the environment."

The Gaia Hypothesis states that, rather than being governed by properties of physics and chemistry, the earth is a physiological entity, which is maintained by the activity of living organisms.

By engaging the audience in a step-by-step examination of the earth's composition throughout history compared to that of Mars and Venus, Margulis pointed to the complete absence of water and large percentage of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere of Mars and Venus, compared to the abundance of water on the earth's surface and the oxygen and nitrogen present in the earth's atmosphere. Margulis claimed the only explanation for this disparity was the Gaia Hypothesis.

The acidity, temperature and atmospheric composition of the earth have not changed in accordance to the rising temperature of the sun, as has happened on other planets. In fact, these conditions have remained stable, at a level condusvie to supporting organic life.

The reason for this lack of fluctuation, according to the hypothesis, stems from the metabolism, growth, and interaction of organisms, specifically bacteria.

"What we have been considering the environment," claimed Margulis, "is really a body. The earth has an undeniable physiology, and it is a mistake to believe otherwise."

Margulis' lecture drew largely from her close work with English biologist Robert Lovelock, who developed the Gaia Hypothesis. Both Lovelock and Margulis have worked extensively with the space program and it is through the study of biology on a planetary scale that Margulis claims the hypothesis not only becomes credible, but evident.

"The function of biota in the twenty kilometer circle we know as the biosphere has been the cause of geologic phenomena ranging from the formation of rocks to the retention of original water. The only reason the earth is the way it is today is by the activity of these biota.

Responding to questions after her presentation, Margulis addressed what the Gaia hypothesis means to modern man on a personal level.

"What does this mean? It means that the earth is a unique organism, that it can ingest and feed on it's own waste and continue to maintain bacterial activity. The cold reality is, however, that the human race could be waste the earth ingests—this planet is not here for us, it is here."

The next lecture in the President's Forum, "Ensuring Biodiversity," will be given on March 12 by Patricia C. Wright, associate professor of biological anthropology and anatomy at Duke University.

Race/Gender center undergoes review

BY MICKI HAMILTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Race/Gender Resource Center is currently undergoing an internal review by a committee of faculty, in an attempt to evaluate the center's progress towards completing the goals established at its inception in 1987.

According to the original proposal for a Race/Gender Resource Center, the expectations of the Center include assisting with, "the integration of race and gender material into existing courses across the university and the formation of new courses, specializing in topics on race and gender, in order to create or sustain majors or minors in Black Studies or Women's Studies."

According to committe chair Allen Schweinsberg, associate professor of mathematics, the committee will evaluate the Center by reading through summary reports made by the Center's directors, Karen Dugger, associate professor of sociology, and Jean Shackelford, professor of economics.

The committee will also look at how well the Center has fulfilled other criteria such as sponsoring conferences and workshops, maintaining and distributing current information, developing and promoting film series and lectures, administering the minors in Women's Studies and Black Studies, and maintaining an annotated list of course offerings.

These activities will be scrutinized to see if the Center should emphasize any particular activities.

"We will make some kind of conclusion about how those activities have fit with the Center's original goals and ideas," commented Schweinsberg. The committee will decide if any changes should be made or if the Center should continue doing more of the same activities it already does.

"We will write up our findings and turn them over to the Curriculum Committee. They will read our review and make their own conclusions."

Results of the internal review are expected somtime in April, according to Dugger.

Amy Clare—The Bucknellian

Karen Dugger, co-director of the Race/Gender Resource Center anticpates the results of the review by April.

Four outside reviewers will also be evaluating Bucknell's Race/Gender Resource Center on Thursday, March 19. These experts will stay at Bucknell all day talking to the committee, administrators, and directors of the Center.

William Scott, former director of the black studies program at Oberlin College will be one of the reviewers offering his opinion to the committee.

Marilyn Schuster and Susan Van Dyne from Smith College will also serve on the external committee. Schuster and Van Dyne designed and coordinated the Smith College Curriculum Transformation Project, which is similar to Bucknell's Race/Gender Center in that its primary function is to bring change to the school. Dartmouth sociologist Debra King will round out the four-member external review committee.

Other members of the internal review committee are William Becker, professor of religion; Nancy Caine, associate professor of psychology; Martin Ligare, assistant professor of physics; Berhanu Nega, assistant professor of economics; Rosalyn Richards, associate professor of art; and Patricia Wenner, assistant professor of computer science. The committee members were appointed by Eugenia Gerdes, dean of the college of arts and sciences.

Drinking charges draw attention

Nine Clarion University of Pennsylvania students were issued citations for underage drinking at the off campus housing site. An investigation is pending against three adults who distributed the alcohol to the minors.

Mark Fleck, a 1982 Clarion graduate, has contacted the American Civil Liberty Union in regards to the incident. He is considering filing a lawsuit against the university, the Clarion Borough Police, and the Liquor Control Enforcement.

In Fleck's opinion, the university interfered with the students' right to privacy. According to Fleck, those under 21 were carded and not served alcohol. Also, there were many other students under 21 at the event who were not issued citations.

dents and Mary Evelyn Tucker, assistant professor of religion, read selections from Oren Lyons piece, "An Iroquois Perspective," and "Chief Seattle's Address to the American President, 1855." These two excerpts encouraged the extension of empathy and compassion to all living creatures. As was stated in the Iroquois reading, "In our perception all life is equal, and that includes the birds, animals, things that grow, things that swim."

Tucker envisions the sculpture as the focus of multivalent meanings, enriching the campus artistically, academically, socially, and spiritually. "The icon symbolically connects the generations of students at Bucknell," she noted. "It can be used for classes, even small rituals like meditation. It can become a touchstone for the kind of environmental consciousness required of all humans to preserve life on this planet. It is a focal point for action in creating a just society for all forms of life in future generations."

Shinn compounded Tucker's statement by stating, "The significance of Franck's Seven Generations sculpture is that it will stand for many generations of Bucknell students as a reminder of a Native people's concern for a long-range ecological vision our industrialized world must heed if it is to survive its own materialistic excesses."

Franck holds doctoral degrees in Medicine, Dentistry, and Fine Arts and served for three years on the staff of the Albert Schweitzer's hospital in Africa. He is also deeply influenced by Asian thought especially the ideas of Mahatma Gandhi as well as by Zen Buddhism.

Among his many books perhaps the best known is The Zen of Seeing. Franck's drawings and paintings may be seen in a number of museums including the Museum of Modern Art and the Whitney Museum in New York as well as the Tokyo National Museum. Franck concluded, saying, "I am delighted that my Seven Generations will be on the Bucknell campus and that it may sharpen the awareness of students of our responsibilities to the generations to follow ours and to the earth itself. It may even last as proof to our successors, struggling with the tribulations we bequeath to them, that at the end of the twentieth century some of their predecessors were not unconcerned with this heritage."

Full performance of Southern Harmony premieres in NYC

Prof. Duckworth's choral piece to be performed tonight in Weis

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Southern Harmony, the creation of William Duckworth, professor and chair of the music department, premiered in its entirety last Thursday at New York City's Merkin Concert Hall. Performing the piece were the Gregg Smith Singers and the Rooke Chapel Choir.

The 70-minute choral piece was composed between 1980-81, taking almost a year to write. Southern Harmony is the companion piece to The Time Curve Preludes , a one-hour piano piece that is Duckworth's most well-known work. The Gregg Smith Singers and Rooke Chapel Choir will be performing Southern Harmony again tonight in the Weis Center at 8 p.m. Tickets are $5 and available at the Weis Center box office.

Southern Harmony is based on the old style of shaped-note singing that began in the United States in the 19th century. According to Duckworth, the shaped-note method was a way of teaching people to sing. This method began in New England, gradually spread to the South, and then disappeared at the beginning of the 20th century. "The method was simple and complex at the same time," Duckworth stated. People would memorize the tones that each shape represented. When singing hymns, they would first sing the piece through with the shapes, then use the words. The shaped-note style was revived in the 1960's. During this time, large college campuses often had shaped-note singing groups. The University of Illinois, where Duckworth studied, was one such campus. "I didn't think I'd heard shaped music before," Duckworth commented. "Then I realized I'd grown up on it."

The choral work is based on 20 songs from an 1854 edition of Southern Harmony , a collection of shaped-note hymns compiled by William Walker. When writing the piece, Duckworth would usually work for six to seven hours a day, first singing through each of the 20 shaped-note hymns on which Southern Harmony is based. "The melodies are rarely heard in Southern Harmony ; they are hidden within the texture of the piece," Duckworth explained, adding that the 20 pieces that make up Southern Harmony are all new pieces, not arrangements of the earlier hymns.

Southern Harmony has been performed many times in parts. Last Thursday's concert in New York was the first full performance of the work; tonight's Weis Center concert will be the second. The piece was originally commissioned by the Wesleyan Singers of Wesleyan University in Middletown, Connecticut. The Wesleyan group premiered Books One and Two of Southern Harmony in 1981 and 1982 under the direction of Neely Bruce. Books Three and Four of the choral work were first performed in 1986 and 1987 by the BBC Northern Singers under the direction of Terry Edwards and Ward Swingle, respectively.

During the past week, Duckworth has been busy recording Southern Harmony with the Gregg Smith Singers at the Weis Center. This will be the first full recording of the piece. The compact disc of Southern Harmony will be released later this year by Lovely Music Ltd. Duckworth credited the Bucknell Association for the Arts for helping to fund part of the recording process.

The composer also praised the Rooke Chapel Choir for its part in the performance of Southern Harmony , saying, "the chapel choir is doing an excellent job; everybody thinks so." The New York Times was in agreement. In the Feb. 24 edition, the Choir was singled out for their performance. "The young university singers sung their more straightforward parts cleanly and affectingly."

Bulgarian choir to sing tomorrow

As proof that music is truly a universal language, The Bulgarian State Female Vocal Choir will perform Le Mystère Des Voix Bulgares, a program of traditional folk songs in six-part harmony, at 8 p.m. tomorrow in the Weis Center. The 24-member choir is composed of village women selected for their vocal ability. Joining traditional folk melodies with sophisticated harmonies and compelling rhythms, the women perform in native costume, bringing to the stage a musical style that is both centuries-old and brand new .Tickets for the performance can be purchased for $5 with a BU I.D. at the Weis Center box office.

Library series invites readers to return to pleasure reading

BY KRISTIE ROBSON

Have you ever thought about what forces have influenced you? Was it a teacher or a parent? Or maybe a book? The Ellen Bertrand Library is currently sponsoring the series "Books that Made a Difference," which presents an informal lecture each month by various staff members on books that deeply influenced their lives. The series presents an unique opportunity to identify with the speakers on a personal level, gearing away from a traditional academic environment. The talks will be given at noon in the traditional reading room of the library on Mar. 19, Apr. 10, and May 1. The series is open to the public, and refreshments will be provided.

In a time when libraries are becoming increasingly technological, Dot Thompson, reference librarian, and Roberta Sims, Assistant to the Director of Library Service, co-creators of the series, felt it was their vision to focus on what really makes a library—books. Books offer a vast amount of insights into the lives of others. They provide a playground for the imagination, offering the catalyst for integrating fantasy with reality. Going after the roots of experience, "Books that Made a Difference" hopes to tap into people's playgrounds.

Elaine Garrett, associate professor of French, will be giving a lecture on Mar. 19, discussing the book Les Nourritures Terrestres by Andre Gide. Garrett's junior year of college abroad was a pivotal point in her life, and her experiences, greatly influenced by books, have had long term significance for her personally, intellectually, and professionally.

Attending one of the lectures leaves a real sense of the power that books have on our lives and how they can shape our futures if we open ourselves to their wisdom.

On Apr. 10, Rick Hartzell, director of physical education and athletics, will be giving a talk on Lake Wobegon Days by Garrison Keillor, a book filled with humorous memories of life in the Midwest and small town anecdotes about food, religion, and people. Hartzell's lecture will be followed on May 1 by Laurie Kutchins, writing tutor, who points to Memories, Dreams, Reflections by C.C. Jung as the book that has influenced her the most.

Discussions begin with a summary of the book to inform those unfamiliar with the work and a short history of the time period in which the book was read by the professor. Often speakers will follow their introduction with props: a background of music, a special quilt, an outfit, or some pictures. The professor will then begin to explain reasons why this book has been so influential in his or her life, whether it was because of a deep question that was answered by the author or perhaps a character worth emulating affected them in a certain way. The discussion is then opened to the group where questions, comments, and similar experiences from audience members are invited. In the end, the audience is likely to feel a bit of comradery with each other and a special bond with the speaker.

The entire series promises to be an enjoyable and relaxing lunch break that will provide insight into the books that influence those who influence you. Mostly, though, it should bring back the value aspect of reading for pleasure. What the series hopes to accomplish is to draw more people into the library, not just to use the computers and copy machines, or even to study, but instead to take advantage of the rich sources of experience on the shelves. Attending one of the lectures leaves a real sense of the power that books have on our lives and how they can shape our futures if we open ourselves to their wisdom.

Be aware of black history all year

History is not compartmentalized. This should be the message of Black History Month; although the month ends tomorrow, the study of black history should not end.

Even Dr. Alem Asres, director of multicultural affairs, admits that the need for Black History Month is unfortunate. In an ideal world the study of history is universal, an examination of interwoven events and traditions. Asres hopes that Black History Month will spark interest and further study, but he also hopes the designation will one day become unnecessary as America becomes truly multicultural.

The success of this year's Black History Month programs at Bucknell, combined with other recent developments, show that the University is making slow progress down the road to cultural equality.

The events in this year's program had a higher attendance than previous years, and not all were African Americans. More non-minority faculty and students are taking an interest in educating themselves, a process we hope will continue long after Feb. 29. Mass Media and the Black Experience, a new course taught by Assistant Professor of History Leslie Patrick-Stamp, has a large enrollment. Partick-Stamp is one of the foremost scholars in African American history, a young field in which her research will make more such courses possible.

Multiculturalism has been a concern of Bucknell's administration for several years, but the success of this class shows that perhaps the message is reaching the students, and students should be given more courses from which to choose.

Professors in all disciplines should also attempt to include in their courses the contributions of people of all races. We are not advocating a quota system on every syllabus, but a consideration of the issue. An example: everyone knows Thomas Edison invented the light bulb, but how many know that Garrett Morgan, a black man, invented the traffic light in 1923? Both were important contributions which made modern urbanization possible. There is often great flexibility in deciding which information is important, and instructors should not rely blindly on the traditional canons. The History Department has been very progressive in its approach, but not every Bucknell student will take a history course. The same consideration must be given in all departments.

The University has been considering the addition of a multicultural requirement for all students. Although there has been much debate on the form such a requirement should take, we believe discussion itself is a good sign that the University is concerned about such issues.

Many white Americans believe that black history somehow doesn't apply to them. American history is a combination of the history of all Americans. Being a part of the majority does not excuse you from learning about the minority.

Racial harmony is the ultimate goal, and understanding and acceptance are the keys to reaching that goal. We commend the University for raising the issue and taking positive steps.

However, there is still a long, long way to go. The University must sustain and increase its efforts in promoting multiculturalism. The end of Black History Month should be a time to increase those efforts, so that the benefits can be extended across the year. We think Bucknell is up to the task.

Reaganite criticizes "liberal musings"

TO THE EDITOR:

I have to say that I am continually amazed at the liberal musings that pass for intelligent analysis in the Bucknellian's pages. To comment on all of them in last week's Bucknellian would take too long. However, one whine appears repeatedly in pieces that seek to defame Ronald Reagan and his great legacy. That is, our problems today are due to the "greed of the '80s." This wail is extremely popular among the buffoons of Coleman, one of whom told me that the increase in cocaine use during the '80s was the result of increased supply, courtesy of the Reagan-Bush-North-CIA folk, and increased demand caused by, of course, evil Reagan greed. Let it be known that per-capita charitable contributions in this country were higher under Reagan's presidency than at any other time in recent history.

In response to Stephen Wise's contention that evil Reagan greed has also caused the recession, newsflash: George Bush, in collusion with the Democrats, has raised taxes. However, our economic malaise is symptomatic of a more serious malady afflicting American business. American business cannot put money into research when it has to spend it on lawyers who fend off gratuitous lawsuits from pesky special interest groups such as environmentalists, minorities, Ralph Nader, et al. Democrats depend on these groups for their election. God help us the day a Democrat, like a buzzard from Hell, descends upon our nation's Presidency to "solve" our economic problems.

Finally, I can't quit without commenting on the peculiar liberal hypothesis that Reagan was elected due to the hypnosis induced on the American people by the "Great Orator" effect. I think that any one of the Kennedy clan would provide a much more illustrative example.

"Coffee with Alice" is not very palatable

TO THE EDITOR:

In last week's "Coffee With Alice" column, the author (Mr. Larson) is dismayed and angered by what he sees as attacks perpetrated by the conservative faction of our government on our constitutional right to free speech. It is interesting that Mr. Larson sees attempts by the conservatives of our nation to impose their sense of morality upon the citizens of the United States of America as violations of the First Amendment. But when he uses the same sorts of tactics to impose his moral judgments on our society, he sees nothing wrong.

Mr. Larson needs to understand that in our diverse world, there are always going to be people that hold different viewpoints than his, and that there are always going to be people who express these different viewpoints. The freedom of speech afforded to us by the First Amendment makes no value judgments on what is being said. Rather, it protects the speech of those holding the predominant views of the time as well as the speech of those holding fringe viewpoints.

Without the First Amendment, the great advances in civil rights seen throughout the latter half of this century would never exist. Mr. Larson, I ask you, what do you think would have happened in the '60s to the civil rights movement if the rights activists didn't have the constitutional right to free speech and the constitutional right to assemble? Our constitution protected their right to express what was at that time a non-majority viewpoint, and gave them the opportunity to eradicate much of the racism in our country. Without the protection of our constitution, the ideas of multiculturism and political correctness would not even exist in the United States today.

The simple fact of the matter is that ANY violation of freedom of speech, whether done for conservative ideals or liberal ideals, sets the precedent for even more violations of the rights of the citizens of our nation. I fear for the day when our nation is forced into silence. Mr. Larson, don't push us toward that day.

The road to the White House...

Will Buchanan pass Bush on the right?

BY JOHN SHIRE

Patrick Buchanan won an unexpected percentage of the votes in the New Hampshire primary with 43 percent of the votes to President Bush's 56 percent. Some people may view this as a victory for Buchanan since he was able to win a higher than expected number of "undecided" voters. What does this mean? Well, maybe the question should be, where does this leave Bush? In the deep. Bush had better make some smart economic plans to lift the nation from its doldrums, and he had better do it fast. If Buchanan was able to do so well, in comparison to Bush, then who knows what can happen in the rest of the campaign.

Buchanan is moderately successful at this stage because he is sticking to the Republican agenda, while Bush has deviated horribly from it. Bush's killers were the "Environmental Bill" and the "Quota Bill." Each bill provides for moderate policies that are certainly not part of the Republican agenda. The "Environmental Bill" will force industry to make drastic changes in cooling systems which supposedly kill the ozone layer, thus injuring business. Unfortunately for Bush, studies have found that the ozone layer is not dwindling as previously thought. It opens and closes from time to time, and this can in no way be solely attributed to gases emitted from air conditioners. Studies have also found that methane gas from cows is potentially more dangerous than gases from cooling systems in terms of depleting ozone. The "Quota Bill" is ludicrous because it will provide for an "adequate number" of minorities and women for positions in government agencies. Proper policy and Republican policy has always been that the best individual for the job should get the position whether that person is white, American Indian, Black, Hispanic, Indian, or Asian. How does this affect us? It means that striving to be the best nowadays does not matter. What matters is race. The "Quota Bill" is actually condoning racism and sexism because it provides for the assumption that employers are automatically racist and sexist, and that they will hire white males if they can. Many of my closest friends are minorities, and I know that they would like to be able to succeed because of hard work and achievement, rather than because of their skin color.

Because of his blunders, Bush may only be able to leap ahead of Buchanan in the polls, rather than merely leading him, through a dynamic economic plan. Since many are quick to criticize and slow to provide solutions, I shall offer one idea that I have found, through research, that makes sense. Donald Lambro, who writes for the Conservative Chronicle, suggests following a model based on venture capital companies which are new, small-to-midsized businesses funded by a network of investors from individuals, pension funds, and banking companies. Over 250 of these firms grew at 30 percent less investment than the Fortune 500 and created 58,000 highly skilled jobs while their assets rose an average of 23 percent a year. Lambro interprets this as meaning, "The path out of this recession is through tax incentives to unlock the capital investment needed to finance the new ventures that are going to become the Apple Computer, Compaq, Sun Microsystems, and Federal Express companies of the future." The Governor of Massachusetts, William Weld (R) has taken measures to follow this model of venture investment and has cut back on state spending and actually reduced income tax rates. As a result, he has brought his state back from fiscal ruin. It would not be difficult for our Federal government to take the same measures, and Buchanan would not hesitate to help business ventures. He may very well have a chance.

As students we should be aware of the options available to our government because our own economic survival is at stake. Specifically, we must know how the candidates plan to control Federal spending, utilize taxes, and how they can improve the economy. Listen to Bush. Listen to Buchanan and for those who are liberal, please keep an open mind to new ideas because the recession can get worse.

Feminists are women's worst nightmare

BY MICHAEL WARDELL

What if George Bush, President—and international symbol—of the United States told the world that he was having a homosexual affair with a man, while remaining happily married to Barbara? Patricia Ireland, president of the National Organization for Women (NOW) has essentially said just that. She admitted to the press that, while married for 25 years to a Miami man, she has a female "companion" in the Washington D.C. area.

NOW turned 25 years old last January. NOW claims to be the voice of American women. But critics, most of them female, believe NOW is merely a fringe movement, promoting a radical, lesbian lifestyle while alienating its former constituency. Consider the following:

• The leading journal of American feminism, Ms., is edited by a woman who thinks most of the "decently married bedrooms across America are settings for nightly rape."

• (from Margaret O'Brien Steinfels, editor of Commonweal): "[The women's movement's] claim to legitimacy, its declaration that it represents all women, is based on an all-encompassing explanation for the plight of women—in other words, men. [The movement has adopted] an ideology of victimhood—stories that focus on destruction, on humiliation of females by males."

• In a Dec. 17 issue of The Advocate, a national magazine for homosexuals, a NOW official said lesbian membership could be "safely" put at 40 percent.

"NOW is being true to itself by proudly affirming its lesbian identity at its birthday celebration," says Beverly LaHaye, president of Concerned Women for America (CWA). CWA, with 600,000 members, is more than twice as large as NOW (250,000 members). This makes CWA the largest women's movement in America. Says LaHaye: "When will the media be honest and stop pretending that NOW represents more than a militant fringe of womanhood?"

According to Sally Quinn, of The Washington Post, "the leaders of NOW are the domestic equivalents of Communist Party apparatchiks in the former Soviet Union: ideological dinosaurs, remote from the needs of their constituency, who should step down and let other people take over... The truth is that many women have come to see the feminist movement as anti-male, anti-child, anti-family, and anti-feminine. And therefore it has nothing to do with us."

Unfortunately for NOW, the original goals of the women's revolution (i.e., equal opportunity and equal pay) are now mainstream issues. In 1988, one of George Bush's campaign slogans was: "The amount of money women should earn, for one dollar a man earns in the same job, is one dollar." Mainstream groups have usurped NOW's original agenda, leaving their apparatchiks groping for new issues. As NOW turns ever more radical, women are shunning its goals and the feminist cause. In fact, according to a Y.C.S./CNN survey, only 33 percent of women "identify with a feminist label, with 58 percent rejecting it."

Groups such as NOW operate with a strange assumption: women are monolithic. NOW implies that their one-sided agenda reflects the breadth of women's views. The idea that 100 percent of women in America can agree on a set of issues is as strange as saying "you all think alike."

Fortunately, common sense prevails. Look at the demographics: Our population is 52 percent female. Therefore, more than half of the potential votes come from women. An issue that delivers more than half of the votes is an issue that gets a candidate elected. Therefore, "women's issues" ought naturally to dominate American politics. Why then do feminist political parties always receive abysmally low percentages of the vote?

American women are much smarter than Ms. Ireland gives them credit. They do not necessarily see male/female relationships as zero-sum, where one side can gain only at the expense of the other. They do not vote with their gonads. American women are intelligent and diverse, and too often they are embarrassed by the shrieks from the knee-jerk chauvinists at NOW.

Art professor finds Wardell's column insensitive

TO THE EDITOR:

We live in a sexist/heterosexist society, and we must come to a realization that there are automatic privileges, freedoms, and benefits that are extended to some groups that are not enjoyed by others. Often those that have the privileges take them for granted and think everyone has the same experiences.

In a sexist society women live with fear on a daily basis — fear of rape, assault, and sexual abuse. To say "Sticks and stones may break your bones, but words will never hurt you," is a terribly insensitive response to the issue of sexual harassment. Words are actions and the result of a conscious decision. Words are often preambles to more violent actions.

What is the spirit of a liberal education, and why should sexual harrassment remain unchallenged? In my 17 years of college teaching I have not been able to understand why violent, derogatory remarks made from a consciousness dominated by hate and bigotry have anything to do with a liberal education. A liberal education should be a gradual expansion of consciousness characterized by mutual understanding, awareness, and respect.

Drugs influence music, politics through the '90's

"While the fire light's aglow
Strange shadows from the flames will grow,
Till things we've never seen
Will seem familiar."
—Robert Hunter

For those who were attuned to it, (or fixated on it), it all started in the late eighties. There was Edie Brickell, and Cowboy Junkies. Then came Lenny Kravitz, and that Deadicated album. The eighties are gone. The early seventies are back. Deee-Lite touring with Bootsie Collins. Yeah. It's all coming full circle. There's another war that has to be stopped. Another corrupt government that has to fall. The more things change, the more I realize how cyclical it all is.

I guess I should backtrack a bit. There were of course, the Beats. They were a very creative and disenfranchised bunch. They drank a lot, smoked a lot of cigarettes. They did a lot of bennies too. Speed. Basically, like most creative movements in this century, they did a lot of drugs. Whenever possible, really. And one of the main drugs they did was herb. "Hey, roll another stick of tea, man. Let's smoke it and dig our kicks." Cool.

And it was all going nicely until the CIA stepped in. They attempted to make a drug that that would transform normal people into fearless, guiltless, superhuman killing machines. What they came up with was a clear, odorless, tasteless liquid called LSD. Ken Kesey and the tail end of the Beats tried it and the merry pranksters were born. They tripped merrily through the early sixties and got others hip to it. (Tim Leary at Columbia, telling everyone to drop out, turn on, and tune in.) Predictably the East Coast came into it all from an intellectual approach. But what about the West Coast?

Political Movement

In the mid-sixties there were two major youth movements around the greater San Francisco area. One was the political Berkeley movement, starting with Free Speech and moving to the war. Another was the hippy movement, whose members' non-political attitudes were in many ways more political than the protestors. They both had become disillusioned with straight society. Straight thinking. Beta waves (more about those later.) Old ideas. The chief Business of America is Business. Calvin Coolidge said that in '26, I think. By '66, the kids had stopped believing it. War, of course, was then as it is now, good for business. And those little baby boomers couldn't hang with that either. And around San Fran, there were two distinct ideas as to how to stop it all.

Berkeley is a fine university where they mold young minds. Mold mold mold. Anyway, a few young minds took all the political theory—that no one takes too seriously—a little too seriously. Why, they asked, if we live in America, and America follows the precepts of the Constitution, and the First Amendment in the Bill of Rights gives all U.S. citizens the freedom of speech, do we as Berkeley students not have this freedom? Ponder ponder. The Free Speech movement was born. The students made speeches. They attended rallies. They held sit-ins. They demanded that their voices be heard. They wanted political reform. And, although they were opposed by the administration, and by the governor of California, Ron Reagan, the faculty was on the side of the students and the Free Speech movement won.

However, the students weren't satisfied. After all, they had a war to stop. And the tactics they adopted to stop it were the same liberal peaceful demonstrations that they used against the university. But this time they weren't going against the administration of Berkeley, they were going against the Administration of Johnson. And the U.S. Armed Forces. And big business. The government saw young leftwing students across the country opposing them and they responded the way that one responds when one feels threatened and one's brain is stuck on a Beta wave. Don't let 'em push you around! They subtly turned the view of straight America against their own kids. (A view which the Partnership for a Drug-Free America echoed in the late '80s.) Like Oedipus at the crossroads, the old King wouldn't step aside. But unlike Oedipus, the student Left, even the radicals: Weatherman in New York, the yippies in Berkeley, the Black Panthers of Oakland...none of them were strong enough to kill the King. The student left tried political reform and they ended up with riot squads on the campus of Berkeley. Nixon in the White House. The National Guard at Kent State, and grass almost impossible to find.

Hippies

This last situation was more of a response of the government to hippies than to the student left. The hippies hung out in San Fran. In the early '60's the pranksters were dosing everyone they could find. They were holding acid tests. This was all before acid became illegal. They had the Fillmore Auditorium with Bill Graham, and this house band playing called the Warlocks, which had evolved from Mother Mcree's Uptown Jug Band. Sometime around June 15 of 1965 they changed their name to the Grateful Dead. They were hanging out at Haight Ashbury, and their patron and sound engineer's name was Owlsly or Bear. He made the best acid around so it was a nice set up. Other bands started popping up. The Jefferson Airplane, Moby Grape, Country Joe and the Fish, the Buffalo Springfield. People didn't come to the Haight for the politics, they came for the drugs. And, the feelings, music, vibes, and ideas that the drugs inspired.

Hippies didn't believe in working really, so they were chronically poor. There was always grass around and LSD was often free. Alcohol cost money so Heads had no use for it. Coke, Horse, ludes and reds were around but none of them were as free and easy as pot and acid. And the Haight was a carnival. Street musicians, body painting, groovy clothing psychedelic colors. And Alpha waves. (Is it starting to make some sense?) So, with pot and acid opening up people's minds, they became attuned to a new spirituality. Of course, there is nothing new under the sun. This was essentially the same trip that the Taoists and even Emerson was into, but it had been dormant in this country for quite some time. By the '60s, the youth of America had been raised on TV, after all. And as Jerry Rubin pointed out, we all knew what our major concerns were. Which deodorant do we use? And what about mouthwash? Straight society had been covering itself up and hiding how we smell and look and feel and act and all of a sudden a bunch of kids, tripping on LSD and living in the streets began not bathing or being concerned with politics. They decided for themselves, without reading the Communist Manifesto or Mao's Red Book—like their Berkeley cousins—that there is no reason to be competitive. If you have some money or food or pot or a place to crash, you share it freely. And other people will share theirs with you. There is no reason not to love one another. No reason not to do what you feel. And if you're always stoned or tripping, you're not going to go out of your way to hurt somebody. They were—as some Berkley friends articulated it—Living the Revolution. And it was working.

Summer of Love

By 1967, "the summer of love," kids were coming to the Haight by the truckload. They were dropping out of school, running away from home and living in the streets. And they were scaring the hell out of straight America.

Since the Kennedy assassination it has been easy to see the direct ties between the Mafia and the US government. J. Edgar Hoover emphatically denying the existence of the Cosa Nostra. The same Mafia that has, with the government's blessing, controlled the Heroin trade in this country since the '30s. By 1968 the government cracked down on pot and heroin poured into the Nation's cities. All of a sudden, the only drug you could always find on the street was smack. And if some heads want to deal some herb, and they don't get busted by the heat, they wind up in the S.F. bay. It's all economics. Supply and demand. Create the demand, control the supply.

Colin Bridgewater—The Bucknellian

"The early seventies are back. It's all coming full circle. The more things change, the more I realize how cyclical it all is."

So, let's run down the bands. 1968. Janis is on smack. Jimi, maybe. John Lennon, yes. Neil Young, definitely. David Crosby, of course. Lou Reed and Velvet Underground? Since '65 at least. 1969. Led Zep, the Allman Brothers, the Stones, Eric Clapton. By the seventies it was almost impossible to find a band that wasn't on smack. Think about it. Communes didn't work. The war didn't stop. Jimi was dead. So was Janis. The Beatles were done. The scene was too heavy, politics didn't change. Nixon beat McGovern in '72. Just forget about it. Try to cop a fix. Maybe see a show. It was all getting really depressing.

Then a weird thing happened. Nixon went too far. No one ever knew just how much the White House had been involved in hard core felonies. Since JFK had been assassinated in '63 things looked sketchy. Then Martin Luther King and RFK both got it in '68 but nobody wanted to believe that our government was made up of a bunch of goons. But, of course, it was. And by 1974, everybody knew it. It was on TV every day. Of course, only a small fraction of what they

College: A time for drug experimentation?

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Ah, yes—that mellow, numb, squinty-eyed feeling. Almost half of the student population that The Bucknellian surveyed has experienced it at least once in their young lives. And it wasn't alcohol that made them feel so free, but instead, drugs.

Of the experimenters and regular users of illegal substances, all have tried marijuana. Thirty percent of the curious have tried mushrooms, and 15% have dropped acid. No one reported use of crack, cocaine, or heroin.

Curiosity, not peer pressure, was the reason that most students decided to try drugs for the first time. As one freshman female remembered, "They (drugs) were available. I figured I should try it once and see what all the fuss is about." Another "scientist" wanted "to see what would happen to his body." After the initial high, many continued to use drugs because as one junior male said, "It feels good."

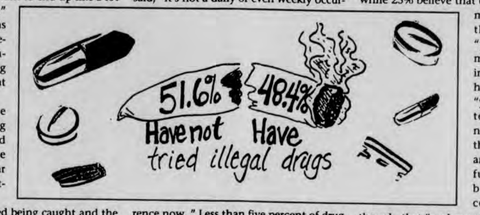
Reasons for not experimenting or indulging include athletics, waste of money, lack of desire, fear of harm to the body, and lack of availability of the drugs. One sophomore female abstained from drug use because she "didn't want to end up like a lot of (her) friends." Another female has not tried drugs because she is "content with drinking and having fun that way."

While no one admitted to being presently addicted to drugs, 17% of the users did voice a fear of becoming addicted in the future.

One-third feared being caught and the consequences that they would in turn face. One freshman male worries about being caught because, as he said, "the smell (of marijuana) gets all over the place.

Addiction nor the risk of stiff penalties will deter 27% of users from giving up their "habit" after college graduation.

The majority of users probably won't smoke marijuana or use other drugs after life at Bucknell because as one senior male said, "It's not a daily or even weekly occurrence now." Less than five percent of drug users take them on a daily basis.



Ten percent use drugs once a week or on the weekends. The majority of the users just take drugs on special or random occasions.

This usage pattern could stem from the majority of students' belief that marijuana is harmful to their bodies—more harmful than alcohol. Fifteen percent feel that the two substances are equally as damaging, while 25% believe that drinking alcohol is more dangerous than smoking "pot." One senior male thinks drinking alcohol is more harmful because "you do it more often." Another senior male feels that the two substances are equally as harmful because "they both kill brain cells." He feels, though, that "we have a lot to spare."

Are these typical college responses?

Given that college historically has been the place to experiment with drugs and the fact that in 1990, 75% of high school seniors admitted to having tried marijuana, Bucknell's statistics do not seem abnormally high or low. Whether they are worrisome depends entirely upon your personal beliefs.

UVA used as example, colleges not immune from drug busts

Penalties for possession

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Do you think that you can't get busted for doing drugs on campus? Do you think of yourself as immune to the harsh reality of paying fines or doing time for your illegal activities? That's what the good ole' boys at UVA thought until Federal Narcotics Agents staked out the campus and made 13 arrests.

On Mar. 21, 1991, 13 students at the University of Virginia (UVA) in Charlottesville were arrested in connection with what authorities called an on-going drug problem in the area. The March raid was the largest involving narcotics ever mounted at an American university. While police admitted using UVA to set an example for other colleges and universities, they argue that the school was given several warnings about drug activity on campus.

Along with several bags of marijuana and LSD, three fraternity houses, Tau Kappa Epsilon, Delta Upsilon, and Phi Epsilon, were seized in the raid. The houses have since been returned to the Alumni. At one point though, the houses were going to be sold as federal property.

Officials announced that the offenses carried prison terms of up to 130 years and $6.5 million in fines. Federal law requires judges to impose sentence of about one year for people without a record.

The harsh crackdown at UVA stirs up several questions concerning the drug policy for Bucknell under the Crime Codes of Pennsylvania. Any person who violates one or more provisions of clauses under "The Controlled Substance, Drug, Device and Cosmetic Act" is subject to fines, prison terms, or both.

Possession of less than 30 grams (28 grams are in an ounce) of marijuana carries a fine of up to $500 and/or a maximum jail term of 30 days. Possession of more than 30 grams of marijuana is considered a misdemeanor and a first-time offender must face a jail term not exceeding one year and/or a $5,000 fine.

Possession with the intent to deliver marijuana is a felony that carries a five-year prison term and/or a $15,000 fine. Possession with the intent to deliver cocaine is a felony as well and carries a $250,000 fine and up to 15 years in prison.

Houses and cars may also be seized if sufficient evidence proves that the house or car was used to buy or sell drugs.

Despite student beliefs, a college campus does not provide a sanctuary for drug trafficking. Drug activity carried out on or near school property actually draws an added penalty.

Don't let yourself be surprised like our counterparts at UVA. They weren't feeling too mellow the day that their names appeared in national papers announcing their crimes.

What the health is going on?

What really happens when you smoke marijuana

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI

You're at a party. The lights are dimmed, the music is playing and you're feeling reeeal nice. You're about to sip your drink, but someone passes you a joint instead, so you go for that. You inhale the intoxicating smoke, and as you do you start to feel reeeal nice. You're smiling at everybody and seem to be on top of the world... Let's fast forward the scene a little bit. A couple of hours later, do you know what all the chemicals in that intoxicating smoke did to your body? And if you knew, would you think it was worth it? And how come you're not feeling so good anymore?

Aside from the well-known effects of drugs (heart attacks, kidney failure, liver failure, and lung disease, to name a few) there are many other effects, both long and short term, which are equally as harmful. Not all of these effects are physical, either. Chronic drug users face more functional and psychological problems as a result of drug use; and what's worse is that they can't even recognize these problems, let alone admit to their addiction. Social relationships as well as those in the workplace may break down as a result of the change in behavior experienced by many drug users. As the communications diminish between friends and colleagues, the addict may try to "escape" from everyday problems and become even more introverted. It is here that close friends may recognize a problem, which is eventually attributed to drugs. The user becomes more and more dependent, until he becomes compulsive, and finally addicted to the drug.

We have all heard stories about people who have tried to help someone who was on drugs. This is called "enabling" in the illness of chemical dependency. According to one rehabilitation center, enabling is defined as, "any action taken by a concerned person that removes or softens the effect of a harmful consequence of chemical use upon the user." Because it hides the symptoms, enabling makes the problem worse, rather than solving it. Common examples are bailing users out of jail, giving them "one more chance," ignoring the addiction because users gets defensive when asked about it, lending them money or a place to stay, and lying or making excuses for them. While the denial is the most confusing aspect of the problem from an outsider's point of view (because it seems so obvious that there is a problem), users will swear :"I can quit at any time!" Enabling, while natural and even automatic, only strengthens this denial. The relationship is in a way symbiotic; the user needs the attentions of the enabler, just as the enabler needs to feel that he is continuing to be the one who is "helping a friend."

Of course, while all these problems are occurring socially, psychologically, and emotionally, the physical effects are wreaking havoc in the user's body. Physical behavior is a direct result of how the brain processes the information provided by the environment. When users are on a high, they are not able to respond as they normally would to environmental stimuli. Thus their behavior is seen as inappropriate. Poor motor control is also a result, as well as slow response. When these effects are acute (i.e., they are not "tripping") addicts think that they can function normally, but that is not always the case, since the chronic effects are so much worse.

Drugs such as marijuana cause anxiety, increased heart rate, reddening of the eyes, and dryness of the mouth and throat. It also temporarily impairs memory, sense of time, concentration, and enhances the senses. It has been proven that marijuana interferes with learning by impairing thinking, reading comprehension, and verbal and arithmetic skills. It also stunts social skills and promotes escapism. Chronic marijuana use also leads to a reduction in sex drive, as it causes a decrease in testosterone levels, and reduces fertility in women as well.

While drugs may seem like a good way to have a good time or to avoid a situation, their long term effects are something to contend with. The pleasure/pain principle is certainly a factor, in that the immediate effects may seem beneficial, but in the long run there is nothing but pain.

If you wear Birkenstocks, do you use drugs?

BY BUD J. FRYE

When the topic of drugs comes up, people who haven't tried them love to tell horror stories. They love to categorize all drug users into one neat, little package. All the non-users think they are experts. The idea that all drug users can be classified into one group is absurd though. Not everyone who "does drugs" is a coke fiend. Nor do all users have a "drug problem." In fact, not all drug users are even of the "weird, crunchy, granola" variety. And for that matter, not all "natural" people who participate in events and programs like Earth Day and Amnesty International are drug users. Still though, and I know it's hard to believe, some Bucknell students have stereotypes, and sometimes, they judge other people by them.

First and foremost around campus, there is "THE DEADHEAD COMPLEX." This is the wild belief that anyone who has long hair, dresses like a hippie, and listens to the Dead smokes pot. My mother suffers from this and amazingly, so does most of this country.

Coupled with the Deadhead affliction is "BRAIN-DAMAGE PHOBIA" (the intense fear that after one hit of grass, your mind will never be the same). Of these top two drug stereotypes, the first is a product of history, the second was created by the television. "This is your brain. This is your brain on drugs. ANY QUESTIONS?" Needless to say, people grew up on the TV, and unfortunately, everything the TV says is assumed to be true.

Branching from the creation of these beliefs are the myths. Did you know that if you smoke the "kind bud," you'll go sterile? You'll definitely suffer from extreme laziness and short-term memory loss. Even worse, you might end up in a mental institution thinking you're an orange and the world is trying to peel you. It happens all the time. Didn't you see that episode of "21 Jump Street?" If you go to a Dead Show, everybody is smoking. (But isn't that true at every concert?) The FBI will keep a file on you. (Maybe they should call the Office of Res Life for some pointers.) Basically you'll become a failure in everything you do. If by some miracle you do succeed, you'll never be elected to public office. That's my favorite. It's remarkable what people can come up with.

Here are a few suggestions if you don't want people to think you smoke ganja: Don't grow your hair. Don't listen to the Dead, reggae (especially Marley), the Alman Brothers, Crosby, Stills and Nash, or anything else from the Sixties. Don't surf. Don't wear Birkenstocks or any other form of sandals (especially with socks). Whatever you do, don't wear tie-dyes. Don't be a liberal. Don't believe in peace, human rights, or the environmental movement. If you're a woman, wear make-up and always shave your legs. Don't rent Pink Floyd's "The Wall" or Oliver Stone's "The Doors." Don't read any of Hunter S. Thompson's books. Don't buy too much incense at the bookstore. Don't take Buddhism, and most importantly, don't ever, EVER be seen with anyone who satisfies any of these qualifications.

These are just a few of the countless stereotypes that surround drugs. To list them all would take hours. The point is that people who shun drugs such as marijuana will believe anything they want. People can believe what they will, but if they are going to pass judgment on others, they should make sure that the judgments are their own, and not the thoughts of someone else.

"Ryan Smith, Come on down!"

"You're the next contestant on The Price Is Right"— Bob Barker meets Bucknell

BY KRISTINA SCHURR

The studio lights glared. The audience cheered as Bob Barker smiled, taking a breath before announcing the next contestant's name. "Ryan Smith, will you come on down!" A young man wearing a Bucknell football shirt stood up and slowly made his way down to Contestant's Row, smiling broadly. This Bucknell senior, from East Liverpool, Ohio, was the next contestant on The Price Is Right.

Ryan Smith's mother had sent for tickets to be in The Price is Right's audience. When the tickets arrived over January, Ryan, his mother and a few of her friends hopped on an airplane to Hollywood, California on Jan. 12. The following morning they awoke at 3 a.m. in order to be at the television studio by 6:00. They needed to be among the first group of 300 people to get there, if they wanted to be a member of the audience for the first of the day's two shows. So they waited in line for two hours and finally received a name tag—their claim to a seat for that game show.

When the 300 people returned to the studio after a two-hour break, they were divided into groups of ten and each given a five second interview with the show's producer. Smith remembers saying, "My name is Ryan Smith, and I am a senior at Bucknell University. I play football, and I'm a finance major. After graduation, I'm going to attend law school." Smith explained, "The purpose of this interview was to give the producer an idea about which members of the audience would be best for Contestant's Row."

Smith was excited to hear his name called. He said, "It was a big surprise when they called my name, but I guess I was trying to play it cool. I knew there would be lots of people watching this back at school." He was right. When the show was aired on Feb. 19, there were many Bucknellians watching the program, including Smith himself. "We were all down at the FIJI house watching it, and I'm told that it was also on the TV at the Bison. It was very weird to see myself on TV. Everybody kept coming up to me later and saying that they saw me. They were all so amazed that I had been on the show."

When the program was aired, more than a few students were impressed with Smith's giving Bucknell some national recognition. "It was neat to see our name out there," remarked Hash Dadarwala '92. Football player Pat Feeley '95 added, "It was really exciting because I know him from football. I wish he had won though."

According to Smith, being a member of the studio audience is much different from watching the show on television. Smith said, "The stage is much smaller than it looks on TV. When you're watching it at home it seems as if there are three games going on at once. But there's really only one. During the commercials they roll the different games and showcases on and off the stage." Smith also added that the audience and contestants are able to talk to Bob Barker and ask him questions during the commercial intermissions. As for what he thought of the "Barker's Beauties," Smith said, "They're OK, but they all wear a lot of makeup."

So how did Ryan Smith do at The Price is Right? "We were bidding for a car," he remarks, "and I bid $900. But this old lady next to me bid $901 and she got it. I got some consolation prizes though. I got a pair of $375 Cazal sunglasses, $25 in cake mix, and $25 in vitamins."

were into came out, but that was enough to make King Richard resign.

After that, America was fed up with the old school repressive society. Carter hit the White House and recreational drugs made a comeback. So did excess in general. Cocaine, disco, blow-dried hair, Cadillacs, hot tubs, casual sex. But what was lacking was a true spiritual grounding.

The seventies gave way to the eighties and the fluff of disco was replaced by the fury and belligerent simplicity of the heroin fueled Punk movement. A brief flame of defiance but in the end, Punk was just sound and fury, signifying nothing. New Wave tried to take up the slack but it got bogged down in technology and lost all the soul and power of the Punk movement.

Through it all, coke was king. Unlike smack, which was never too expensive for even the most stone-cold junkie (although it was always just expensive enough), coke is a drug for the rich and trendy. Ever since the USSR invaded Afghanistan and cracked down on the heroin trade there, smack was hard to find and coke was everywhere. But, while junkies are complacent and unproductive, coke fiends aren't. They need a lot of money and they have too much energy. And in the '80s, coke and Wall Street were joined at the hip. So much so that the White House gave aid to the Contras and protection to Noriega just to bring more blow into the US.

It was all bopping along. Greed was good, Insider trading was cool. Hostile takeovers were in. Power ties and suspenders were everywhere. Then, the Street failed. Black October. The crash. Boesky in jail. Ollie North on TV at the congressional hearings. Reagan claiming such excessive memory loss people began to wonder if he even had a pulse. It started to get ugly, but somehow the powers that be held their shit together enough to get through it all almost unscathed.

But just when they thought it was all cool again, Edie Brickell and Cowboy Junkies popped up. The Dead started releasing albums again. The Allman Brothers went back on the road again. Paul Simon giving concerts in Central Park. The environment became as big of an issue as it had been in 1970 when the first Earth Day was established. And then it became bigger. Recycle. Save the Rainforest. Get rid of Styrofoam. Stop polluting.A Republican's nightmare. And how do they stop it? Bring back smack. Crack down on pot. This current drug war is not geared against coke or crack or ice or smack. It's geared against pot.

So where does that put us? We're in a recession. If we legalize marijuana we could tax it like we do alcohol and tobacco. That would give the government a lot of money. Also we wouldn't have to spend so much money on cops indiscriminately pulling over Heads and African-Americans on the Highway. Or the Coast Guard and border patrols. Or the high-priced, high-tech infra-red helicopter scanners that they use to bust indoor grow rooms.

And hemp, (the unsmokable part of the plant) can make rope which is stronger, cheaper, and cleaner to make than nylon. An acre of hemp produces the same grade and amount of paper as four acres of trees. You can also make fabric similar to (but more durable than) cotton. Hemp grows wild in all fifty states and it could give our farmers who are having a tough time paying their mortgages something to make some money with.

Hemp seed oil can replace fossil fuels to power cars and the like. It burns cleaner and more efficiently than fossil fuels (which is a finite resource anyway). And we would no longer be dependent on OPEC. And since this past Gulf War was fought for oil, we wouldn't have to worry about costly ventures like that in the future. And, every petrochemical product that DuPont makes can be made cheaper and cleaner with hemp. It's also easy on the soil and a great source of biomass to save the ozone.

The only problem is the social question. Ours is an alcoholic society. Just look at Western history. A bunch of drunk guys stumbling around, knocking things over and getting into fights. Beta waves. It all comes back to that so I guess I should explain. OK, here goes. There are two basic types of brain waves: Alpha and Beta. Beta is conscious. Uptight. Don't trust anything. Be tense at all times. Survive. Alpha is much more mellow. More creative. More artistic, more intuitive. Dreams are Alpha waves. Zen is into Alpha waves. If you meditate Zen style, sit perfectly still. Relax. Empty your head. Practice for years—you can get Alpha waves. The only other sure way to get them while you're awake is to smoke pot.

A few years back the Partnership for a Drug-free America ran an advertisement. It was on TV—you may remember it. It showed a brain-wave graph machine. The voice-over said: This is the pattern of the brain waves of a normal thirteen-year-old child. The lines were bopping around. Then, the waves almost completely stopped and the voice-over said: And this is the pattern after just smoking pot. One problem. It was a lie. In fact, the Partnership was called on it, and they admitted that the second graph was that of a comatose patient. They said that they felt it was such an important issue that they had to lie to the public to prove their point. Typical Beta-wave response.

So that's how it stands. The Iran-Contra scandal hasn't completely gone away yet. And Noriega is still getting ready to testify. George Bush has been placed at meetings in 1980 with the CIA and envoys from Tehran to delay the release of the hostages to ensure Carter's defeat. It won't stop him from being re-elected in '92 the same way Watergate didn't stop Nixon in '72. But Nixon didn't make it past '74 and Ford, his bumbling VP, did not win in '76. The more things change the more I realize just how cyclical it all is.

Those Nutty, Nutty Bradys
A New Situation Comedy By David Lynch

RE: New Situation Comedy Pilot
Got a great new idea for a 30 minute sit-com. It blends the light-hearted domestic fun of The Brady Bunch with the symbolic intensity and distorted realism of Twin Peaks. I think it could be a BIG hit! Here's what the pilot looks like.

GREG chases MARSHA around living room, waving chainsaw.
CAROL: (scolding GREG) Now Greg, you know what I've told you about running chain saws at maximum power in the house. Now switch it to medium or you're going to Hell.
GREG: (talking back) Jeez. I'm almost 17 years old. It's about time that I should start getting treated like an adult.
TIGER: (wagging tail and panting) Kibbles and Bits. Kibbles and Bits. I'm gonna get me some Kibbles and Bits. Then I'm gonna find me a good woman.

CAROL: (singing) Hell. Hell. It's clear as a bell.
ALICE, the matronly housekeeper, enters from the kitchen with a steaming plate of doughnuts.
ALICE: Hello, folks! I got some great looking glazed doughnuts here for anyone who wants 'em.
CAROL: Burn in Hell, Alice.

PETER chases SAM,THE ONE ARMED MAN, around the room with the superglue.
MARSHA and CINDY continue to cry. GREG carves initials in floor with chainsaw. BOBBY builds a treehouse, falls out, and sprains his ankle. A tarantuala scurries under the rug.
LAURA PALMER: (hissing) Hsssssssssss. Hsssssssssssss.
ALICE: Now you all cut out that racket, or Mrs. Brady is gonna sentence you to eternal damnation!
CAROL: Thanks, Alice.

Arpillera Exhibit expresses grief of Chilean women through art

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Arpillera Exhibit, a display of handmade cloth tapestries woven by Chilean women, chronicles the economic and social changes in Chile following the military coup of 1973. The works represent a form of art, arpilleras, that combines "grief, social statement, and aesthetic self-expression." The exhibit will be open from Feb. 22 through Mar. 1 from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m. daily in the Langone Center Cave and is co-sponsored by the Bucknell Women's Resource Center and the Association for the Arts.

Organized by the Human Rights Project of the Institute for Policy Studies, a major source of information on human rights conditions in Latin America for over a decade, the exhibit consists of tapestries, photographs of shantytown conditions and activities, testimonies by the authors, and text explaining the history of arpillera-making and the meaning of each tapestry.

The 1973 coup represented the most drastic change in Chilean society ever to take place. Events such as the closing of Parliament, suppression of the labor unions, high unemployment, increased foreign debt, and severe cuts in education, health care, and housing culminated in an era of unforseen hardships. The tapestries were woven by pobladoras—women of shantytowns—whose relatives had disappeared following the coup. Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center and co-ordinator of the exhibit, points to the fact that since these women had little or no access to the media or press, they were forced to express themselves in creative ways. According to Butler, "They created out of grief a core of opposition."

The Arpillera Exhibit in the Langone Center Cave transforms the emotions and feelings of the 1973 coup in Chile into works of art.

The tapestries, made through the use of applique and embroidery, depict various scenes from everyday life, in addition to historical events. Globally renowned as one of the most innovative cultural expressions of recent years, arpilleras offer political, economical, social, and cultural issues brought about by sixteen years of military rule in a different light.

Even though the Chilean government has reverted back to a democratic one and recent reports acclaim "Chile's economic miracle," the country cannot forget the events that have shaped those past sixteen years. Butler states that given the amount of men lost to the civil war, women were relied upon to form an opposition to the government in power, and that the coalitions formed by these women helped bring democracy back to the country.

Butler adds that there are two major points she hopes people will come away with from the exhibit: "an appreciation for different forms of art work since art is not just created by great masters in studios... and that people will recognize that women have played an important role in shaping historical events."

The Human Rights Project adds that, "The arpilleras are memorable both as works of art and as testimonies of women who have organized to defend their rights in the face of repression. Women who once thought they had to remain silent are now speaking out, in their art and in their lives, and their eloquence is an inspiration to people everywhere."

Matthew Sweet's Girlfriend is hot

BY MATTHEW WOOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Copyright 1991— BMG Music

Three is Matthew Sweet's lucky number after being woefully overlooked on his two previous solo albums. Dumped by his label as he completed his third and most recent undertaking, Girlfriend, it took some persuading to get Zoo/BMG to take a chance on him. In fact, this album nearly didn't happen. Fortunately, Sweet's perseverance was worth it. His stronger, more spirited effort has won him the approval of critics and the support of MTV.

Fifties sex symbol Tuesday Weld dons the cover of Girlfriend, and rightfully so, as essentially the entire album devotes itself to the trials and jubilation of romance. Sweet handles all the album's writing and vocals and adeptly so. He is neither graceful nor fluent, but he is true and fresh. Despite lacking what one might call a beautiful voice, he has convincing control over his inflection, at times sounding very vulnerable, as he does on "Thought I Knew You," and when he wants to, very knowing and confident, on such pieces as "Evangeline." Complementing his voice are an array of tough and tender numbers, 15 in all. Delightfully, he finds a balance between the two styles.

Although Sweet clearly carries the load on Girlfriend, he's backed by an impressive band that includes first-rate guitarists Richard Lloyd and Robert Quine. The effects of their potent kick are easily observed on the title track and first single, which incidentally is getting good airplay on MTV as an animated space gala, fashioned after Japanese-made 70's cartoons. Fred Maher and Ric Menck alternate on drums and Llyoyd Cole guest stars on a few numbers, rounding out the line-up.

On the whole, Girlfriend is a compelling shot of retro that's sure to garner Sweet the respect owed to him. It's an album that Sweet himself beckons on the inside cover with hand twisted, "Don't be afraid to play it loud!"

Voices of Joy brings campus to its feet

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Indiana University of Pennsylvania gospel choir, Voices of Joy, performed last Saturday for a small audience at Bucknell Hall. The concert was held in conjunction with celebrations of Black History Month.

The 60-voice choir was formed in October, 1988. Pastor Melvin Jenkins, the director of Voices of Joy, stated, "Our purpose is to sing songs to glorify God."

Voices of Joy is a group that performs with a great deal of emotional intensity. The singers obviously enjoy what they do. They literally feel the music, swaying back and forth, clapping, and smiling as they sing. Members of the audience could see the partially-open grand piano shake and feel the floor vibrate as the voices of the choir reverberated throughout the hall.

At the piano and keyboard was Reverend David Hanson, who Jenkins introduced as a "talented musician and prolific music writer." Hanson wrote and arranged much of the music performed by the choir.

At the encouragement of Jenkins and the choir, the audience readily got into the performance. Spectators were invited to sing and clap along with Voices of Joy. A few of the younger members of the audience danced in the aisle as the group sang.

Following the second number of the concert, Jenkins asked each member of the audience to turn around and shake hands with someone they didn't know in order to establish a feeling of camaraderie and togetherness within the audience. Jenkins did not have to try very hard to find this feeling. The emotion and energy of Voices of Joy were clearly contagious, and after only two songs the audience was infected.

The performance lasted for nearly two hours. Prior to the final number, Jenkins said to the audience, "I don't know about you, but I've had a good time!" The members of the choir echoed their director with cheers of agreement.

A reception was held in Larison Dining Hall following the performance.

Track runs to Lehigh for Championships

Men's team looks to defend its Patriot League Indoor title; women hope to improve upon last season's second-place performance

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Like clockwork, head track coach Art Gulden's teams are peaking for this weekend's Patriot League Championships.

Despite not placing a great deal of individuals among the League's top ten, the Bison men remain the favorites. However, the victory that most of us have come to expect over the past decade may be a little more difficult this year. Lehigh, potentially Bucknell's toughest adversary, impressed Gulden with its strong showing against Lafayette this past weekend.

"They [Lehigh] weren't in their usual comas," said Gulden. "They actually competed and looked good."

Gulden quickly points out that the meet "isn't scored off of the top ten list." Instead, several intangibles such as aggressiveness, competitiveness, and confidence tend to determine the actual outcome.

"For whatever reasons, we've always been able to turn it up come League time. We turn into a different team when there are points up for grabs," stated Gulden.

> "They [Lehigh] weren't in their usual comas. They actually competed and looked good." — Head track coach Art Gulden

The women's team, bride's maids last winter at the inaugural Patriot League Indoor Championships, appears ready to make a run for the top honors. Bucknell's sprinting and hurdling contingency should provide the team with the majority of its points. Tricia Plasko '92 and Tameka Hinton '95 lead a deep and talented corps of sprinters and hurdlers.

Fordham "Superwoman," Lauren Gubicza, is a shoe-in to earn more points than some teams all-together. She alone will keep the Rams in the hunt, while Lafayette will relay on more of a team effort to stay with the other two teams.

Bucknell's outstanding men's cross country team has no League peers and will capture a significant number of points. Colgate's Ray Appenheimer could spoil some Bison sweeps, but will not be enough to lead his team to an overall victory.

The sprinters, hurdlers, and middle-distance runners are, according to Gulden, "peaking and running well." However, the sudden emergence of a second hurdler for the Engineers has caused some alarm in the Bison camp.

Even though Holy Cross is not expected to do anything on the men's or women's side of the ledger, Gulden and the other Patriot League coaches haven't seen any of the Crusaders' results.

"The guy [Holy Cross coach Al Halper] never sends in any results. I have no idea what to expect from them." Gulden added, "But, it doesn't matter because they won't have any influence on the meet. They can't win."

The meet will come down to whoever is able to perform well this weekend. None of the previous season's results will have any bearing on the events. "I'm excited. It should be an interesting day," concluded Gulden.

Hockey melts in post-season heat

BY JENNIFER WALSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell ice hockey team concluded its season this past Monday with a 5-3 loss to Gettysburg College. The game was Bucknell's first and last of the playoffs, as the loss eliminated them from any further competition.

This season marked the first time in several years that the team has made the playoffs. Despite the loss, Bucknell put up a good fight, playing well throughout the entire game. "It could have gone either way," said goalie Alec Altman '94. "It was a close game, and we feel we have nothing to be ashamed of—we just didn't get the breaks we needed."

If nothing else, at least the player attendance was up for Bucknell, as they pulled together a full team for the first time in a long time to play Gettysburg. Unfortunately, the playoff loss marked the final tumble in what has been a downhill season for the Bison, starting out on top of the league and quickly sliding to the bottom.

However, the team expressed hope for the future by regarding the past season as a learning experience. Bucknell will also be losing only two players to graduation. But, as the Mason-Dixon League has changed over the past few years, so must Bucknell change in order to keep up. Most of the other teams in the league have gotten more serious, picking up coaches and practicing more regularly, while Bucknell ice hockey has remained essentially the same.

Though the team is now looking for a coach, it will eventually come down to the players to either make or break the team, as was reflected by Altman's comments. "This year, I think we showed that we could play with anyone in the league with a full team. Now it just depends on getting the leadership and the dedication."

Wrestling concludes dual match season with loss to #13 Cornell

The Bucknell wrestling squad concluded its 1992 dual match season with a 27-9 loss to Cornell University in a match held at Shikellamy High School in Sunbury, PA. The setback followed an outstanding weekend of conference action for the Bison which included a pair of East Coast Wrestling Association victories that solidified the team's second-place standing.

Bolstered by the return of 158-pound Mike Salone '92, the Bison rallied from an early 16-0 deficit to defeat Central Connecticut State 24-22. Bucknell trailed throughout the contest until tri-captain Ben Myers '92 scored a major decision in the heavyweight bout to raise the team's conference mark to 2-1. That mark increased to 3-1 as the Bison grapplers scored a convincing 39-5 victory over Hofstra the following afternoon.

On the strength of a pair of pins and a major decision, Central Connecticut tallied the first 16 points of last Friday's match held in Davis Gymnasium, before captain Mike Van Doren '92 could put his squad on the scoreboard. Van Doren scored the opening 15 points of his 150-pound bout to record his first technical fall of the season in 4:50 and bring the score to 16-5. A one-point decision for C.C.S.U. at the 134-pound main event increased the Blue Devil lead to 19-5 as the teams headed into the locker room for intermission.

Wrestling in the first bout following half-time was Salone, wrestling in his first competition of the year after a pre-season knee injury forced him out of action. The senior, who finished last year with 21 victories and a third place finish in the conference championships, made the most of his debut with a third period pin over Central Connecticut's Dave Scarpill. That win, coupled with a 7-2 victory by the third Bison captain, 167-pound Ken Herceg '92 cut the deficit to to five points, 19-14. The victory for Herceg was the senior's 82nd of his career, moving him past former All-American Bryan Burns '91 to third place on the school's career list.

After the Devils scored with a decision at 177-pounds, Bucknell's Bob Ferraro '94 recorded his 11th pin of the season to create a two-point contest entering the heavyweight clash. Myers was able to get ahead early and refused to let up on his opponent as he scored an 11-2 major decision that sealed the Bucknell victory. Previously undefeated in the conference, Central Connecticut fell to 3-1 with an overall mark of 14-3.

Bucknell showed no letdown, coming back less than 24 hours later with a 34-point win that proved to be the team's largest margin of victory for the season. The contest, which was the Bucknell seniors' last in Davis Gymnasium, was dominated by the Bison from start to finish, with Hofstra's only points coming on an injury default awarded at 158-pounds, when Salone suffered a re-occurrence of his knee injury.

Russ Parker '93 opened the scoring with a second period fall at 118-pounds and, after a pair of decisions at 126- and 134-pounds, Bucknell quickly jumped out to a 12-0 lead. Unlike the night before, there would be no dramatic comeback, as Van Doren won by forfeit and Ron Wellman '95 scored a 16-5 major decision that gave the Bison a 22-0 advantage at the half.

Following Salone's injury at 158-pounds, Herceg recorded his 14th pin of the season in 3:00, ranking him first in the conference. At 177-pounds, Shannon Costello '92 earned his third victory of the season with a 10-1 major decision which was matched by Ferraro in the next bout. A one-point win for Myers at heavyweight gave Bucknell its 39th point, a season high for the squad. The win for Myers was his seventh in his last nine competitions and evened his overall season mark at 9-9-1. Those marks, coupled with the senior's heroics the night before, earned the Bucknell captain E.C.W.A. Wrestler of the Weeks Honors, the sixth time that a Bison grappler has won the award this season.

Against Cornell, the Amateur Wrestling News's 13th-ranked team in the nation Bucknell could manage only three bout victories, all of which were decisions by three points or less. After falling behind on a major decision in the match's opening bout, Bucknell closed the gap as George Swann '93 managed a 6-5 victory at 126-pounds. Two more Big Red victories made the score 11-3 before Van Doren was able to earn his third victory of the week with a 13-10 decision over Jason Roach.

Cornell, now 21-3 on the season, quieted the Bucknell threat by falling in only one bout in the second half, an 11-9 decision for Herceg at 167-pounds. Included in that run was an 8-7 win for Cornell's Brian Marcinek at 190-pounds over Ferraro. The loss was only the sophomore's second of the season, against 25 wins and a tie, and he remains ranked eighth in the nation.

The Bucknell squad has a week and a half to prepare for the E.C.W.A. championships to be held at Rider College in Lawrenceville, N.J. on Mar. 6 and 7. The Bison will look to halt a recent string of three consecutive championships for Rider as they enter four undefeated wrestlers, Van Doren, Herceg, Ferraro and Myers.

Equestrian hopes to gallop to regional title

BY JENNIFER WALSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell equestrian team finished its competition last Sunday as reserve high-point team, defeating its much-larger archrival, Penn State by a comfortable margin. However, the Bucknell riders were not satisfied, as they missed first place by the smallest of margins, finishing behind Wilson College by just one point.

The loss to Wilson wasn't so disheartening in itself. The fact that Bucknell needed to gain points on Wilson to become region champions made matters worse. As it now stands, Bucknell needs fifteen points in their next (and last) competition of the season in order to beat Wilson.

Still, the Bucknell team was able to put together a series of fine performances on Sunday's horse show in West Virginia. Though Penn State dominated the morning in the jumping competitions, Bucknell came back strong that afternoon to overtake their rivals in the equitation on the flat. Point riders for Bucknell did their part, placing high at almost every opportunity, while non-point riders helped out by knocking down other teams' potential for gaining points.

Individuals placing first for Bucknell included Amy Brent '95 in the walk-trot-canter, Jocelyn Perot '94 in the open on the flat, Kelly Kordish '92 in the open on the flat, and Jo Meszoly '94 in the open on the flat. Meszoly also took second place in the open over fences, which left her in a tie with four others for high-point rider of the day. overall, the horses provided by West Virginia were good, and Bucknell fared well in their draws, always an important factor.

Although March 29 marks the last competitive horse show for Bucknell, the equestrian team is still training hard in the hopes of making Nationals as a team this spring. Even if Bucknell does not make it as a team, there are several riders who may be going on to Regionals or Nationals individually. Aside from that, the Bucknell equestrian team is preparing to host its own horse show on May 17.

the trend of hiring a young manager will continue, and this is where we will start to see some minority hiring. Among the "new breed" of managers waiting in line are Baylor, Chambliss, Bob Watson, and Bill Robinson.

When Commissioner Vincent speaks of the hiring of minorities, he says, "It's something we've been working on. I'm trying to do some lecturing and cajoling." Such a weak statement is unusual from a man who has not been afraid to voice a sided opinion on such controversies as the designated hitter and the Pete Rose and George Steinbrenner hearings.

Unfortunately, if more openings don't go to minorities in the next few years, they may be forced not even to apply. "You think to yourself," said Bonds, "'Is it even worth making the phone call?'" This is a pretty sad statement, especially since we are talking about the National Pastime of the Land of Opportunity.

Penn then missed the front end of a one-and-one that might have put the game away for Lehigh. The Bison capitalized on the other end as King rebounded a Simpson miss then fed the ball to Courtney who knocked down a three-pointer tying the score at 88.

Stabler Arena had turned into a madhouse. A huge contingent had journeyed from Lewisburg to cheer the Bison, and Lehigh was backed by a vociferous bunch of their own. The Bucknell crowd was as loud as ever and they were not disappointed by the last two minutes of the game. Courtney next hit two free throws to give the Bison a two point lead.

Lehigh then looked to their go-to guy, Krizansky, who responded with a fifteen-footer to tie the score. Courtney was again fouled, but he only converted one of two to raise the score to 91-90. Penn then gave the home crowd a thrill and his team the lead with a seven-foot runner. The Bison countered with Courtney/who was fouled on his way to the goal. The foul was the fifth on Krizansky, who was forced to sit out the remaining 32 seconds of his last regular season, home game. Courtney hit both free throws to give the Bison another one point lead. In the absence of Krizansky, Lehigh went to Penn who hit a fifteen-foot jumper to give the Engineers a 94-93 lead. The Bison called a time-out as the Lehigh fans erupted in celebration, but the game was by no means over.

The Bison came out of the huddle and inbounded under their own basket. Courtney brought the ball the length of the floor and drove to the middle of the lane. Three Lehigh defenders collapsed on Courtney looking for him to take the final shot. Courtney, while hanging in mid air, dished to Olkowski underneath, who sank a layup with two ticks left on the clock. Lehigh called timeout, as Bucknell's boisterous contingent nearly blew the roof off of the arena. Lehigh couldn't muster a miracle, and the Bison traveled home victorious.

"I penetrated, then got in the air like I wasn't supposed to," remarked Courtney about the game's final seconds. "I had no place to go. Somehow, the ball ended up in Paul's hands. That was definitely the most exciting game I've ever been in."

Not to be overlooked in all the excitement was King. In a noble forty minute performance, he overcame stomach irritation to score a game-high 24 points. Courtney finished the game with 19 points, all of them coming in a strong second half performance. Lehigh was led by seniors Krizansky, Hipps, and Mbonu, each of whom had 22.

The Bison followed up their most exciting win of the season with a lackluster performance at Drexel on Wednesday night. The Dragons took advantage of a Bison team ripe for a let down in the non-conference matchup. The teams swapped baskets in the early going, but a 10-0 run midway through the first half gave Drexel a lead they would not relinquish.

The Bison did make a gallant come-back effort after being down by as many as 12 points, but the Bison had used up all of their magic in the previous game. With one minute left, the Bison cut the lead to four points at 84-80, but they would get no closer. The Dragons sank all their clutch free throws down the stretch to cruise to a 92-81 win.

Courtney led the Bison with a 27-point outburst, and Bright added 22. King was the only other Bison in double figures with sixteen. The most serious outcome of the non-conference game was a sprained ankle suffered by Simpson. Simpson is questionable for Saturday's game against Lafayette, but he should be healthy for the Patriot League tournament.

With every team down to its last league game, the tournament outlook is reasonably clear. Bucknell will finish first or second with Fordham assuming the other spot. If both teams win on Saturday (Fordham plays Navy) then they will finish tied for the regular season title.

The winner of the Holy Cross-Lehigh game will then determine the tournament's first seed. If Holy Cross wins, Fordham will get the home. If Lehigh wins, Bucknell will get the top spot. Either way, the Bison will play one of the service academies in the first round, and a re-match with Lehigh in the second round if there are no upsets.

Kirsten Ellison '92

Women's basketball player, Kirsten Ellison '92 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of February 23-29.

Ellison, a tri-captain of the basketball team, earned Athlete of the Week honors for her consistent play in Bucknell's two victories last week. Against Lehigh last Saturday, the senior scored 16 points and grabbed a team-high 13 rebounds. Ellison continued her strong play at George Mason, netting 13 points and pulling down eight from the boards.

Two weeks ago, the 6'0 center/forward became the seventh women's basketball player to reach the 1,000-point milestone—she has scored 1,037 thus far in her four-year stint at Bucknell. Ellison also recently added to the Bucknell record books for the second time. Not only does Ellison hold the single-season rebounding record, but she has become the school's all-time leading rebounder with 878 at last count.

for an excited and overwhelmed Bucknell team, one that is putting things together at just the right time (just prior to tournament time) and may be finally realizing its full potential.

In Virginia, the Bucknell starters shared the offensive responsibilities, with all five reaching double figures. Juliet McGee '93, who was typically double and triple-teamed for much of the night, was the team's high scorer with 16. Sandler followed with 14, and Ellison contributed 13. Fink added 12 and Anne McGovern '93 rounded out the scoring of the starters with 11. In addition, McGee grabbed a team-high 14 rebounds, while Ellison had eight of her own.

Concerning the contest, coach Simpson said, "George Mason was a special game, one which should always be remembered in Bucknell women's basketball history. It was like a David and Goliath story—even when we were down by 17, the belief was there." According to the coach, "It was a matter of making the right moves to force the George Mason players into situations that we could take advantage of. More importantly though, the work ethic and the discipline were there."

TIP-INS

The past two road wins were the first road wins since the 1988-89 season ... Joy Sandler '92 established a new career high last weekend against Lehigh with 29 points.

Simpson cites crowd participation as one important factor in the team's recent success: "Recently we have been getting more student as well as community support and the crowds have made such a difference. It's been much more inspiring for the team to play in front of something other than empty stands." She adds, "The players and I are really appreciative of the increasing support from the student body, who may come to watch the hard work and the excitement inherent in our games."

The Bucknell women are scheduled to face Patriot League rival Lafayette tomorrow at Davis Gym; tip-off is at 5:15. If the Bison beat the Leopards, they will be in sole possession of the fifth seed at the up-coming Patriot League tournament, an extremely favorable position for the team.

"The fact that it is Senior Night will help us, and we are more rested than Lafayette is right now. Our previous meeting with the Leopards was possibly the worst game of our season, and the players may have something to prove to themselves as well as to others," said Simpson.

Majors boast too few minorities

"Baseball is a lot like the ivy-covered wall of Wrigley Field - it gives off a great appearance, but when you run into it, you discover the bricks underneath."

— Hall of Famer Hank Aaron, on minority hiring in baseball

Minority recognition seems to be a controversy in almost every facet of American society today. Major League Baseball is no exception. Since opening day of 1991, 14 managers have lost their jobs. Of the 14 new managers, only one—Kansas City's Hal McRae—is black.

These circumstances come amid Commissioner Fay Vincent's promises that baseball is going to go all out to promote minority hiring. However, if the commissioner is really using his power to make this push, then why don't I see any black men running baseball teams—at any level?

Don Baylor, a black man who most baseball people say has the perfect mentality to be a manager, was passed over by both the Seattle Mariners and the Milwaukee Brewers. Those two clubs reasoned that Baylor does not as yet have enough dugout experience to be a big-league manager. If that is the only reason, then why is it that ten of the fourteen new managers, nine of whom are white, are managing in the majors for the first time? Among them are white skippers Bill Plummer of Seattle and Phil Garner of Milwaukee.

Chris Chambliss is another story, however. Chambliss, an ex-New York Yankee, has quite a few managerial credentials—in the minor leagues. He was named Eastern League Manager of the Year at London, Ont. in 1990 and Southern League Manager of the Year at Greenville this past year. He also won the honor of Minor League Manager of the Year by The Sporting News. These are solid credentials, however only one club looking for a new manager, the Chicago White Sox, even considered Chambliss for the position. Eventually, he was turned down.

Most minority members agree that their chances of getting good jobs within an organization are not very good. "I would like to have that opportunity," said former Major Leaguer Bobby Bonds. "But it's very difficult for a minority."

One reason for the difficulty has been the paranoia of team owners to hire fresh blood. Men such as Whitey Herzog, Don Zimmer, and Joe Torre have had success in the past, so owners have trust in their abilities. The men at the top reason that if all the experienced guys are white, then it's not their fault.

However, the recent trend towards hiring younger ex-players makes this issue all the more puzzling. Men such as Butch Hobson, Lou Piniella, Art Howe, Gene Tenace, Plummer, and Garner are all either new managers or candidates for new openings. All of them are white.

Perhaps it has to do with the false perception that people involved in sports have that white players are the "heady" players or the "team leaders", while black players are "athletes" or "natural talents". A recent National Basketball Association poll asked coaches to name the smartest player in the league. Is it a coincidence that six of the top ten players named are white? I think not.

Look at a guy like Baylor, however. He was always a team captain and union representative. In the last three years of his career Baylor played for three different teams, all of which won their respective divisions. This is not merely a coincidence. Baylor, while not always productive on the field during those final years, kept his teams together in the clubhouse and gave valuable instruction to younger players on how to stay sharp in a pennant race. And this guy doesn't have any experience?

It is ironic that one of the few blacks in any of the decision-making positions in baseball is Bill White, President of the National League. This might be a bit over-glorified, however. As Bonds puts it, "Bill White can't hire a manager."

So what can we expect in the future? It probably depends on how the new crop of managers succeeds. If we see the young guys start dropping like flies, owners will be likely to resort to recycling the mostly white veterans. However, if guys like Plummer and Garner do well with their new teams,

Bison to round up regular season

Men battle Lafayette tomorrow; win assures team of first-place tie

BY KIRK PETERS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

There is a quality to college athletics that transcends the contest, whatever sport it is. It is not a quality that can be easily described. The NBA and NFL are blessed with great athletes and incredible excitement, but there is something that college sports offer that professional sports cannot. The NBA finals, for all its great athleticism and showmanship, cannot match the atmosphere and mystique that surrounds March Madness and the NCAA's Big Dance. It was that kind of atmosphere that made Bucknell's game at Lehigh so special for the 4,322 who were in attendance.

It is not surprising that such an atmosphere surrounded the game when one considers that reaching the NCAA tournament is the goal of both teams. In a game that could easily have been a preview of the Patriot League tournament finals, the Bison defeated the Engineers 95-94. If the two teams were to repeat such a performance on March 10, an ESPN audience would get a taste of the competitiveness of the Patriot League. Although each team has a long road to travel before they reach that point, they will not forget last Saturday's performance.

Tomorrow afternoon at 2:00 PM, alumni of the varsity men's basketball team will play their annual Alumni game. Co-captains of the 1989 NCAA Tournament team, John Watson '89 and Mike Butts '89, as well as the 1989-90 co-captains Greg Leggett '90 and Mike Joseph '90, will be in attendance.

Both teams came out of locker room gunning, trading baskets for the first five minutes of the game The Bison were paced early by Paul Olkowski '93 and Chris Simpson '94 as they managed a slim 15-14 lead after the first five minutes. Patrick King '92 also contributed four early points despite suffering a stomach illness. The Engineers kept close due to the scoring effort of their senior front-court Bob Krizansky, Dozie Mbonu, and Jay Hipps. Those three, along with fellow senior Steve Yaniga, were honored before the game in Senior Night ceremonies. The Engineers would need all the senior leadership they could muster as Bucknell continued to pour it on offensively.

The Bison managed to open up the first substantial lead of the game as they went on an 8-2 run to extend the lead to 23-16. Simpson began the run with his second three-pointer of the game. King then began to hold court as he hit a layup, followed by a five-foot hoop. Despite the effort from Bucknell, the game was not meant to be a run-away. The Engineers fought back to tie the game at 25-25 when Chuck Penn, who started with the four seniors, hit a jump shot from the right corner.

Bucknell would continue to put the pressure on Lehigh, but it was not the starting five applying the force. Reserve forward Matt Clark '93 nailed a three-pointer, and guard Russell Peyton '93 tossed in three hoops of his own. The Bison bench brigade also provided something that the game had previously lacked—defense. Both Clark and Raymond Brown '94 drew charges while Peyton pressured the slower Lehigh guards. The play of the reserves along with two more buckets from King helped Bucknell build its biggest lead at 41-34.

Despite the constant pressure from the Bison, Lehigh refused to be blown away. They came back to tie the game at 47, led by scoring of big-men Krizansky and Mbonu. The Engineers even managed a brief lead at 51-49 before Olkowski tipped in a King miss with five seconds left. That basket would be an eerie foreshadowing of things to come.

The second half would see a number of changes. Rather than the Bison, it would be the Engineers who would make a couple of runs in which they threatened to put the game away. But in this half, it would be the seniors on the Bison squad that would keep them within striking distance. The Bison were somewhat lethargic coming out of the locker room, and the charged-up Engineers took full advantage. In five minutes, Lehigh built a nine point lead at 66-57 with Penn, who had an outstanding second half, and Hipps leading the way. Fortunately, the Bison did not lose their composure at this critical juncture. Head coach Charlie Woollum chose not to call a timeout, and simply let his warriors battle back. Mike Bright '93, who had been relatively quiet to that point, ignited the comeback with a tough double clutch jumper from sixteen feet. He continued his effort with a steal on the defensive end which he took all the way in for a layup to cut the lead to five. The Bison then traded baskets with the Engineers as Bright and Courtney joined King in the scoring column. Bucknell battled to a tie when Bright hit another driving layup to knot the score at 74.

After that first tie of the half, the roller coaster ride began. Courtney hit two shots to extend the Bucknell lead to four at 82-78. Hipps answered for Lehigh with a layup and two free throws to tie it up again. Hipps sandwiched a Pat King free-throw with two more hoops to give the home team a 86-83 lead. King cut the lead to one with a layup, but Krizansky, playing with four fouls, answered with a layup of his own to extend the lead to three with just 3:13 left to play.

Women win third straight; face the Leopards tomorrow evening

The Bucknell women's basketball team enjoyed its most successful week of play since winning its Thanksgiving tournament in November. Last Saturday, many Bucknell fans watched the Bison play to an 80-67 victory over the Lehigh Engineers at the Stabler Arena, home of the 1992 Patriot League Championship Tournament. The road-win marked the first time that Bucknell had won away from Davis Gymnasium since the 1988-89 season. The women then followed that victory with the surprise upset of George Mason at George Mason last Monday.

At the Stabler Center, Bucknell and Lehigh opened the game with an evenly-matched first half of play. Lehigh held the lead for the first 5:33 before giving it up on a 15-foot running jumper by Joy Sandler '92. Bucknell kept its lead until the 8:40 mark, when Lehigh played back to a 24-24 tie. Throughout the first half, neither team's leading margin ever went above six. At half-time, the teams went into their respective locker rooms with a score of 39-38, in favor of Lehigh.

The second period of play virtually belonged to Bucknell, however. After two minutes of cold play for both the Bison and their opponents, Kirsten Ellison '92 was fouled while going up for a shot. The senior made both shots from the foul line to give her team a one-point lead. From there, the Bucknell women never looked back, surrendering their advantage for only seven seconds during the entire second half of play. Bucknell eventually played to a 13-point victory.

Against Lehigh, the Bucknell women were led by their two senior tri-captains, Sandler and Ellison, each of whom dominated throughout the game. Sandler was hot on the offensive end, while Ellison took over defensively. Sandler led Bucknell in its 48 percent field-goal shooting performance with a career-high 29 points. She also contributed three assists and three steals on the night. Ellison, on the other hand, pulled down a team-high 13 rebounds and added 16 points of her own. Not to be undone, Bucknell's third captain Lisa Fink '93 dropped in 12 points and reached in for four steals against the Engineers.

The following Monday, Bucknell traveled to Fairfax, VA to take on a tough George Mason team. During most of the first half, the Bison fell prey to the strong play for which George Mason is known. After suffering from four missed shots and three turnovers, the Bucknell starters found themselves facing an 11-0 deficit with 16:29 left in the period.

The Bison were hampered by poor shooting throughout much of the remaining first half, while their opponents missed few and converted on three "treys" to add to Bucknell's problems. At the 4:31 mark, the Bucknell women were, for the fourth time, looking at a seemingly impossible 17-point deficit, the largest that George Mason would enjoy. It was at that point that the Bison began to put some offense together, going on a 12-2 run ending in a 38-31 score at the half-time buzzer.

Despite the offensive troubles from which Bucknell suffered, the team went into its locker room with a growing confidence. The Bison played solid defense against the much taller George Mason team—they were out-rebounded by only three and were two steals up on their opposition in the first period.

The Bucknell women brought that strong defensive play and their late first half offensive spark into the second half of play. Early on, the Bison chipped away at the seven-point George Mason lead, eventually reeling it in at 40-40 after three minutes had elapsed. It was at the 15:40 mark that Bucknell took its first lead of the game—15:40 also marked the time that the battle really began for Bucknell.

Bucknell's cagers stepped their game up a level and seemed to do no wrong in their quest for yet another late-season victory. The Bison played to the potential that head coach Juliene Simpson had known existed since the season began. Her players were there both physically and mentally as Bucknell and George Mason traded a small lead four times in the next seven minutes.

"George Mason was a special game, one which should always be remembered in Bucknell women's basketball history."

— Juliene Simpson
Head Women's Basketball Coach

At 7:59, Bucknell went up by two on two successful free throws by Fink—it would be a lead which they would never again relinquish, no matter how tough George Mason would play. The game closed on a fitting note, with two more free throws made by Fink, to render the final score 68-64. The final outcome also made

Men's/women's track take top honors in Patriot League meet

Bucknell's Gulden named women's Coach of the Year

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Head coach Art Gulden's women's and men's teams proved that track is truly a team sport when they each took top honors at the annual Patriot League Indoor Track and Field Championships last weekend at Lehigh University.

Bucknell's women employed dominant depth (23 of 26 participants scored) to blow away runner-up Lafayette by over 40 points. The Bison scored in every event except the 20-pound weight, in which they didn't enter a single participant. "There was no way, even on my optimistic charts, that we win that meet by 44 points," said a satisfied Gulden, who was later named Patriot League's Women's Coach of the Year. "Everybody came through with excellent performances."

Most dominant were the sprinters. Tameka Hinton '95 didn't waste any time introducing herself to the league by taking first in the 55-meter and 200-meter dashes. Bucknell took four of the top six slots in each race. Tri-captain Tricia Plasko '92 recorded a career-best in the 55. Hinton also captured second place in the shot put. Other career-bests were turned in by Dana Harbst '93 and Julie Diercks '93, as well as tri-captain Geri Kernisan '92. "It was fun to watch them run aggressively, competitively, and with an overall team attitude," reflected Gulden on the performance of his women.

Not to be outdone by the sprinters, the women jumpers garnered a significant number of points themselves. Dawn Ellery '94 placed first in the high jump while Monica Carnahan '95 placed fourth. Three people scored in the triple jump and two in the long jump. Tri-captain Ella Episcopo '92 and Jen Thomas '94 each scored in both events. Audra Wilson '94 established a new career-best and placed fifth in the long jump.

The 4x880-yard relay team of Becky Tobin '95, Gina Abraham '93, Leah Johnson '95, and Kristin Opdyke '93 won gold. Abraham and Opdyke also earned points in the 5,000, the 3,000 and the1,000-meter races. Tobin grabbed fifth in the 800-meter run, behind Kathy Wurster '94, while Beth Muehl '94

Heat and water problems plague residence halls

Physical plant employees have recently been flooded with calls from campus residents, angry because their rooms are sweltering and their showers are cold.

Inadequate heating and plumbing in residence halls have been an on-going problem for students who perceive the administration as neglecting to implement needed improvements.

Although the University claims to be aware of the situation and working towards a solution, students have noticed very little change. According to the University's mission statement, "Bucknell's residential character provides a matrix within which institutional programs and practices that exemplify compassion, civility, and a sense of justice form an aspect of the educational system."

Insufficient water systems commonly disrupt the daily routines of students. According to Terri Sonneman '92, the resident assistant on the fourth floor of Trax Hall, the water situation is becoming "progressively worse." Sonneman also commented that, "more often than not there is no water pressure" leaving the three showers on the second floor to serve all the women living in Trax. "It's very frustrating for me, being responsible for these women, to see this situation," said Sonnemann.

"When you have to jump out of the shower just to avoid being scalded, you know you have a problem," said Stephanie Williams '92, who resides in Kress Hall.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Students are taking action to protest and invoke reaction to conditions in residence halls which preclude things like hot showers.

Deborah Bellinger '93, also of Kress Hall, pointed out that inconsistent showers are more than simply an inconvenience. "The showers have occasional spurts of scalding water, and someone can really get hurt."

The residents have repeatedly reported the poor water conditions to the physical plant, but little has been done to improve the situation. "The physical plant obviously does not take us seriously," said Theresa Kane '93. As residents of fourth Trax "we pay just as much as anyone else. I don't think we are asking for much to get a hot shower in the morning."

Laura Fecile GR, resident manager of Trax, Kress and Roberts said, "The physical plant fixes what they can but some of these problems may be beyond a quick patch job."

"If there is a problem not being addressed, making residential life and physical plant aware of it is the appropriate approach so we can do our best to correct it," said Bob Naugle, director of the Physical Plant.

The problems in living conditions are not limited to water problems. "There have been lots of complaints from residents," said Neepa Choksi '92, the resident assistant on third Kress, "the heat just pours in,

IFC examines fraternity relations in wake of violence

Greeks deny significance of increase in fights

Pete Brady '93 and Mike Malusis '93, president and vice president of IFC, respectively, announce the formation of a new standing committee to address recent problems in Greek relations on campus.

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Inter-Fraternity Council is organizing a task force to examine rivalries and other problems between fraternities, according to the IFC executive committee.

Pete Brady '93, IFC presidnet, feels that the increase in fights is campus-wide, and not just restricted to Greeks.

"Fighting is a problem. This committee wants to take a pro-active and not a re-active stance," said Brady.

The exact structure of the task force is still unclear, except that Mike Malusis '93, vice-president of the IFC, will most likely oversee the temporary committee. The IFC voted at a March 3 meeting to organize a standing committee to address recent problems, but that vote is being reconsidered.

Edward Dadez, greek advisor, is not sure that the committee, which would rotate four fraternity presidents each semester, is the most effective solution. "Rotating committee members won't cure the problems we're seeing. It will just cause more bureaucracy," said Dadez.

Dadez met with IFC leaders on Thursday to discuss the possibility of restructuring the committee, despite the fact that the first four rotating members were already voted upon.

At that meeing, Dadez agreed with IFC members that a standing committee was appropriate to deal with the problem of rivalry.

Malusis agrees with the need to reorganize the IFC's effort. "A standing committee says that the problem will always be there. We'd like to think that it is just a temporary thing that we can alleviate with a task force," said Malusis.

The executive committee expects to reach a final decision regarding the proposed solutions within the next two weeks, in an effort to solve any problems before things possibly intensify.

"What is important is that the IFC is not sitting back and letting problems con-

Japanese religious leader visits campus

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Reverend Keido Fukushima, Zen Master of the Tofukuji Monastery in Kyoto and the Head Abbot of the Rinzai Sect of Buddhism in Japan, spent three days at Bucknell last week, lecturing and talking with hundreds of students on campus.

One of Japan's top religious leaders, Fukushima joined the Rinzai Sect in 1947, and was named Head Abbot of the sect last Spring.

With the help of Jeff Shore, his disciple and translator, the Zen Master addressed several groups of students while at Bucknell. The Langone Center Forum was filled for his lecture "What is Zen?" last Thursday evening.

He spoke about the Zen concept of "mu," which loosely translates as "nothingness" or "non-being" and is related to the goal of letting go of the self and the ego.

In order to demonstrate this, Reverend Fukushima held a meditation session in Rooke Chapel Friday afternoon. Approximately 40 students attended this session to learn the techniques of Zen meditation and practiced zazen with the Reverend.

He emphasized the importance of becoming detached from the self in order to "live fully in the now." Considering his position and stature in Japan, it was a great honor for the Zen Master to sit with the students during this session.

Mary Evelyn Tucker, professor of religion, was the first American woman to study Zazen under Fukushima in 1971. She stated that "his sense of personal warmth and deep compassion are immediately evident to all who have an opportunity to meet him."

Tucker stated that Reverend Fukushima is "a Zen Master of special depth and insight, as well as a calligrapher of rare discipline and adeptness." Students who attended his calligraphy demonstration in the Forum Thursday afternoon were able to see his magnificent skill firsthand. His calligraphy is highly valued and very much in demand in Japan.

Reverend Fukushima also talked with students in two religion classes during his stay. During his discussion with the World Religions class, he stressed the idea that "all religion must teach human beings how to live, but Zen teaches people how to live here and now."

Although Reverend Fukushima has been visiting college campuses in the United States since 1988, this was the first time that a Japanese Zen Master has ever been to Bucknell. Professor Tucker stated that "we hope he will return many times to Bucknell."

TKE team competes in regional College Bowl

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For the first time ever, Bucknell sent a College Bowl team to compete in the Regionals Tournament, held at Towson State last weekend. The team, comprised of five members from Tau Kappa Epsilon, finished eleventh in a field of twenty-one schools.

The TKE team, made up of Marc Holzapfel '92, Joe Kubofcik '92, Don Bateman '92, and Bill Sinkinson '92, arrived at Towson late Friday night and promptly lost three straight matches to Dickinson, Moravian, and American. The team remained optimistic, however, and, after a solid night's rest, put in an inspired performance the next day, winning four of its next seven matches. In fact, TKE's only defeats came against national powerhouses such as Johns Hopkins and defending regional champions, Georgetown.

Holzapfel, the team captain, was pleased with the team's overall performance, and cited outside distractions as the main source of problems in the tournament. "Although other teams were under a much larger financial and scholarly budget, we handily beat the hometeam favorites," he remarked. "Were it not for the jet-lag, so to speak, that we suffered during our first few matches, our record would indeed show our expertise, and be a paragon of a College Bowl Team." Additionally, he said, "our buzzers didn't work right."

Kubofcik offered no excuses, saying "Surprisingly, the teams from Georgetown and Hopkins gave us a little trouble. But then we ran headfirst into the juggernaut known as Allegheny Community College."

The entire process began several weeks ago when the OSA sponsored the College Bowl at Bucknell. The teams consisted each of four members who were asked questions ranging from such topics as sports to geography. To answer a question, the players would hit a buzzer located in front of them. Each match was fourteen minutes long, with two seven-minute halves. After several days of these matches, the championship match was played between Kappa Delta Rho and TKE, the winner of which would move on to the regionals at Towson. After the grueling match was over, TKE had soundly defeated its opponent by nearly forty points.

Bateman was quick to praise the team's coach for its success. "I don't think we could ever have done as well as we did without being coached under the auspices of our coach, Jon Mackenzie '92." Additionally, Kubofcik stated, "We could not have done it without the support of our tremendous fans," which consisted of nearly twenty-five current and past members of TKE.

College Bowl organizer Kristen Skarie was pleased with the success of the first team to compete from Bucknell. She said, "The team had incredible support from friends and family who came to watch, and, although we never found a Taco Bell, it was a successful trip! Next year's campus tournament promises to be even bigger and better."

tinue. The IFC understands the need for a task force of some form to address the issues," said Dadez.

"Violence seems to be a general problem the past few weeks, with Greeks and non-Greeks alike," said Brady. "We are trying to get to the root of the Greek rivalries, but people cannot say fighting is merely a Greek problem. Fraternities happen to be where most people are during parties, and that's just where fights happen. It's not necessarily Greeks who are involved."

How diverse is Bucknell?

BY DARREN MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

All Bucknell students appear as if they have just jumped out of the pages of the most recent J. Crew catalogue. They are white, upper middle-class, and between the ages of 18 and 22. They can commonly be seen motoring around campus in their Saabs sporting Ray-Bans in order to shield their eyes from the sun.

While the above stereotype grossly exaggerates the actual situation on our campus, the homogeneity of the student body is unmistakable. Although anyone who has ever made their way through the hills of the Susquehanna Valley in order to visit this university could attest to its lack of ethnic diversity, the raw numbers help to substantiate the observation. According to the publication, Peterson's Four-Year Colleges 1992, which actually quotes figures slightly higher than Bucknell's own admissions office, the liberal arts university in Lewisburg is the academic home to a student population comprised of 3% African-Americans, 1% Native Americans, 3% Hispanics, and 5% Asian-Americans.

Terry Carter, coordinator of minority recruitment, questioned the significance of the numbers themselves remarking, "Numbers do not guarantee diversity."

President Gary Sojka commented, "It is not a numbers game, it is an individual situation. A school like this should not reduce minority students or anyone else to numbers in a class."

Although Bucknell maintains a minority student population which is comparable to the so-called frame of reference schools—Lafayette, Lehigh, and Colgate—it falls far short of Ivy League schools such as Harvard and Yale, as well as Williams College, chosen "Best Liberal Arts College" for 1991-92 by U.S. News and World Reports.

There appear to be many explanations for the current composition of the student body. Sojka stated that he feels the "history and perception" of the University are the primary reasons that it is so difficult to attract minority students. "I don't think we immediately jump out in the minds of a lot of minority students as a place where they might think about going to school. We have to work on that," commented Sojka.

Kraig Pannell '92, an African-American political science major, explained that it was only by virtue of several coincidences that he became aware of Bucknell and added it to his list of potential colleges.

The responsibility of elevating Bucknell to the to the level a school which minority students will widely consider has received a boost from the recent formation of a black alumni association. Carter has just finished attending the new alumni group's receptions in Philadelphia, Washington D.C., and New York.

LOCATION

According to Alem Asres, director of multicultural affairs, the location of the University is also a major factor for the low number of minority students. "When you are centrally isolated as we are in Lewisburg, and the population outside the campus is primarily white, you do not have the attraction that a school in a more urban area might have," stated Asres.

The location of the University does not only pose an obstacle to the recruitment of minority students, it creates what is often an uncomfortable environment for minorities currently attending Bucknell. Lewisburg: the quaint, pleasant little town which never ceases to prompt your mother to comment, "Oh honey, this place is so cute," as your family cruises down Market Street during parent's weekend. Chances are most Bucknell students have encountered courteous shopkeepers, grateful for the business which the generally affluent student body provides. This has not been the personal experience of Kraig Pannell. "When someone in one of the stores on Market Street treats me with the common courtesy of any other customer, it's shocking," commented Pannell.

Carter described a similarly disturbing situation of shopping in a local grocery store, when he noticed that one of the employees was following him to ensure that he did not steal anything.

According to Pannell, the most common forms of racist behavior minorities encounter in the community surrounding Bucknell involve "being stared at, ignored, or followed."

While the location of the University makes it difficult to recruit minority students, it makes it nearly impossible to attract new minority faculty members. Ac-

Dadez, IFC awarded top regional honors

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Ed Dadez, associate dean for residential life, was recently named regional IFC advisor of the year.

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Interfraternity Council and its adviser, Ed Dadez, dean of residential Life, received four awards at the annual Northeast regional awards banquet held last weekend.

The I.F.C. was singled out for Programming Excellence, Outstanding Publications, and Special Achievement, while Dadez was honored with the Northeast Region Interfraternity Conference Advisor of the Year award.

"I was very honored and pleased that I was selected as the Adviser of the Year," Dadez said. "Its an award that I think has to be shared with the fraternities and the IFC because a part of me being a good adviser is the group's wanting to be advised."

Dadez also remarked that he was pleased with the strides IFC has taken in the past five years, saying that "we've turned around 150 degrees from where we were, and still have thirty more to go."

Pete Brady '93, I.F.C. president, was equally proud of the awards his group received, saying, "The fact that Bucknell's I.F.C. continues to win awards—this is the second year in a row that we've won at least three awards—just shows the strength of the Greek system."

He went on to say that the group's success is a fitting tribute to the work of Dadez, as well. "The fact that Ed Dadez, a non-Greek (in college), goes on to win an award just shows how much he really cares about the students on this campus," he stated. "I don't think our Greek system would be anywhere without the work he's done."

Brady also credits past president Denis Maguire '93 with much of the group's success. "This year's I.F.C. is following such a strong example led by Denis' work," he said. "Last year he brought the board along to new levels we've never seen before, and this year's board is looking to go beyond those levels, and hopefully in the future the Greek system at Bucknell will be the model Greek system for the rest of the country."

Dadez and Brady both agreed that there is room for improvement within the I.F.C., and that the group is currently undertaking some extensive measures to ensure that the necessary changes are implemented.

Brady said, "Some of the steps we're taking for the future include an all-Greek newspaper (the Olive Branch), and a faculty newsletter." Additionally, he said, the group plans to increase its philanthropy programming, as well as the number of scholarships it awards. Finally, the group will attempt to improve the sense of Greek unity on campus by starting a committee to examine fraternity relations.

While Dadez was admittedly pleased with the recognition the group has received, he did say that there was one remaining award that has eluded the group thus far. "Our goal this year is to have an excellent year so that we can go there next year and be named the overall best I.F.C. in the Northeast," he said.

Expanded club sports policy to begin April 1

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Recent changes in organizational structure and funding which will effect all club sports teams at Bucknell by introducing active oversight and planning by the Athletic Department are set to take effect April 1.

The new policy will alleviate much of the role presently played by the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) in overseeing the activity of club sports, and should serve to increase efficiency in the areas of equipment, practice time and facilities, scheduling, and funding, according to Assistant Director of Intramurals and Recreation Cyndi Opalski.

"The organizations are student run and funded, and they should stay that way," said Opalski. "What we aim to do with this policy is monitor what goes on, and use our resources and staff to increase productivity and make things run smoothly."

Equipment, funding and scheduling will be outlined by each club in an annual report to be submitted by April 1.

"Obviously no one knows their exact schedule or needs five months ahead-of-time. If we have rosters and preliminary paperwork by this time, however, we can plan accordingly."

Equipment problems have plagued teams in the past, and Oplaski hopes the new policy will solve this problem as well. "We are having all equipment for every teams stored by the [athletic] department. Lots of times teams will request funds for equipment that was recently purchased but lost. This should eliminate that."

Members of club teams approve highly of the new policy. "I think it's a very good idea," said Kerri Steckler, president of the women's rugby team.

"BSG has enough to deal with and is not closely tied into athletics. We need to be monitored as well as supported by the Athletic Department."

Steckler also feels the new policy will solve problems. "Teams often change officers every year. With that kind of turnover, things get lost and this should provide some continuity."

Copies of the new policy are available in the athletic office.

Bucknellian seeks input

Anxious to increase input from the campus, The Bucknellian recently announced the formation of a new community steering committee and is looking for interested members of the community to serve on the group.

"The committee has one major purpose," said Rob Schroeder '92, contributing editor for opinions, "for us to measure how well we are serving the University community." The committee will meet once every month, giving its members a chance to raise concerns or to comment on issues involving The Bucknellian.

"We are only a few dozen individuals, and we cannot always be sensitive to all the needs of every group and individual at Bucknell," explained Schroeder, the committee's organizer. "The assumption is that if The Bucknellian has an informed group of individuals providing constructive criticism and insight, this University will have a better paper."

Members of the Bucknell community interested in joining the community steering committee should send their name, address, and phone number to The Bucknellian at Box C-3952.

DIVERSITY

cording to Dean of Students John Dunlop, colleges and universities nationwide are all drawing from a relatively small pool of potential minority faculty members. These potential faculty members "don't want to come to rural Pennsylvania, to a tiny little town like Lewisburg, because there is not a sizeable population that they would most readily relate to," stated Dunlop.

As a minority student, Pannell commented that it would be encouraging to see the University attract more minority faculty members on a visiting basis if it proved impossible to bring them here for extended periods of time.

Race Relations

Although the attitude of some of the Lewisburg community which Pannell described appears to be one of overt racism, the race relations on the Bucknell campus are not so easily defined.

It is Halloween, and you are a freshman minority student—one of only a handful on the Bucknell campus. Just like any other student you are eager to socialize and have a good time with your friends. Someone tells you about a party, so along with a small group, you head uphill to one of the fraternities. As you and your friends enter the house, you are greeted by a group of five guys who have their faces painted black and are wearing matted, afro-type wigs. Apparently they thought these two effects were essential elements to their Harlem Globetrotter costumes.

Such was the experience of Kraig Pannell during his second month of college in the fall of 1988. Amazingly, Pannell is able to look back on such incidents without showing clear signs of anger. "Their actions were racist," stated Pannell, "but not consciously racist."

Many of the problems regarding race relations on this campus can be attributed to racial ignorance, explained Pannell. "Students come to Bucknell without having had the experience of interacting socially with minorities, so they think African-American students here live like the Cosbys or the people on Good Times."

Acting Vice President for Student Services Barbara Shailor, commented, "We all come to Bucknell with an understanding of who we are; we often don't have such a good understanding of who other people are. I don't think this campus has racial tension based on hatred. A lot of what goes on here is clear misunderstanding and clear miscommunication."

Sojka admitted that the extensive travelling entailed in his job makes it difficult for him to give a clear assessment of campus race relations, but he does cite the high retention rate among minority students as evidence that "minority students who are here are fully a part of the University."

Students and Educators

The lack of understanding on the part of many Bucknell students often places minority students in uncomfortable situations. Pannell explained that his first encounter with one of his Kress hallmates this semester, caused the other student to become flustered and unable to think of an appropriate greeting.

Such occurrences are commonplace on this campus, said Pannell, and he does not fault students for their lack of knowledge about minorities. "Minority students at Bucknell are required to wear many hats," stated Pannell. "We must not only be students, but also educators." This dual role puts tremendous pressure on minority students, he explained, sometimes causing him to "feel like I really don't want to be here."

From his experience of the last three and a half years, Pannell indicates that student organizations have been the most successful means of decreasing racial ignorance on this campus. Asres hopes that his plans through the Multicultural Center will also help to facilitate greater communication and understanding across racial lines.

and we can't control it."

Because of the antiquated heating systems, the heat is not distributed throughout the building leaving the top floors at uncomfortably high temperatures while the first floor and basement are sometimes cold. Residents on the top floors often open their windows in an attempt to reduce the heat.

Naugle indicated that, although this may provide a temporary solution, thermostats in the return air ducts detect the cold air entering the window, cause the heat to kick on and increase the temperature of the entire side of the building.

Even with the windows open, many residents complain of being uncomfortable sleeping and studying in their rooms. "For a while, I was studying in the hall," said Karrie Wullen '93, a resident of fourth Kress.

According to Preston Hoyle, director of the Student Medical Service, "If a room is too warm and makes you uncomfortable, you are obviously not going to study at full capacity."

Hoyle also commented that an increase in heat is typically coupled with very low humidity which causes individuals to be "more susceptible to cold viruses."

Scott Kachmarik, area coordinator for administration, recognizes that, "You can do a lot of activities, but students won't be happy without the major necessities."

The heating and water problems are not new to any of the residence halls on campus. But a lack of funding has prevented the University from rectifying the situation.

Barry Maxwell, vice president of administration said, "We have had for the past several years, a phased renovation plan for residential halls."

Maxwell said the goal was to renovate one residence hall a year based on input by Residential Life. Swartz and Roberts halls were the first two buildings to be be renovated by this plan. Roberts took an extra year to be finished, which delayed Trax's repairs.

Maxwell said that the renovation program is two years behind schedule because the recessionary economy caused the University to table all rennovations last year. According to Maxwell, renovations in Trax are top priority.

Naugle estimates that $100,000 would be needed to complete the necessary renovations for Trax and Kress that include, "redoing the heating system, installing smoke alarm systems in each room, and making electrical and plumbing changes."

Naugle added that over spring break, "We intend to install a circulating pump and booster pump in Trax."

These pumps will increase water pressure and circulate more hot water to the top floors. Naugle estimates that this project would cost $5000.

Assault offenders jailed at Arkansas

Four University of Arkansas students accused of sexual assault in a September 13 dormitory incident were sentenced to three days in the Washington County jail after pleading guilty to lesser charges.

The men were accused of taking two 14-year-old girls back to their dorm after meeting them at a local high school football game.

The four said that sexual activity did take place, but maintained that the girls consented to the acts.

Underground fraternities grow

Underground fraternities are seeing increased interest at Amherst, though fraternity members deny that alcohol is the main attraction to the groups.

The 1984 Trustee's Resolution on Fraternities mandated that no college resources were ever to be used in any acts or procedures relating to fraternities.

The Amherst Student reports that surges in fraternity memberships over the past few years seem to correspond to a stronger enforcement of the College's alcohol policy.

Drug testing begins at Liberty

Liberty University students are being randomly selected throughout the year to participate in the Mandatory Drug Testing Program implemented to uphold the University's drug policy.

Students who test positively after the monitored urine test are referred to the deans, and are questioned about the results.

The Rev. Jerry Falwell instituted the program in the fall semester of 1988.

Cincinatti senior runs for office

University of Cincinnati senior Shannon Walker is running for the Ohio State House of Representatives in an effort to capitalize on the often overlooked youth vote in her district.

Walker, running as a Republican, supports term limitations for state representatives, a shorter legislative session, and limits on benefit packages and salaries for state legislators.

"People were skeptical of me at first , but they quickly realize that they haven't been talked to in 14 years. It's refreshing for them to hear from me," said Walker.

Election voided at Gettysburg college

The 1994 Senate election at Gettysgurg Collge has been declared null and void by the Executive Committee of the Student Senate, because of substantiated suspicions of abuses of the voting procedure.

The committee refuses to release any further details "to avoid rampant rumors and finger pointing," said vice-president Christina Schrode.

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Goldberg delivers her message to students through song

By Beth B. Morilla

Karen Goldberg, whose unique solo performance combines the acoustic sounds of the 70's, electronics of the 80's, and new folk sounds of the 90's, will be performing on the Bison stage tonight at 9 p.m. This talented acoustic guitarist, singer, songwriter, producer, and entrepreneur from Baltimore, Maryland has opened for such well-known performers as 10,000 Maniacs, David Wilcox, and The Dregs. In addition to entertaining students in over 100 colleges, Karen Goldberg has also recorded three albums (her latest release is the concert tape SOLO) and a concert video, Live at the Birchmere.

As a veteran to college campuses for 18 years, Goldberg believes that colleges are the basis for solid music. Through her performances, Goldberg has the ability to convey a message of social consciousness to her audiences. She feels that the students are old enough to form opinions, yet still young enough to experience and enjoy new kinds of music.

During a recent trip to Romania, Goldberg was inspired to write one of her newest songs, "So Blows the Popular Breeze." Other topics of her song include a ballad on the trials and tribulations of PMS, a song about typical wealthy high school girls called "Princess Blues," and a song on how lousy the dating world can be in "You Do Nothing For Me."

Goldberg is also a strong supporter of the PETA foundation. She believes that animal exploitation has been a serious problem throughout the years. To make her audiences more aware of this issue, Goldberg offers pamphlets on animal rights and cosmetic testing at every performance she gives.

Through her enlightening performances, Karen Goldberg has certainly proven to be a strong force in raising awareness on the college circuit.

Minsavage costumes the campus

Craig Bitter–The Bucknellian

Mark Minsavage '94 designed costumes for both Buenavista and Venus Abiertas, creating many of them from his own imagination

By Nicole Cobban
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What few people realize when they see a theatrical production is the amount of time invested by the cast and crew before the curtain goes up. For a two-hour show, the average rehearsal frame is 72 hours. If you're a member of the production staff, that figure more than doubles. Mark Minsavage '94, costume designer, is one of several talented student designers working with the department of theatre and dance this year.

Minsavage's background in the department has been extensive. As the costume technical advisor, Minsavage is responsible for creating costumes when necessary and making any alterations. Often this includes making or patterning a costume from a design or from scratch. After being assistant scenographer to F. Elaine Williams, associate professor of theatre, for The Alice Project, Minsavage designed the costumes for the recent staged reading of Buenavista. Currently he is working as costume designer for Venas Abiertas: Escenas sobre Latinoamerica., opening next Friday at 8 p.m. in the University Theatre in Coleman. The show will run through Mar. 15, and tickets are on sale at the LC Box Office for $4, $3 with a BUID.

Minsavage's interest in the theatre began when he was very young. "I've always had this thing for the theatre ever since I saw my first Broadway show, Aspects of Love. It wasn't so much the costumes, per se, but the sets were just amazing."

Receiving an extensive nine-year background in art before coming to Bucknell, Minsavage knew that he wanted to involve himself in theatre in some way. Costume designing seemed to be the most obvious choice since his artistic talents were strongest in dealing with human figures and portraits. Costume designing, he describes, is an extension of working with human figures in a more complex way. After taking a course in costume design, Minsavage states, "I was hooked."

Minsavage has also extended his theatre background to include several roles in Bucknell productions. During his freshman year he landed a role in Under Milkwood, his first contact with the stage since before high school. Minsavage also played Peter Quince in A Midsummer Night's Dream last semester, and was cast in several roles, including the Dormouse and the King of Hearts, in The Alice Project. Later this year, Minsavage will play Rev. Parris in The Crucible.

For Minsavage this is more than a college activity. Planning a future career in costume design, Minsavage sees himself continuing his connections with the theatre long after graduation. Although he has entertained the idea of working with films, he states plainly, "I know in my heart of hearts, I will always belong to the theatre."

Students to perform senior music recital

Katie DeBonville
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Jennifer Walsh '92, a Bachelor of Music candidate, will be performing her senior recital on Tuesday, Mar. 10 at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall. Accompanying Walsh on the piano will be David Chrzanowski '93.

Walsh, a mezzo-soprano, will be performing a wide variety of musical selections. On the program is a cycle of songs by Hector Berlioz entitled Les Nuits d'Ete , five pieces by Hugo Wolf, a couple of arias, and a collection of English poems transcribed for voice, piano, and French horn entitled Noctumes by Arnold Cooke. Joining Walsh and Chrzanowski on Noctumes will be William Kenny, assistant professor of music, on the French horn.

"This recital marks four years of musical growth and development," reflected Walsh, who referred to the event as the "pinnacle" of her studies in music. "The program is a diverse and interesting one. I'm looking forward to it."

Chrzanowski, who has a great deal of accompanying experience, said that a lot of work goes into preparing for a recital. "As an accompanist, I have to work hard with the singer to make sure that every bit of the music comes forth," Chrzanowski stated.

Walsh has studied voice with Martha G. Hill and Dr. Catherine Payn, assistant professor of music. She is a member of the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Bucknell Opera Company. Walsh plans to continue her studies in music at the graduate level. Chrzanowski is a member of the Bucknell Concert Chorale and the Rooke Chapel Choir. He currently studies organ with Dr. William Payn, associate professor of music and director of choral studies.

Jazz and Blues Express cruises into the Bison

By Chris Bird

The J & B Express, a monthly jazz and blues music series in the Bison, brings bands from all over the East Coast to campus for free concerts.

The brainchild of Ross Landy '94, the J & B Express was formed when the Bison re-opened last year. The Bison Programming Committee needed ideas for entertainment, and Landy suggested a series of jazz artists that would bring a different style of music to the campus. After listening to various demo tapes, Landy signed up enough acts to create a bi-weekly schedule of artists.

Opening in the spring of '91, the J & B Express allowed groups like Mike Freeman, Spellbound, and the Sallins/Marshall Project to introduce "fusion jazz" to the campus. "Fusion jazz" is a new variation on what many call the true American art form, jazz. Instead of string basses and pianos, musicians use electric guitars and synthesizers. Leading the nation in "fusion jazz" are artists such as Spyro Gyra and saxophone player David Sanborn.

Major Handy also played a concert in the series last year, utilizing a form of music known as Zydeco, a style of blues originating from the Cajun backwaters of Louisiana.

When Landy returned to campus this fall, so did the Express, but because of a lack of funds, the Express was cut to a monthly program. This season's bill has included guitarist Dr. Blue, the Sante Fe Blues Band, and Rufus Harley on an unusual jazz instrument, the bagpipes. The Sallins/Marshall Project returned for a show on Feb. 8, and Roger Morris entertained audiences on the keyboard with his blues style on Feb. 16.

Coming up, Third Stream, a "fusion jazz" group from Bethlehem, PA, will be in the Bison this Sunday at 7 p.m. The all-male quartet has received praising reviews in clubs all over the Northeast. On Sunday, Apr. 12 at 7 p.m., Saffire will be playing the blues in the Bison. The group, a female trio who call themselves the Uppity Blues Women, dwell on their problems with songs like "Middle Age Blues."

Landy has been slightly disappointed at the turnout for the performances. "Attendance is getting better, but the Bison is far from full," states Landy. "I had hoped that more people would come out and learn to appreciate a new kind of music. The J & B Express is special because it allows the campus to experience something that they might not otherwise." The J & B Express is planning to continue next year. All of the concerts are free and last for about an hour and a half. If you have any questions about the series, contact the OSA at x1217.

Get a last kick out of Old Man Winter

There are scads of ski resorts within a two hour drive, but you'd better go soon...

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the chilliness of winter gradually subsides and we look towards the glory of spring, it might be a good idea to take advantage of the season before we let it go. So before you get out those hiking boots to conquer the mountainous terrain of PA, why not ski it...this may be your last chance of the season! If you haven't noticed already, there are a plethora of ski resorts located within a couple hours' drive from Bucknell which may force you to reconsider welcoming spring so soon. Spring Break plans looking bleak? Most of the following ski resorts will stay open until late March or early April, so while you may be sacrificing the bronze look, the skiing will no doubt put you in excellent shape.

The Pocono Mountain Region must be elaborated upon, primarily because it has an extensive amount of ski resorts all located within a half-hour range of each other.

Speaking of variety...the Big Two, a collective title for Jack Frost Mountain and Big Boulder, offers a single lift ticket that can be used at either mountain. Don't be misled by the name "Big Two," though, since quite a discrepancy exists between the two ski resorts. With 11 slopes and trails, Big Boulder is more than adequate for the easily intimidated novice skier. When you are ready for the big plunge, however, (which might just be at the end of the day), Jack Frost is accessible within a matter of minutes. What is interesting about Jack Frost is that as you approach the lodge and parking lots, there will not be a mountain in sight. That's because you're on it! So don't strain your eyes too much. In addition to some pretty challenging slopes, Jack Frost is a snowboarder's heaven with the addition of a 500-foot half-pipe. A two-day Weekender lift ticket, valid from Saturday morning to Sunday night, costs $60, which is $20 less than what you would pay for each day separately.

If a threatening vertical drop is your thing, Blue Mountain Ski Area, located in Palmerton (about an hour and a half trip from Lewisburg), can easily boast one of the largest in the Poconos. Blue Mountain's 16 slopes are evenly divided into beginner, intermediate, and expert terrain, so it makes an ideal ski resort for a large group. Beware of the double-diamond Challenge trail, which easily lives up to its name. Lift tickets cost $35 on weekends and $25 on weekdays. And don't forget about the night skiing...most Pocono resorts have lighting on the slopes, so they stay open until 10.

Camelback, located at exit 45 on I-80 in Tannersville, PA, is definitely an impressive sight as you approach the area in your car. Considered to be the largest of all the Pocono ski area resorts, Camelback offers 25 runs and 11 lifts, so there's always fresh terrain to explore. It might be difficult to adjust to the lumpiness of ungroomed trails, but by the end of the day you'll realize that the lumps only increase your whole skiing experience. Just stay clear of the bodies on the other sides of the moguls.

One of Camelback's greatest assets is that it has lodges located not only at the base of the mountain, but at the top as well. So you can take in the breathtaking scenery as you slowly sip your cup of hot cocoa.

Those who think that Hunter Mountain in New York is the "snowmaking capital of the world," obviously haven't been to Montage, located near Scranton off I-81 (exit 51). Montage has the capacity to cover an acre of ground with two feet of snow in just an hour! In other words, this place will definitely stay open until April. In addition to its fame in snowmaking, Montage boasts a 1000' vertical drop and 18 trails of varying difficulty. Lift tickets may be purchased for $33 on weekends and $26 midweek.

If you're looking for a real challenge in Alpine skiing but you're not about to fly out West or to Europe, Elk Mountain, may adequately quench your thirst. Elk has a 1000' vertical drop, a high-efficiency snowmaking system, and 19 slopes, more than half of which are classified as expert runs. Elk is located in the northeast corner of the state near Union Dale, and lift tickets cost $33 on weekends, and $26 on weekdays.

Outside of the Poconos, towards Penn State, there are a couple of "friendly" mountains that are quite suitable for those who either do not want to travel far, or are not ready for the "big time" yet. Tussey Mountain Ski Area, in State College, is only an hour away and quite affordable as well. Although Tussey has a mere seven trails, the lift ticket is only $20 for skiing from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Saturday, and $16 for Friday from 2 p.m. on. Tuesdays are two-for-one night at Tussey if you bring college ID, which makes things really cheap!

Another possibility is Ski Sawmill, located an hour and fifteen minutes away in Morris, PA, where it costs only $10 to ski all day.

Bucknell alumnus runs for State House seat

BY WAYNE FERBERT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Union and Snyder County residents usually go to the polls in November to vote for the better candidate. This November, however, the voters can choose the Best candidate. Jim Best, that is. On March 4, Jim Best, a local attorney and Bucknell graduate of 1988, announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination for the 85th State House seat.

Best, who prefers the voters to just call him Jim, decided to seek Union and Snyder County's representative seat in Harrisburg because he believes that, "it is time for the people of the 85th district to have a Representative in the General Assembly who will fight for economic growth and social fairness." Best's platform focuses on three themes: economic fairness; real family values; and environmental protection.

Since Best is the only Democrat in the field, the primary on April 28 is mostly a formality. The same holds true for the Republican primary since the incumbent is Republican Russ Fairchild. The General Election in November will be a two man race between Best and Fairchild. Best sees the race as an uphill battle in a county that is almost 2 to 1 Republican. But the election is eight months away, so he has plenty of time to build support for his candidacy. A young, personable, and exuberant member of the Lewisburg community, Best is ready for the challenge.

Best's stance on political issues is clearly defined. He is a self-described "progressive democrat in the traditions of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman." Often in politics on the left side of the aisle, a Democrat will run as a liberal to win his party's nomination, but will then face difficulty in the general election because the recent public sentiment at the polls has not encouraged "liberal spenders that profess the ideals of general welfare liberalism" to seek office.

When asked why he would openly run as a "progressive liberal" democrat rather than just as a democrat (since he had the nomination of his party wrapped up), Best responded that he wished to be open with the Central Susquehanna Valley constituency. He would like them to know exactly what they were getting if they elected him to office: a hard working, life-long resident of Central Susquehanna who will fight for "fairness, equality of opportunity, and respect for the lives of ordinary, working people." He stated that he was definitely going to stick to his principles, and hoped to raise a heightened sense of awareness of issues which he thought were important enough to warrant open debate.

As far as the issues in the campaign are concerned, Best plans to "support programs that put Pennsylvanians back to work at well-paying jobs, strengthen our unions, and fairly allocate the tax burden." He says that too many Pennsylvanians "view Union and Snyder Counties as a place to locate low wage jobs and toxic waste." Best is strongly pro-labor and wishes to spur investment in manufacturing in order to make Pennsylvania the strong industrial state that it once was.

The Republicans, according to Best, have lost site of what true "family values" really encompass. Best supports programs that will actually help working families, including: national health care, anti-scabbing laws, family leave, and "dignity for our disabled and elderly citizens." He is also pro-choice. Increased mass-transportation and infrastructure rebuilding programs will also mark this hopeful candidate's campaign.

Environmentalism is a big issue in this election, with the proposal to locate a toxic waste burner in Gregg Township. A key piece of Jim Best's campaign will focus on the environment. Best, like his opponent, is strongly opposed to the USPCI toxic waste burner proposal. Best will also campaign for statewide, comprehensive land use planning.

Jim Best '88 describes himself as a "progressive democrat in the traditions of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman."

"State government has been described as 'the laboratory of democracy.' As a Representative in the Pennsylvania General Assembly, I will work with the Democratic leadership to establish creative programs that bring jobs, growth, and most importantly, hope, to working Pennsylvanians, their families, and their communities."

Jim Best has an uphill climb to gain the 85th State House seat, but politics fascinates this international relations major. He hopes to create awareness and promote a critical exchange of ideas in this race. Best probably won't be too disappointed if he does not win in November because he realizes the difficulties inherent in his candidacy. Still, expect to hear from Jim Best well into the future because he has three things going for him: youth, a strong belief and conviction in his principles, and a name that will always make him the Best candidate.

The Loose

There is a time and a place where staggering drunks, flaming idiots, and the sexually perverse come together for a solid week of doing what they do best: stumbling drunk through millions of people, yelling crude and hilarious obscenities at strangers, and bearing body parts for cheap, plastic beads. Well folks, the time is Mardi Gras, and the place is New Orleans.

Ah, yes, New Orleans. Home of great food, a fabulous Southern culture, and the best and worst in entertainment possibilities. Mardi Gras is no exception. This is the time of year when every extreme form of life bands together to create a most excellent, week-long festival. For those of you who have heard that Mardi Gras is a fabulous excuse to remain gleefully intoxicated for obscene amounts of time and become the promiscuous, flesh-revealing pervert you've always wanted to be, pat yourselves on the back. You have a keen ear.

Picture it. Mardi Gras, 1992. Bourbon Street is filled with drunken, but gaily costumed freaks of nature. Hordes of people fill the streets of New Orleans in search of a strong buzz, cheap beads, and even cheaper thrills. Odd people dressed in black, rubber clothing with metal spikes hang from balconies above the streets, taunting the crowds with long strands of gold beads for a peek at their privates. A rather large woman dressed in a snug-fitting gold, purple, and green sequined evening gown is being carted around by her band of followers with a sign reading "Krewe of Bertha" looming above her. A smell quite comparable, though significantly magnified, to that of a fraternity house basement on a Sunday morning permeates the streets. Do you see it? Do you feel it? Yes? Congratulations, you've just experienced Mardi Gras.

Despite the apparent simplicity of actively participating in Mardi Gras, the factors that make for a successful celebration are not so evident. A few basic rules of partying etiquette and tips on the do's and don'ts of Mardi Gras will help even the most novice carnival goer have a frighteningly unforgettable time.

The first and foremost guideline lies in one's ability to forget for a week who one is. The freedom of temporary amnesia may well save some daring partiers from the potential embarrassment and guilt for actions taken during the festivities. A prime example would be waking up after the celebrating is over, only to find yourself half naked on a park bench with the word "MAMA" tattooed to your forehead.

The second important etiquette rule involves Mardi Gras trinkets. Yes, those cheezy, multicolored, plastic strands of beads, those little brown piles of fake dog doo-doo, the metalloid doubloons, the matching see-through underwear sets, which no sane person would pay a plugged nickel for. Those little items are displays of wealth, courage, wisdom, and bravery. Obtain them at any cost. It takes guts to tackle a 500 lb. man for a strand of beads. But they're worth the trouble. One can never have enough Mardi Gras memorabilia. Someday you'll be able to tell your kids that you body slammed the person next to you for a plastic whip. Ah, such respect and dignity.

These few minor tips for the inexperienced celebrator may seem ludicrous, but will prove to be most valuable bits of knowledge. Perhaps most important would be this: Stay away from Lucky Dog vendors and anything free. Both may sound good, but chances are, both will make you sick. Another invaluable tidbit would be to avoid, at all cost, the little ruffians that approach you, saying, "Hey, man. I betcha I can tell you where you got your shoes!" Save yourself time and money. The inevitable response will be, "Silly tourist. They're on your feet. Gimme $20."

No trip to New Orleans would be complete without an old-fashioned, cut-loose-and-go-ape romp down Bourbon Street. New Orleans, and especially Bourbon Street, is packed to the gills with bars and clubs. Choosing the right one can be a difficult decision. Never fear, though. Whatever your forte may be, Bourbon Street has it.

A visit to Pat O'Briens for the oh-so-famous Hurricane is an absolute must for any tourist. The line can be somewhat hellacious, but the thrill of the Hurricane is without a doubt rewarding.

For those who desire the cram-packed, squished to the walls, club-by atmosphere, the Cat's Meow is the place to be. And if that need to bellow a song sweeps over you, hop on stage and sing along. Every night is karoke night.

If you're looking for something a bit more mellow, The Blacksmith's Shop provides the ideal setting. A dark and quiet little cubby, it's sure to supply any libation for the weary partier.

The Dungeon, an equally dank establishment, is the prime place for those into the alternative scene. Beatniks and bangers alike gather here for an odd, but satisfying party place.

And last, but certainly not least, let us not forget the many illustrious strip joints that line the sidewalks of Bourbon Street. No matter what your preference, Bourbon Street has at least one show-me club featuring every imaginable stripper. So, sit back, peel your hands off your eyes, and savor the quality entertainment.

Lewisburg is a haven for candy lovers

Discriminating sweet tooths unite at Purity and Catherman's homemade candy stores

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Lewisburg, like many small towns, has some secrets. Well-kept ones too—some for as many as 80 years. And while a lot of townspeople do know about them, many Bucknellians do not. But before you start worrying that Lewisburg has some huge, dark, and evil shadow hanging over it, relax. The kind of secrets that I'm talking about have to do with your sweet tooth.

Purity Candy and Catherman's Candy are both home-made candy manufacturers located in Lewisburg. All of the candy production takes place in town, and they produce high quality chocolates and some hard candies for the people of Lewisburg. And, in Catherman's case, distribution reaches various stores and some hospitals in the surrounding areas, as well. According to Sharon Weiser, the spokesperson for Purity Candy, "There is a great demand for the candy besides from just the people of Lewisburg. We do a lot of shipping to people who either have had their roots in Lewisburg and moved away, or have received our candy as a gift and want more. Much of our business increases by word-of-mouth."

But what is it about this candy that makes it so heavenly? "We start from the bottom with fresh chocolate and pure ingredients," noted Catherman's proprietor, Forest Catherman, Jr. "There are no artificial products used, and it is all homemade." Added Weiser, "We constantly strive to make really good candy that is of high quality, which appeals to all varieties of people."

Both Purity and Catherman's Candy offer a variety of confectionary selections for the discriminating chocolate-lover. In addition to loose chocolate sold by the pound, Purity carries a selection of hard candy, lollipops, and specialty molds for Easter.

"Our best seller right now seems to be our chocolate covered pretzels," remarked Weiser. "The price for a pound box of chocolate is $8.25, but the cost for the molds vary according to size and shape."

"We focus mostly on chocolate," commented Catherman. "We have a lot of Easter molds of course, and each item is wrapped individually. A pound of chocolate would cost you $6.60, and if you want it gift-boxed with each piece in its own paper cup, that would be $6.90. We have a high demand for our Vanilla Peanut Cremes and the Peanut Clusters."

Catherman's Candy is located at 209 North Front Street in Lewisburg, PA. They take telephone orders and their number is 523-3873. "We will mail out to anyplace," remarked Catherman. "A lot of Bucknell parents ordered Valentine's Day candy boxes from us for their children, and we already have some Easter orders as well."

Purity Candy is located at 25 North 8th Street in Lewisburg.

Evidently though, some Bucknellians do know about this wonderful secret, especially Dr. David Lu, chair and professor of Japanese and East Asian Studies. "Dr. Lu comes in all the time and brings candy back to Japan," says Weiser.

"In my country there is such a thing called an omiyage," replied Lu. "That means that when you return to your country you bring with you a gift from your new area. Because the candy is made locally, I take that back with me." Actually, Purity candy was one of the first American candies ever served at a Japanese cabinet meeting. "I gave some to the Japanese Prime Minister on one of my returns to Japan," added Lu.

The high quality chocolates and hard candies are popular even beyond the bounds of Lewisburg and, in fact, were the first American candies ever served at a Japanese cabinet meeting.

Residence halls should be higher priority

Many residence hall rooms are too hot, or too cold, and there's not enough hot water, or no water at all due to inadequate pressure. These may be small, personal problems, but when experienced by a large number of students, such concerns become larger, University problems which must be addressed.

There are many priorities at Bucknell, and no shortage of projects on which to spend money. Davis Gym requires major repairs. Cuts have been made in every department. The University is spending operating funds for financial aid, a very dangerous short-term gamble. The next fund-raising campaign will focus on endowment, so that financial aid can be bolstered.

Bucknell must set its priorities, but we believe student needs should be given serious weight in those deliberations. The recommendations in the Trustee Implementation Plan concentrated on the social–residential system. President Sojka tells us that at a residential institution such as this one, the University should take a holistic approach to education, recognizing every moment as being a part of the overall learning experience.

The current lack of minimum living standards seriously impinges on that education. If residents cannot sleep or are constantly ill because their rooms are improperly heated, if they do not have working plumbing, if they must avoid their rooms as much as possible, studies will undoubtedly suffer.

Students become angered as University officials deny the severity of the problem; students feel they are being put off, as Physical Plant employees tell students that the problems simply do not exist. Unlike the freshmen residence halls, perspective students do not tour Trax and Kress, so perhaps they are not deemed to be as important.

While residents would prefer corrective action, they should at least expect a little sympathy. Officials need to recognize student concerns and explain the situation; being honest and admiting Bucknell can't afford repairs would engender more good will than putting off students and denying that problems exist.

The renovation of Trax Hall has been a top priority for several years, but nothing has been done. Meanwhile, the University spent $1.2 million to rebuild Christy Matthewson Memorial Stadium, which is used about ten days of each year. This year Bucknell spent nearly half a million dollars to renovate a fraternity house with a capacity of 39 students. Only one fifth of that $500,000 could have easily corrected all of the problems in Trax and Kress, which together houseapproximately 250 students. Residents must be left to wonder where the University's priorities lie.

Correcting all of the problems in every residence hall will cost a great deal of money. However, the problem can and should be approached incrementally. While the University is in a cutback year, some repairs can be made. The plan to add new water circulation pumps to Trax is a good first step, but these problems must be addressed on a continuing basis, and must become a priority for the University. The problems in the older buildings will only get worse; added to them will be repairs to new buildings such as Smith Hall and the Gateways as they age.

Most importantly, these concerns are student concerns. Students pay to live in the residence halls, and students need an environment conducive to learning. If Bucknell recognizes the importance of the residential experience, then it should recognize the importance of these deficiences and do everything possible to correct them.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Administrator and student defend NOW

TO THE EDITOR:

I find Michael Wardell's criticism of the National Organization for Women and feminists in general more than ironic; it would be humorous if it weren't so sad. In last week's "Beltway Bound" column, he attacks NOW saying that a) they are out of touch with the majority of American women, b) by supporting women's rights they are actually implying that "women are monolithic," and c) their affirmation of individual choices is somehow abominable.

Wardell's arguments are, I believe, full of holes, and most of us are intelligent and educated enough not to give credibility to this lesbian-baiting, feminist-bashing opinion. However, I do feel at least a few of the many inaccuracies need to be opposed so that Wardell might examine his presumption that he knows women better than we know ourselves.

The heterosexist assumptions are apparent in this piece. Wardell assumes that Patricia Ireland's private life will shock and repulse readers, that her affections for a woman partner are abnormal. He invokes a parallel image of President Bush having a homosexual affair as if to suggest powerful men would never do something so immoral. Yet, in truth, many male politicians, including presidents, have had extramarital affairs and tried to keep them secret or denied them. Where does the real abomination lie? With an organizational leader who openly and honestly expresses her love for other human beings? Or with elected public officials who repeatedly lie to their constituents, show callous disregard for the pain and suffering of individuals, families, and nations, and make conscious decisions to hide the truth of corruption and war?

> Here is a sampling of some of the causes addressed by NOW in recent years: equal pay for equal work, family and medical leave, ...

NOW, he claims, is "groping for new issues," and becoming "ever more radical." Here is a sampling of some of the causes addressed by NOW in recent years: equal pay for equal work, family and medical leave, an end to sexual assault and domestic violence, child abuse intervention and that women's groups, therefore, have become antiquated and unnecessary.

Mr. Wardell, do you honestly believe that the Bush administration or any of its preceding administrations would have acknowledged that is a gender bias in America without the efforts of "radical fringe movements" such as NOW? Equal opportunity and equal pay may, with reservation, be called "mainstream issues," only because women organized, pressured, and rocked the proverbial boat. Further, being mainstream issues does not automatically guarantee that they will be seriously addressed or resolved by those currently in office. Only continued campaigning, lobbying, and activism, can insure that.

> Equal opportunity and equal pay may, with reservation, be called "mainstream issues," only because women organized, pressured, and rocked the proverbial boat.

Don't you tell me, Mr. Wardell, that I shouldn't call myself a feminist because you have determined it is out of YOUR mainstream. Calling myself a feminist means I'm not happy with the status quo; I want some things changed. If you feel threatened by this, that's your problem, but don't you pretend to be concerned with how women go about changing the system when your article does little else but tell us that the system need not be changed.

Professor responds to criticism and strikes back

TO THE EDITOR:

I appreciate Rod Bate's thoughtful response to my earlier article describing the media's bias towards the interests of the wealthy, and its impact on elections. I'll try to clarify my argument.

First, my basic point about the economy in the Reagan-Bush years was fairly straight forward. As a result of huge tax breaks for the rich and other changes in government policy, the U.S. experienced the most massive upward redistribution of wealth in the history of the world. The after-tax income of the richest 1 percent of the population approximately doubled (even after adjusting for the effects of inflation) while the income of the bottom 80 percent stagnated or declined.

The changes in the tax code were clearly designed to bring about this result. The top marginal tax rate fell from 70 percent in 1980 to 30 percent presently. For capital gains, the top rate fell from 35 percent in 1977 (the cuts began under Carter) to 30 percent at present. It's true that many rich people had used quasi-legal or illegal tax shelters to avoid paying their tax bills prior to 1980 (which they continue to do), as Mr. Bate implies, but this enormous reduction in tax rates has still created a huge windfall for the rich.

The proponents of this "soak the poor and middle class: give to the rich" strategy justified it by saying that it would lead to rapid economic growth. It didn't. The Reagan-Bush years have been the slowest period of economic growth since the Great Depression. The growth rate of investment has been even worse. There may still be some people who think the rich should have even more money, but polls indicate little support for further give-aways to the wealthy.

Second, I don't see how any of Mr. Bate's arguments call into question my more general point about media bias toward the interests of its rich owners, and the effect this has on elections. We agree that Clinton has gotten extremely favorable treatment from the media. So has Paul Tsongas, as documented in a study by the Center for Media and Public Affairs. The New Hampshire vote went mostly to these two candidates, both of whom promise a large capital gains tax break for the rich. (Both would place restrictions on this tax break, but rich people usually hire tax lawyers who get around such restrictions.)

> Kathleen Jamieson's analysis of the 1988 election... found that the media characterizations of frontrunners were generally positive, while underdogs were usually described in negative terms.

The conventional wisdom is still that Clinton will win the nomination, but if his difficulty telling the truth gets in the way, it's clear that Tsongas has been set up as a fallback. Now that 100,000 people in New Hampshire have cast their ballots, the media have moved from virtually ignoring the other candidates to totally ignoring them. Several days passed in which the nightly television and radio news shows, as well as the major newspapers, discussed only Tsongas and Clinton. One would never know from this coverage that Harkin is still the leader in delegates.

Mr. Bate disputed my claim that the media pay little attention to the issues and fills up its coverage with endless nonsense about polls, electability, and the candidates' pseudo-scandals. His evidence was, "An unscientific, casual perusal of two recent papers (USA Today, Feb. 17; and the N. Y. Times, Feb. 16)."

That issue of the Times exemplifies my complaint. The paper has five articles in the first section on the Democrats. The two front page articles talked about expectations for the election; both headlines mentioned only Clinton and/or Tsongas. One article focused on Tsongas and the other centered on Tsongas and Clinton. Page 26 included the continuation of these articles as well as an article about the candidates' television ads. Across the top of the page was a quote from Tsongas. Page 28 had the candidate comparisons on the issues mentioned by Mr. Bate. The quote across the top of this page was from Bill Clinton. Before actually getting to the short segments summarizing the candidates' positions on several issues, the Times told us in large type, "The five Democratic candidates agree more than they disagree." The last story (page 46) was about the candidates' fundraising in New York.

This day (which was particularly good for the N.Y. Times, since it featured some substantive comparisons, unlike most previous coverage) still had a ratio of about 3:1 in coverage given to polls, expectations, and electibility, as compared to discussions of the is-

So you think abortion is murder

BY GREG MAY

With the lack of a visible, active pro-Choice movement on campus, the pro-Life movement at Bucknell has been able to present their point of view with little debate: abortion is an act of murder and should be condemned. The pro-Choice side would most often respond that the issue is about choice, and about the right of a woman to control her own body. As a pro-Choice advocate, I tend to argue for the rights of the woman, but I feel that the basis of the pro-Life argument needs to be discussed: is the fetus a human being deserving of human rights, or more specifica ly, a Right-to-Life? Ignoring the issue won't bring us any closer to a solution. As Celeste Michelle Condit points out in her book Decoding Abortion Rhetoric, "The pro-Life argument forces us to face the real violence in abortion, and their truths are necessary to keep us morally responsible. They prevent us from seeing abortion as a casual act of birth control; they remind us, powerfully, that we ought to take serious measures as individuals and as a society to reduce or eliminate abortions...."

> We cannot polarize into pro-Fetus/pro-Woman groups. Both sides deserve to be considered; both sides need to make concessions.

Much of the argument between pro-Life and pro-Choice activists has become focused on semantics: What is a "human being?" What is a "person?" What is a "right?" Pro-Life activists have made many people re-think the status of the fetus. Their films and sometimes valid medical information concerning the fetus have, I think, shown many pro-Choice advocates that the fetus is not merely a variable in a simple mathematical equation, but is instead an unborn person. If, as a pro-Choice advocate, I accept the fetus as an "other" for the sake of argument, certain questions must be addressed: is there such a thing as a Right-to-Life, and if so, when does it begin?

To avoid an intensive and highly subjective medical debate that I am not qualified to enter into, I'll begin with a firm American reality. Legally, in order to have a "right" one must be an individual. Biologically, the fetus remains absolutely dependent upon the mother until the point of viability (when the fetus can exist outside of the womb—generally regarded to be between 24-28 weeks). Before this point, a fetus could hardly be considered an individual since it has never been capable of sustaining its own life, and cannot hold any rights whatsoever. If science finds a way to remove and sustain a fetus from conception, then perhaps a Right-to-Life can begin then, but at present such a right simply cannot legally exist.

But even if such a method were discovered, a Right-to-Life still would not include the right to use the body of another human being in order to survive. Just as those from a pro-Choice point of view cannot ignore the fetus as an issue, those from a pro-Life standpoint must understand that the woman cannot be ignored either. Until viability, the fetus is biologically dependent upon the mother. Outside of the abortion sphere, few would suggest that the state should be allowed to coerce people into allowing their bodies to be used by others (some may cite the military draft, but it's obvious we are talking about something altogether different), so why is it that women are being singled out in this particular instance? To cite Celeste Condit again, "...even when a given person is dependent on precisely one other human being for a donated organ (e.g., a kidney) because only one other person can provide a good and timely match, the law and society refuse to compel that potential donor to give up the kidney for another, even if the donor is dead." A woman is not simply a house for the child, but is an individual person, and as such has rights of her own. To ban abortion outright can in many ways subject a woman to the role of incubator.

The United States has always needed someone to hate

BY ERIC LYON

Current conventional wisdom tells us that America is the lone superpower in the global community, but if you told that to voters in New Hampshire, they might think you were insane. In fact, citizens of the Granite State would probably think you were misinformed if you actually thought that a nickel-and-dime, tinker-here-tinker-there fiscal policy and an ardent "outsider" message were not the essential ingredients of the next leader of our "superpower."

What the voters in New Hampshire and all across America seem not to understand is that America will not reap the rewards (such as diplomatic might) of superpower status by simply improving the economy. This is limited, short-term thinking. What America needs right now more than anything else is exactly what the end of the Cold War has left us without. America needs a new enemy.

Don't just take my word for it; listen to what Tom Rath, former New Hampshire attorney general and GOP insider, has to say about this idea. "This electorate is angry, upset, and cynical. Voters no longer believe that the system cares about them. And with the end of the Cold War depriving us of a common foe, the old political answers do not work anymore." It is worth noting that the old political answers were not so bad, especially in light of our apathetic and uninformed electorate.

The preceding characterization of American voters need not necessarily be insulting. In fact, it can be considered complementary as it highlights our ability to maintain stability in the most liberated country in the world, even though half of Americans don't vote and one-third are functionally illiterate. Sure, this resonates as a description of a pseudo-democracy, but it is a low-maintenance democracy. And apparently that is just how America likes it.

Just over a month ago, less than half of American voters could identify the names of Paul Tsongas and Bill Clinton, much less tell you what political vision these Democratic front-runners have for our nation. But you can bet that almost all Americans held a strong opinion on Clarence Thomas, Anita Hill, or William Kennedy Smith. Americans would much rather be entertained by sensationalistic, theater-like drama than make an informed decision regarding the means to accelerate America's progress toward a more humane society.

This thought is expressed by scholar Walter Lippman when he states that "in the epochal crisis of our time the cause of civilization is being defended by men who possess a great tradition that has become softened by easy living, by men who have forgotten the necessities in which their principals were wrought." As I recall, during the Cold War our principles were relatively clear-cut and easy to define, perfectly tailored to the vast majority of Americans who care more about this evening's television programming than America's role in the global community.

As I see it, Americans now face two choices: 1) become better educated, politically active, and deal with the repercussions of re-defining our nation as a whole or 2) find a new enemy and continue

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Student clarifies his position on past opinions

TO THE EDITOR:

Dave Goldstein's Letter to the Editor about my article criticizing the politically correct crowd is a perfect case-in-point about the tactics that the PC people use to try to silence speech on America's college campuses today. Using innuendo, flat-out lies, and a creative "kamikaze" approach to attacking me, Dave Goldstein has attempted to smear me with the typical left-wing smorgasbord of "isms": racism, sexism, etc.

Mr. Goldstein's letter assumes that because I support the rights of all people to speak, no matter how popular or unpopular their views, that I am somehow endorsing their views. Nothing could be further from the truth. I am no more a communist if I defend the right of communists to speak than I am a sexist if I defend the rights of sexists to speak.

I would like the entire Bucknell community to know that I am not at all the person Dave Goldstein would have you believe. If he thinks lying about who I am will silence me, he is dead wrong. It will only make me fight harder. I have faith that, eventually, common sense will prevail. People who hold our rights in high regard will be able to withstand the attacks from the left-wing fascist army of Dave Goldsteins who control American campuses today.

For those of you who missed the article that caused this controversy, a brief summary appears below. Am I a racist? A sexist? Or, am I one of the many who sees the need for the equal application of our rights as American citizens? Judge for yourself:

1. I stated that the pure hubris of a group of people proclaiming themselves to have the "correct" opinions had no place in a democracy; the "politically correct" are comparable to the Nazis.

2. I then described the variety of tactics that the politically correct will use to silence opposition: They will deface or remove flyers that express a view that differs from their own. They will shout down speakers who do not preach what they want to hear. They will attempt to censor books or other written forms of expression that contradict their views. Again, I compared the detestable tactics of the "politically correct" liberals with those of the Nazis during the rise of German National Socialism.

3. I then gave an example of how political correctness manifests itself at Bucknell, citing the example of the proposed boycott of last semester's Management 101 company "Amigos for Children," the company that sold Churros. (A better example is a rule at Tufts, whereby any student that excludes a minority from a conversation can be suspended or expelled.)

4. Lastly, I chastised the politically correct for attempting to circumvent our First Amendment and replace it with a version of freedom of speech more to their liking—freedom of speech as long as they agree with it.

People, this is serious business. We don't realize it here at Bucknell, because we're about 10 years behind the curve on this issue. There is a real battle being fought at many other campuses—a battle for the mind and soul of our generation. So far, it doesn't look good. Your freedoms are being limited at every turn.

In America, everyone has the right to be wrong. If someone utters disparaging words about some group, confront that person. Don't hide behind the false shield of censorship and intimidation. Expose the person's ignorance; let the ignorance speak for itself. But, when someone begins to decide what can and can't be said, we all lose. When we abdicate to some unseen authority the ability to regulate our speech (and, in effect, our thoughts), then we have abdicated our lives. And, that's exactly why Dave Goldstein has attacked me so viciously. He wants your freedom, and I won't let him take it.

Alumnus thinks The Bucknellian is overreacting to housing situation

TO THE EDITOR:

In both a lead article and the editorial in your February 21, 1992 issue, The Bucknellian decries the potential overcrowding of dormitories in the next academic year. It appears that The Bucknellian may be overreacting to the situation.

As your editorial points out, the admissions' process is an inexact science. The University is never sure of the size of an incoming class until the time for acceptances has passed. The process of filling rooms is equally inexact. Even before the institution of the four-year residency requirement, the University was never certain of the number of students who would desire to live on campus until after the room draws had taken place.

The University has now implemented a change in policy with respect to living off-campus. This was an important part of President Sojka's plan. There does not appear to be merit to your argument that the University should have given more consideration to the process before implementing it this year. There would still be the variable of the number of students desiring to live off-campus. The plan can be modified as a result of the experience of its implementation.

The result of the worst-case scenario is not as dire as your editorial implies. Dean Commerford is correct that the rooms in Old Swartz were at one time used as doubles. In fact, prior to the University's recent construction boom, the housing situation was much different than that now experienced by Bucknell students. In the former freshman quad, the rooms in Trax and Kress were all doubles for men and the rooms in East and West Main were doubles, and even triples, for women. Old Swartz (A and B wings) were all doubles, housing primarily sophomores. It had been this way for the latter part of the 1970s and into the 1980s. It was also not unusual for lounges to be converted "temporarily" into student rooms (even though "temporary" sometimes lasted all year). Even with this situation, the dire consequences predicted by your editorial did not come to pass.

Rather than over-react, the best course of action for the University appears to be one of wait-and-see. The University's policy to control off-campus living is a laudable one that can be fine-tuned over the years as circumstances and experience dictate.

tion and prevention, reproductive rights, educational reform, the fair allocation of funds for women's sports, health care for all, anti-discrimination in the workplace, racial equality, global peace, environmental concerns, anti-Klan and anti-Nazi efforts, affordable quality child care, women in the military, anti-pornography campaigns, international human rights, the Free South Africa Movement, as well as rights for gays, lesbians, and bisexuals. Do these sound like the activities of a single-issue group? Does this partial list imply that feminists believe all women's issues are the same of that we could possibly address our many concerns in one "monolithic" voice? It really doesn't even sound all that radical considering we are still fighting for most of the same rights we were a quarter of a century ago. Despite the rhetoric of folks like Bush, pay equity is not a reality for women, nor is freedom from violence, discrimination, or poverty.

To suggest "feminists are women's worst nightmare," Wardell belittles the true injustice and brutality many women face on a daily basis. Such a statement also fails to acknowledge that all women and many men benefit from the hard-fought struggles of feminists. That women have the right to vote and own property, that battered women can now seek safe refuge or legal redress, that there are rape shield laws protecting victims, that women can seek education and employment almost anywhere, that sexual harassment is against the law, that homemakers are considered "working" women, that day care centers exist, that women are represented in diverse professional and technical careers as well as in sports and the arts—all can be attributed to the work of the women's movement.

I agree with Wardell that "American women are intelligent and diverse," but as a woman, feminist, and NOW member, I prefer to speak for myself and hear from my sisters than have him misinterpret and distort the reality of our life experiences. And unlike Wardell, I will not bow to the national trend of feminist backlash. As an advocate for women's rights, I support all women's right, including those of lesbians and bisexuals.

Socialized health care's ills

BY MICHAEL WARDELL

National health care is a strange concept which came out of left field and ought to stay there. America has the best medical care in the world. Unfortunately, like in every other country, our hospitals cannot be all things to all people. This is particularly true when the government gets involved.

Health care is a very emotional issue. Anyone against a socialized health policy appears to be against letting needy people get medical treatment. In fact, this is what happens all over the world. What makes the American argument so interesting is that we argue it at all.

All over the world, doctors privately decide who gets what kind of treatment. In most cases, patients over sixty-five years of age do not get renal dialysis or heart transplants. Why? Because these treatments are too expensive, and because the patients typically do not live very long. Patients are usually allowed to quietly die, so that medical resources can be applied where they do the most good.

But what if, say some people, our federal government put some of its vast resources into a national socialized health care policy? Wouldn't we have enough treatment to go around? Haven't Canada and the UK demonstrated that socialized health care is viable policy?

Historically, our government social policy is not a scalpel, but a hammer: broad sweeping and hard-hitting. Louis Sullivan, Cabinet secretary for Health & Human Services, imagines what a national health policy would be like: "It would combine the compassion of the IRS and the efficiency of the Post Office."

Sullivan's model rings true in Canada, New Zealand, and in the UK, where treatment is distributed according to strict rules, and if you are the exception, life is cruel. In some cases, British patients must wait six months for elective surgery. Both countries are re-evaluating their policies—and looking to us as the example.

At the same time that countries are dismantling their socialized {health care} systems, we are trying to build our own. We ought to learn from their mistakes.

New Zealand is an interesting case. As an immigrant from NZ, I can speak from experience. New Zealand has public, or so-called "free" hospitals, and private hospitals where you pay as you go. For years, patients requiring special procedures trusted the private hospitals with their lives, because the government-employed doctors were regarded to be less capable. Today, New Zealand is dismantling almost all of its socialized policy in favor of a model approximating the American system.

At the same time that countries are dismantling their socialized systems, we are trying to build our own. We ought to learn from their mistakes. Jack Kemp said: "If you subsidize something, you get more of it." This holds true for both injuries and expensive medical bills. Here's a true New Zealand health care story from my father, formerly a NZ doctor (note: from this author's personal experience last semester, the price of an arm cast in Lewisburg is $400):

Monday:

A young man, with a thumb fracture, came into the clinic. My father put a cast on the arm and sent him home.

Tuesday:

The young man returned, with his cast soggy and coming apart. My father removed the cast, put on a new cast. The patient explained that he "didn't know one can't bring the cast into the shower."

Wednesday:

The young man returned, this time his cast was shattered and coming apart. My father put on a new cast. The patient explained that he was a carpenter. His broken thumb prevented him from using a hammer, so instead he used his cast to drive in the nails. Hence the broken cast.

Thursday:

The young man returned, with a cast that was both soggy and shattered. My father put a new cast on the arm. The patient sheepishly explained that the cast had been ruined because he used it to "attack-train his German shepherd."

When health care is "free," people will abuse it. The young man's injury cost taxpayers four times as much as it would had he used better judgment. That example, and many more like it, bankrupted the New Zealand health care, leaving insufficient resources for everyone else. The New Zealand policy is widely regarded as a folly. Let's not repeat it on a grand scale.

I have consciously avoided addressing much of the subjective "evidence" that is often used in arguing for the "personhood" of a fetus. Some like to qualify it visually-visible hands and feet have a strong effect on people; some like to qualify it by motion, a kick perhaps. These viewpoints ignore the woman who is involved. I have also decided not to address the reality that many resent the fact that it is primarily men in Washington who are deciding what a woman can and cannot do with her own body—while I understand that assessment, it ignores the fetus. These types of arguments lead to nothing but a shouting match between two stubborn groups of people. The issue of viability addresses, I think, both the rights of the woman and the fetus, and provides a compromise that can at least cool a heated debate to a point where the issue can be rationally discussed.

I have also tried to avoid merely attacking what is wrong with the pro-Life viewpoint and instead tried to address what I saw as an issue that, until discussed, will continue to block any sort of dialogue between the groups. We cannot polarize into pro-Fetus/pro-Woman groups. Both sides deserve to be considered; both sides need to make some concessions: The pro-Life movement needs to accept that the issue is not as clear-cut as outright murder and that a woman has rights of her own. Many pro-Life advocates have begun to relax their firm stance in conceding that in cases of rape, incest, and where the mother's life is in danger, abortion should be a viable alternative (such a concession seems to affect the whole of their argument in many ways). In response, the pro-Choice movement needs to consider that the act of abortion is a violent one, whether the fetus is considered by law to be a "person" or not. Both sides need to step up efforts to educate people on how to avoid unwanted pregnancies altogether. Above all, both groups should begin a constructive dialogue in order to come to some sort of solution. In our democracy, we seem to accept too readily the premise that whoever yells the loudest wins. Neither side is going to disappear. If we call a cease fire, calm down, and discuss it with more restraint, perhaps both sides can benefit.

with slow and steady movement toward a better society. Though the former sounds appealing, the latter seems both more realistic and congruent with the life-style of most Americans.

Consider the following recent trends in America that have needlessly divided our country. Since the end of the Cold War, America has seen an explosion of questions regarding artistic value (and most recently the removal of John Frohnmayer, chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts, solely for political purposes), the attempt to redefine language and race relations through the "politically correct movement," and a furious assault on Japan.

The above examples underscore the fact that America has become marred down in introspection, and as a consequence, we have impeded our ability to deal rationally with serious political problems. With regards to our sudden attacks on Japan, Harvard economist Robert Reich states that Americans "seem to need Japan as we once needed the Soviet Union—as a means of defining ourselves, our interests, our obligations to one another. However, Japan will not suffice as an enemy, because our gripe with it is not ideological but economic. Therefore, the Administration should continue the course of refusing substantial aid to the former Soviet Union and let a strategic few of those countries sink back into the hands of Communists. After all, America is the most liberated country in the world, and if the selected growth and fervent identification of communism overseas (China's communist government appears ripe) is needed to maintain order and stability at home, I see no solid reason that this should not become our global strategy.

Writer questions reader's carefulness

TO THE EDITOR:

In response to Paul Triplett 's sweeping condemnation in last week's The Bucknellian of anything that challenges or criticizes "Ronald Reagan and his great legacy," I have just a few short observations. I will ignore the many tangents that Mr. Triplett embarks on for I fear I lack the creativity to defend Ronald Reagan by citing an increase in charitable contributions or blame financial mismanagement on Ralph Nader. I will stick to the facts.

Before Mr. Triplett writes his next stinging criticism, I suggest he first get his facts straight. If he had read my article more carefully he would have seen that I said, "big business and industry are the ones who have let us down." You shouldn't be so quick to come to Reagan's defense.

Michael Milken, now in jail for securities fraud, was the mastermind of the junk bond market-high-yield, high-risk bonds that carry the lowest ratings by Standard and Poors and Moodys. With the help of the Executive branch and Congress, Savings and Loans were allowed to purchase these bonds. Before 1981 the purpose of a Savings and Loan was to finance people's mortgages and help more Americans buy homes. After deregulation their managers were taking millions of dollars in savings deposits and buying junk bonds. Columbia Savings and Loan inflated its balance sheet from $370 million in assets to $10.4 billion worth of junk (ref: Liars Poker.) Without a doubt deregulation of the industry and Milken's bonds are responsible for the S&L debacle.

Leveraged-Buy-Outs (LBO's) were another area of corporate greed that helped steer the American economy onto the road it is on today. Raiders like Ronald Perlman would find an undervalued company and offer a higher bidding price on outstanding common stock than the market place was currently offering, thus threatening to take control of the company. This would send management scrambling to raise funds through debt in order to fend off the vultures. If they were successful they would have a company so leveraged in debt it couldn't afford to invest or expand in the 90's. If they were unsuccessful, which they often were, the Raider would take over the company, break it up into little pieces and liquidate it, selling off all of its assets. This did wonders for the GNP.

And let's not forget our beloved friend Ivan Boesky, also in jail, who, in cahoots with Dennis Levine, learned of future LBO's before the general public could, and dumped millions of dollars into the company, only to sell it weeks later.

I hope that I have made my point a little bit more clear to Mr. Triplett. I hope that he understands that the success or failure of the economy, or an administration, cannot be measured by the rise and fall of charitable contributions.

sues. The fluff was on the front page; the substance on page 28. Thus, only careful Times readers would be troubled by any mention of issues. The fluff focused on the Capital Gains Kids, and the top of the page quotes of wisdom came from these two as well. Remember, this focus on Tsongas and Clinton took place before the New Hampshire primary. Their sole test of electoral strength at the time was the Iowa caucuses where they had received 3.9% and 3.6% of the vote respectively.

Moving beyond unscientific studies, Kathleen Jamieson's (Dean of the Annenburg School of Communication) analysis of media coverage of the 1988 election found that "frontrunners" consistently received far more coverage than underdogs. It also found that the media characterizations of frontrunners were generally positive, while underdogs were usually described in negative terms. When the frontrunners are picked before a single vote is cast (or in this case, where the first votes were overwhelmingly cast against them) the implication should be obvious. The media pick a frontrunner, focus almost exclusively on their candidate, and eventually get the voters to ratify their choice. It is hard to imagine a candidate not favored by the rich or the media overcoming the advantages given the frontrunner.

There have been many other recent studies that have similarly documented a conservative bias in the media. One study, conducted during the Iraq War by researchers at the University of Massachusetts, found that the more television people watched, the less they knew about the war and the more likely they were to support it. Other studies have documented the systematic establishment bias in shows such as Nightline and McNeil-Lehrer.

Mr. Bate notes that all the complaints he hears are about a liberal media bias, not a conservative one. His point is very well taken. Conservatives like Pat Buchanan, William Buckley, John McLaughlin, George Will, etc. regularly appear to complain about liberal bias. The media has not allowed people on the left (who don't just whine, but document their case) to present their view. That is why Mr. Bate seldom sees it.

The obvious example here is the controversary surrounding coverage of the Persian Gulf War. At a time when all the major networks and newspapers were mostly just repeating Pentagon news releases, the major focus of criticism was a single reporter (Peter Arnett) reporting from Iraq. Even though thousands protested the media's pro-war coverage, people like Rod Bate only heard the complaints about Arnett. Anti-war critics simply weren't newsworthy.

Apart from the well-documented evidence of conservative media bias, common sense is also instructive. Every major newspaper, radio and television station in the country is owned by people with six or seven figure incomes. Does one really expect rich executives to cover news in a manner that is favorable to poor or working-class people?

Professor upset over stolen statue parts

I was deeply saddened to receive a letter from Frederick Franck on the same day I heard that parts of his sculpture had been stolen. The letter was written by this noted artist and sculptor in response to the dedication ceremony of his sculpture of the "Seven Generations" on Tuesday, Feb. 25 here at Bucknell. Franck has donated the sculpture to Bucknell for the cost of the materials and this was the last in a series of seven sculptures that he has made. At the age of 82 he drove from Warwick, NY to Bucknell with his wife for the dedication ceremony. He was especially pleased to see the involvement of students with the sculpture because of the ecological symbolism that it represents for future generations. What would he think now?

He was delighted that the dedication of this evocative sculpture coincided with the opening of the President's Forum on the Environmental Imperative with Lyrn Margulis' talk on Gaia on Tuesday evening. President Sojka himself was there to participate in the dedication ceremony as was Larry Shinn, Jim Rice, and Bob Metzger who, along with Barry Maxwell, had been instrumental in helping the sculpture to come to Bucknell. Bob Metzger, the director of the Center Gallery, especially recognized the artistic value of Franck's work which has gained international recognition.

When John Grim and I went to Franck's home and studio on Dec. 30th to discuss the possibility of the gift of his sculpture to Bucknell, his warmth, enthusiasm, and generosity were striking. Franck has been inspired by the work of Mohandas Gandhi, Albert Schweitzer and Martin Luther King. As an artist and writer he has dedicated himself to the cause of peace. The recent act of desecration to his sculpture that has occurred on Bucknell's campus could only bring enormous pain to a person like himself with such broad concerns for the future of our planet.

Are we to tell Franck that Bucknell is a place where such concerns are trivialized, where civility is no longer possible, where art can be thoughtlessly vandalized, and where respect for Native American wisdom is absent? The violation of this sculpture impoverishes all of us and saddens me beyond words. In the name of human decency and aesthetic expression, I implore those responsible for this wanton act to return the label and the missing pieces of the sculpture. Please don't give Franck cause to despair of the present generation here at Bucknell.

Bison track sweeps Patriot League meet

Both women and men use superior depth to capture indoor titles; Gulden named Patriot League Women's Coach of the Year and Bridget Dean '95 placed in the 500.

The last of life's three givens—death, taxes, and a men's indoor title—is still intact as well. Despite several "flat" performances coupled with numerous bouts with the flu, the Bison men managed to take their second straight Patriot League Indoor title by over 30 points. Depth was once again the key as Bucknell scored in every event except the triple jump, in which no Bison were entered.

"Winning with depth is a theory we've used since I got here," stated Gulden. "Some guys were flat and less aggressive than expected, but we still won."

The men only managed two first-place finishes. Bob Kelly '92 won the 5,000-meter run and an extremely ill Joe LaBarge '93 easily soared to the front in the pole vault. Lehigh and Fordham, who finished second and third, respectively, captured six top honors apiece, but not enough overall points to be a factor.

The last of life's three givens—death, taxes, and a men's indoor title—is still intact as well.

Six Bucknellians contributed points in multiple events. Jim Bock '92 placed second in the 55 and tied for third in the 200-meter dash. Pete Gregory '93 finished number two in the shot put and sixth in the 35-pound weight. Rick Van Emburgh '95 scored in the 55-meter high hurdles and in the 500-meter run.

Members of Bucknell's outstanding cross country team dominated every race from the 88 to the 5,000-meter. In addition to Kelly, Jeff Loomis '92, Tom Eagleson '93, John Lewis '93, Tom Wuchenich '92, Matt Deardorff '92, Judd Jarden '93, Dave Slupe '93, Jason Cahilly '92, David Howard '93, Michael Bronson '93, Jim Farrer '93, and Brian Breslin '95 all turned in scoring performances.

"Lehigh's guys had a good meet, but they just didn't have enough bodies and went blank in some events," said Gulden.

With less than eight weeks before the two teams have to defend their outdoor crowns, the rest of the Patriot league doesn't have too much time to regroup and mount any kind of challenge. When asked if the other squads harbored any resentment towards his teams' success, Gulden responded with a resounding yes and a quote from another Patriot League foe: "Holy Cow! Now they're doing it with their women too."

Having just concluded his second straight track and field sweep (last spring's outdoor meet and this indoor title), not to mention a fabled week of recruiting, Gulden's women and men should be a good bet to chalk up the winner's eight points each for the league's Presidents' Cup for years to come.

Women to face Lafayette in tourney

Bison cagers set for re-match with Leopards after nearly pulling off an upset

If you are the type of person who is into following trends, then you must think that Bucknell's women's basketball team is a lock to beat Lafayette in the first round of the Patriot League Tournament. That's right—the Bison, who finished the regular season 7-19 overall and 4-10 in conference play, are the seventh seed in the tourney, but they seem to have everything lined up to pull off some upsets. You trend-followers know how difficult it is to beat a team three times in one season. Well, that is what Lafayette, the second seed, will have to do to advance. The Leopards cruised to an 80-50 win in Easton on Feb. 1, but the Bison looked like a new team last Saturday in Davis Gym as they fell just short, losing 85-82.

Superstitions aside, Bucknell has proven to the rest of the Patriot League that they are, indeed, a team to be reckoned with. The team has won four of their last seven games, including three of four to close the regular season. Among those games was a victory over defending league champion Holy Cross and tough road wins at Lehigh and George Mason.

Head coach Juliene Simpson is looking forward to the opportunity to meet Lafayette for the third time. "We have improved quite a bit," Simpson said. "We play better when we have already played a team and see we can do certain things. No matter who we play, we are more mature now."

Tri-captain Joy Sandler '92 drives to the basket for two of her 25 points against Lafayette last Saturday in Davis Gym.

Last Saturday in Lewisburg the Leopards were confident, perhaps too confident, that they could repeat their mauling that they handed out a month earlier. When they jumped out to a 24-14 lead midway through the first half, they were feeling even better. However, it turned out that they barely got out of town alive.

The Bison stormed back, scoring the next eight points, including a big three-pointer by Anne McGovern '93. McGovern has been a steady performer this season filling in for the injured Kelly Dee '94. On Saturday she scored 18 point—one short of her career high—on seven of 13 shooting from the field, including four of five from three-point land.

A driving layup by tri-captain Joy Sandler '92 tied the score at 27, and the game would see-saw from there on out. Sandler has been the main force behind the turnaround this season. She scored 25 points against Lafayette—the fourth time in eight games that she surpassed the 20-point mark. Sandler also led the team in scoring in six of those last eight contests.

The Bison, who trailed by four at the half, were able to come back once again. Another Sandler layup triggered a 7-0 run which saw the Bison take a 69-65 lead with seven minutes left. The teams traded hoops for awhile, until, with 43 seconds left, Lafayette took a four point lead, 83-79. Sandler would not disappoint her teammates, however, as she nailed a three-pointer with 32 ticks left, bringing the Bison back to within one. Following the inbound, Sandler fouled Lafayette's Stacy Farrow, who proceeded to miss the front end of her one-and-one. Monica Nawarskas '94 snatched the rebound, and the Bison had one last chance at victory. It wasn't meant to be, however, as tri-captain Lisa Fink '93 stepped on the baseline when she attempted to drive to the goal.

Nonetheless, the fact that Bucknell performed so well against one of the league's powers suggests that there might be some bright moments in the post-season. "We're going into the tournament confident that we can win," Simpson said. "We have to hustle and we have to make the right decisions."

Should the Bison come away winners in the first round game tonight at 5:30, they would take on the winner of the Holy Cross-Colgate game tomorrow at 4:45.

Women skiers make nationals

BY MARK ABRAHAMSEN AND ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Following tradition of the 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team's "Miracle on Ice," the Bucknell women's ski team had its own "Miracle on Snow" at the 1992 Mid-Atlantic Regional Championships Feb. 22 and 23 in Silver Creek, WV.

The Lady Bison, racing once again with the minimum allowable three skiers, defied the odds and qualified for the National Collegiate Ski Association (NCSA) National Championships, to be held March 11–14 in Lake Placid, NY, the same site that a similar undermanned group of youngsters captivated the heart of a nation a dozen years ago.

The Bucknell threesome, captain Sarah McCahill '93, Adrienne Siefert '95, and Hilary Rosen '95, clinched the Bison's second trip to nationals in three years as they skied to a third-place finish (out of twelve teams). In Lake Placid next week, Bucknell will race against the top 16 teams in the nation. While a formidable challenge awaits them, the Bison's goal from the outset of the season has been reached simply by making it there.

The Bucknell men's ski team, which had consistently skied to the top of the standings all season long, were caught by a combination of having an "off" weekend and sustaining a bit of bad luck. The men raced to a fifth-place finish, tying Penn, another school which was expected to post a better showing.

Temperatures in the high-40s provided slow and soft snow conditions for the weekend, which brought some surprising results from the extremely flat course. Feb. 22 showcased the giant slalom, and the women were once again led by Siefert, the Colorado native who skied two clean runs en route to an individual third-place finish from a

Alumni wheeze to a good time

Basketball stars of yesteryear return to Davis Gym for third annual Alumni game

BY BRAD TUFTS
Special to The Bucknellian

A little creative halftime scoreboard adjustment kept last Saturday's third annual Alumni Basketball Game interesting to all of those fans who came out to enjoy the game.

The White team opened up a big lead in the first 20 minutes, but the scoreboard was set at 50-50 to begin the second half. The Blue unit, given new life, redeemed itself in the second half of the game following a two-minute overtime.

TIP-INS
The following rules changes were adopted for the game: the 24-second shot clock, free substitution during play, no fouling out, and unlimited timeouts.

The White, which took overall scoring honors by 129-101, was led by the 31-point effort of Keith Fenton '91, who hit all nine of his free throw attempts and four of five shots from three-point range. Also scoring in double figures for the White team were John Watson '89 with 22, Mark Allsteadt '87, who added 12 rebounds to his 18 points; Chris Seneca '87, the point guard on Bucknell's first NCAA team, with 17 points and eight assists; Doug Allen '88 with 14; and Mark Janaskie '85 with 12.

The Blues were led by Mike Joseph '90 with 24 points, and Bobby Woollum '89 with 15, the only other player in double figures. Lennie Klebanoff '79, who was on campus last September as a speaker in the Merck Chemistry Lecture Series, topped both teams with 15 rebounds and added six points. Other scorers for the Blue team were Tom Knuth '80 and Matt Romberger '84 with eight each. Pat Flannery '80 chipped in seven, while Harvey Edwards '78, Mike Hepburn '80, and Rick Pfaff '90 added six apiece. Malik Malone '91 contributed five points; Joe Vullo '81 and Tim Owen '84 four each. Rob Joy '91 had a douce.

Also scoring for the White team were Kevin Blackwell '86 with eight points, Bob Barry '80 with three, and Gerald Purnell '78 and Ed Sigl '84 with two each.

Three players were scoreless for the afternoon, and all had good excuses. John Matthews '65 graduated before many of the other players were born. Grant Tormey '90 was a manager as an undergraduate and Ted Schoeck '81 was too busy taking care of his four children, including three-year-old twins.

McCahill, who peaked at the right time of year, raced to ninth place, while Rosen finished 38th.

The combined times afforded Bucknell a fifth-place team finish for the day, placing it within striking distance of the leaders for the following day's always-unpredictable slalom. West Virginia won Saturday's giant slalom, while Princeton, Virginia, and Penn State finished second, third, and fourth, respectively.

The Bucknell women were on fire again Sunday, as all three racers improved their standings from the previous afternoon. Siefert, who prefers giant slalom, rose to the occasion as she raced to second place in the more-technical slalom.

McCahill joined Siefert on the All-Region First Team after racing to a seventh-place finish in the slalom. But the berth to nationals wasn't clinched until Rosen had another flawless run. The freshman finished 22nd individually, and the women's combined times catapulted the Bison to a third-place finish for the day, behind Penn State and Princeton.

The three berths awarded to nationals were computed by taking the combined team placing of both races. Princeton took the team title with four points, after placing second in both the GS and the slalom. Penn State was second with five points (fourth and first). Bucknell finished in a technical tie with Virginia for third with eight points, but the Bison were awarded the final spot by virtue of a tie-breaker determined by individual placing. West Virginia, considered the most talented of all the women teams, had many unfortunate falls in the slalom and failed to qualify after it was victorious in the giant slalom.

"We were ecstatic when it was announced that we had made it," said Siefert. "Our team never expected to go."

The men's team, a favorite to qualify for nationals for the third consecutive season, enjoyed some early success, but the celebration was short-lived. In the GS, Chris Williamson '95, Carver Sinn '95, and Mark Ralston '94 turned out strong morning runs to tentatively place the Bison in second place. Captain Mark Abrahamsen '93, skiing as Bucknell's #2 racer for giant slalom, fell in his morning run and was out of contention for the remainder of the day. Despite the setback, the Bison were optimistic about their chances.

Then, tragedy struck. During Williamson's afternoon run, his binding pre-released, and he was automatically disqualified. With the Bison's two top guns out of the picture, for all intents and purposes the dream was over.

Of 60 competitors, Sinn, Ralston, and Scott Perricelli '94 placed 11th, 16th, and 33rd, respectively, giving Bucknell a sixth-place finish for the GS.

Sunday's slalom treated the men's team a bit better, as Williamson (4th), Sinn (13th), and Abrahamsen (17th) gave the Bison a fourth-place team finish. For his efforts, Williamson was named to the All-Region Second Team.

Qualifying for nationals for the men were Lehigh, Penn State, and Appalachian State, as the Bison could only look ahead to next year and ponder the question "what if." Considering 1992 was supposed to be a rebuilding year for the Bison, as they had returned only one "A" team racer from a year ago, a young squad gives Bucknell reason to be optimistic. With two freshmen, two sophomores, and a junior on this season's team, next year promises to be one of glory as the racers gain valuable experience on the collegiate ski circuit.

For the women's team, however, this is their moment. Working with just a skeleton crew of racers, it warrants significant notoriety.

Siefert noted, "The only negative part is that the men's team is not there with us, and we're upset that we are going solo. But nation-

TO BUCKNELL BASKETBALL FANS:

On behalf of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and Recreation and on behalf of the men's and women's basketball teams, I would like to thank you for your tremendous support of our basketball teams during this season. The number of students, faculty and staff who attended our games was amazing; all of you help to make the basketball atmosphere at Bucknell one of the very best in all of college basketball.

We continue to be aware that the conditions for watching games in Davis Gym is not what any of us really want. Every effort is being made to see that these conditions are improved within the capital improvement structure of the University. Patience and understanding of other campus priorities is important.

Again, thank you for your support. The enthusiasm and almost always first class behavior is really genuinely appreciated.

Averill to take job at Wake Forest

Lacrosse and field hockey coach named as Demon Deacons' new field hockey coach

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell athletic community suffered a double loss this week with the announcement that Jennifer Averill, head field hockey and women's lacrosse coach, accepted the job as field hockey coach at Wake Forest University.

Coach Averill, who will remain at Bucknell to coach lacrosse until the end of this season, is currently in her third year in Lewisburg. This fall she was honored as Patriot League Coach of the Year as she guided the field hockey team to a 9-9 record—the team's best mark in seven years.

Averill, a native of San Jose, CA, will become the first full-time field hockey coach at Wake Forest, as she takes over for Barbara Bradley, who led the Demon Deacons to three consecutive Deep South Association titles. Next season Wake Forest will compete in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

According to Wake's women's athletic director Dianne Dailey, "We are making a greater commitment to field hockey as a varsity sport by adding some scholarship assistance for the first time next fall." On the addition of Averill, Dailey comments, "Jennifer has an outstanding record as a player and as a coach, and we feel she will do a great job building a program that Barbara has developed so well."

Coach Averill can only hope that her players can perform as well as she did in her collegiate career. The 1987 Northwestern graduate was also a co-captain of both the field hockey and lacrosse teams. Averill set a school field hockey record with 70 career assists and was twice named to the All-America lacrosse team. She led Northwestern to the NCAA field hockey semi-finals in 1983 and 1985 and was named to the Penn Monto All-America team, as well as the Big Ten All-Conference team four times.

In 1987, Averill won the Broderick Award as the outstanding collegiate field hockey player in the nation. Other honors in Averill's trophy case include the Jesse Owens Award as the Big Ten's Athlete of the Year, the Big Ten Gold Medal of Honor for academic and athletic excellence, and Northwestern's Athlete of the Year in 1987. She was also a member of the United States Junior Field Hockey Team from 1983-85 and the U.S. National team from 1985-87.

Averill, who came to Bucknell in 1989 after serving as an assistant coach at Dartmouth for two seasons, will also serve as assistant to the women's athletic director at Wake Forest. "This will give me the chance to see the administration side of athletics," she says.

Perhaps the toughest decision Averill had to make in accepting the new position was to give up coaching lacrosse. She makes it clear that she is just as interested in the sport of lacrosse and will be looking forward to playing in some serious club leagues in the spring; however, Averill does admit that focusing on one sport makes the job appealing, not to mention that recruiting will be much easier.

Averill also makes it clear that she is not dumping her players at Bucknell. Speaking about the field hockey team, she says, "My job when I came here was to gain respect for this program. Now I believe Bucknell has earned that respect. If there were Top 20 polls for hockey, I definitely think we would have been in there. It's not that there is no challenge left here, but with Wake Forest joining the ACC, there is a new challenge there."

Looking to "expand my athletic endeavors," Averill can look forward to a bigger athletic department with better facilities at Wake Forest. "The artificial turf there offers tremendous potential. It gives us the ability to be more versatile and to be able to play any time of year," she said. In all, Averill is anticipating her future, but she will never forget her Bucknell memories.

On the men's side, co-captain Don Steenson '92 joined Hartnett in the runner-up position for the Outstanding Swimmer award. The senior captured two golds and a bronze at the meet, winning the 100 and 200 backstrokes and taking third in the 200 individual medley. Steenson's 100 (:50.14) and 200 (1:50.64) back times also shattered Bucknell school records and set new meet marks—the :50.14 was yet another Bucknell NCAA consideration time. His 200 IM time of 1:53.29 moved Steenson to second on the Bucknell top-ten list, falling short of another Harvey record.

These four high-scorers also teamed up with other Bucknell swimmers to set new school records in six different relay events. Stephanie Boles '95 and Suzanne DiLenge '94 joined the dominant Hartnett and Grunow in capturing first in both the 200 free and the 200 medley relay events. The medley time of 1:48.79 set new school and meet records, while the 200 free time (1:38.14) fell just short of breaking the school and meet records set in 1991. This same foursome took third in the 400 medley relay in a Bucknell-record time of 3:59.98.

For the 400 free relay, Hartnett, Grunow, and DiLenge welcomed Anne Marie Nielsen '94 to their ranks. Nielsen added an outstanding swim to the second-place time of 3:33.12, which established another school record.

On the men's side, Gross and Steenson teamed up with co-captain Chad Farrell '92 and Rick Steenson '95 for the 200 medley relay event. Gross, swimming the anchor freestyle leg, pulled out another incredible performance in that race. The sprinter entered the water in third place and had only two lengths of the pool in which to make up for lost time. Gross split a :19.76, the only split under a :20.00 during the entire meet, and touched the wall first in a school and meet record time of 1:33.80.

Dietz Conze '94 and Kevin Schroth '92 joined both Gross and Steenson in the winning effort of the 400 free relay. The foursome's time of 3:02.72 broke the Bucknell school record, set a new meet mark, and was an NCAA consideration time. Finally, Gross, R. Steenson, Schroth, and Conze took home the silver in the 200 free relay. Their time of 1:23.78 was also fast enough to surpass the school record set in 1991.

Distance sensation Linda Fink '95 also set new women's records in the 500, 1000, and 1650-yard freestyle events, with times of 5:08.48, 10:40.36, and 17:38.77 respectively. The freshman fared very well at her first conference meet, taking the silver medal in the 1650, fourth place in the 500, and seventh in the 200 free with a time of 1:58.18—Fink was the third-highest scorer for the Bucknell women.

The final two Bucknell school records to be broken were in the women's breastroke events. During trials on Friday morning, Boles, a member of two record-setting relays, set a new Bucknell mark in the 100 breastroke with her time of 1:09.14. In the longer 200-yard race, yet another newcomer, Jean Cadigan '95, swam to a fifth-place finish in a record-setting pace of 2:29.08.

Seeing as these three freshmen all established Bucknell records during their first year of collegiate swimming, there is no telling what they will bring to the women's team in years to come.

Members of the Bucknell men's team, including Gross, Farrell, Schroth, Conze, and both Steensons have traveled to Buffalo this weekend to finish out their season at the Eastern Championships. Although it may prove to be difficult, those attending the Eastern meet will look to improve upon their times from the Patriot League Championships and to possibly re-set a few school marks.

Baseball opens 1-3

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It seemed that Bucknell third baseman Larry Trout '93 was getting a bit bored only being able to swing the bat in practice. "If only I could get outside against live pitching, then maybe I'll be able to get it going," thought Trout. Well, last Friday in Lexington, VA, he got his wish. Trout went three-for-five with two home runs and five RBI's in the season opener against the Virginia Military Institute. The Bison collectively were able to pound out 15 hits, including five homers, against five different VMI pitchers on their way to a 14-4 rout.

Kurt Waldner '93, the ace of the staff who missed most of last season with an arm injury, was the winning pitcher. He tossed five innings, giving up just one run on four hits, striking out six while allowing no walks. Dave Koerner '92 and Dave Morris '95 also tossed two innings apiece.

Other Bison hitting stars were catcher Mark Kennedy '92, who went three-for-four with two RBI's, two doubles, and three runs scored; right fielder Steve Gyimesi '93, who had three hits, including a homer, and two RBI's; first baseman Mark Sordi '94, who had three hits and a run batted in. Koerner and shortstop Bill Rinker '92 also had roundtrippers.

Trout, who hit .304 and was named to the First Team All-Patriot League last season, was a bit surprised at the output. "You can't expect to hit too well in your first game outside after the weather has been bad," he commented. "The VMI game was just an example of the potential this team has when we play together."

The positive results of that game were erased immediately, however as the Bison dropped three straight to a tough Radford squad. On Saturday, Feb. 29, Radford took advantage of five Bucknell errors on their way to a 14-9 win. Jack Kazanjian '93 was the victim of the lack of field support, as he gave up nine runs, only one of which was earned, in four innings. The Bison also could not contain Radford on the basepaths, as they swiped seven bases in nine attempts.

Kennedy was the hitting star, going three-for-five, with a home run, a double, and four RBI's. Koerner moved into the leadoff spot and collected three hits, and Gyimesi went two-for-two, with two walks and four runs scored.

The same two teams met again on Sunday for a doubleheader. The twinbill was originally scheduled for the day before, but inclement weather pushed the double-dip back a day. As far as Bucknell was concerned, it would have been nice if it rained a little harder.

The Bison hitting attack suddenly shut down, as Radford starter Jim Abbot hurled a complete game seven-hitter. Only Trout and Rinker were able to get as many as two hits.

The Bison took advantage of two early Radford errors to take a 2-1 lead, but Radford exploded for three runs in the bottom of the fourth and one more in the fifth to pull out the 5-3 win. Denis Maguire '93 hurled a complete game for Bucknell, and were it not for the two rough middle innings, it would have been a gem.

In the second game of the afternoon, the bats dozed again. Two Radford pitchers limited the Bison to just four singles on their way to a 6-1 win.

Bucknell still had plenty of opportunities, however, as they were handed seven walks and two errors. They could not get those baserunners across the plate, though, leaving nine men on base for the game.

Rich Heller '94 started for the Bison, but he didn't last too long. After giving up five runs, four hits, and four walks in two and a third innings, manager Gene Depew opted for his bullpen. Relievers Dave Scranton '95 and Eric Myer '95 were splendid the rest of the way, allowing just one more run without giving up a base hit.

The 1-3 Bison have some work to do as they prepare for tomortow's doubleheader at Franklin and Marshall. "The Radford games are examples of how it goes when we don't play well as a team," said Trout.

Hopefully things will be straightened out by next weekend, when the home schedule begins. On Mar. 14, Villanova will be in town for a doubleheader, with C.W. Post in for a pair the next day.

"It's awesome baby!" Turn the page of your calendar if you forgot to do so last weekend. March Madness, the time of year that is utopia to basketball junkies, has arrived. For the Bucknell basketball fanatic, the Madness begins Saturday at 12:15 p.m. The Bison will take the floor at Stabler Arena on the campus of Lehigh University against Patriot League foe Army. The Bison enter the tournament as the second seed by virtue of their 11-3 record in regular season competition. That record earned a tie with Fordham atop the League's standings, but a complicated tie-breaking system resulted in Fordham getting the top seed.

Despite getting the second seed in the tournament, the Bison benefit from a favorable draw. Army has fallen to Bucknell on two previous occasions this season. The Bison have proved that they are capable of handling the physical game the Cadets will try to play. The Bison will counter by trying to force the up-tempo game in which their superior athleticism should win out. If the Bison triumph in that first contest, they will play the winner of the Holy Cross-Lafayette game in the tournament semi-finals. Holy Cross is the clear favorite in that game, but Lafayette has played much better basketball in the latter portion of the conference season. The improvements were evidenced in wins over both Fordham and Lehigh. Holy Cross crushed Lehigh last Saturday to guarantee the third seed, and they should have enough momentum to beat Lafayette.

The other half of the bracket features top-seed Fordham and the host team, Lehigh. Fordham should easily dispose of Navy in the first round, but Lehigh may not find the going as easy with Colgate. The Engineers lost their final three games of the regular season to finish with a conference record of 9-5. Despite the late-season slide, Lehigh has only lost one game on their home floor this year. They therefore must be considered a threat to win the tournament. If they can beat Colgate, they will most likely play Fordham in what would be a classic semi-final confrontation.

Bucknell finished out the season with a 78-68 win over Lafayette. A ceremony before the game honored seniors Jon Snyder, Bill Courtney, and Patrick King. None of the three would disappoint the friends and family who came to see their final game in Davis Gym. Snyder started the game, a first in his career. Courtney led the Bison in scoring with twenty-two points, and King turned in another solid performance with fifteen points and three rebounds.

The Bison controlled the game throughout. With the score tied at fourteen midway through the first half, the Bison went on a 12-0 run to blow the game open. The Bison would increase their lead to as many as twenty points in the second half. The Leopards could never get any closer than nine points as the Bison cruised to their nineteenth win of the season.

Mike Bright '93 also contributed heavily to the Bison victory. He had 16 points, including four three-pointers, in a dominant first-half performance. He finished the game with 19 points and seven boards. Paul Olkowski '93 scored 12 points and grabbed nine rebounds in a solid effort, and Russell Peyton '93 and Ray Brown '94 each added two points off the bench.

The real story of the night though, were the seniors. With under one minute left in the game, both King and Courtney left the game to a standing ovation. "It was kind of sad that it was all coming to an end," remarked King. "But it was also a nice moment because we were satisfied with our season."

The careers of King and Courtney are far from over. They will lead the Bison in this weekend's tournament. Bucknell and Fordham must be considered co-favorites to win the tournament, but Lehigh and Holy Cross are both capable of stealing the title and automatic berth in the NCAA tournament. In order for the Bison to win, they will most likely have to beat Holy Cross and either Fordham or Lehigh. To accomplish that, they will need to get balanced scoring from the five starters as well as significant contributions from the reserves. "The team that shoots the best is going to win," said King. If that is the case, the Bison will benefit from the recent play of Bright and Courtney who have both been shooting well lately. They will also need a completely healthy Chris Simpson '94 who has been nursing an ankle sprain. Olkowski will need to play strong defensively and on the boards while at the same time looking for open shots. If all else fails however, the Bison can look to the odds-on favorite to win the Patriot League Player of the Year title, King. "Mike and Bill have been playing really well lately, and I haven't gotten as many shots. But if the need arises, I'll start to look for my offense a little more," said King. The rest of the Patriot League had better beware.

Swim teams fare well at league meet

Women place second, while men finish fourth; swimmers and coach honored with year-end awards

BY ANDREA FALCIONE

The Bucknell men's and women's swim teams competed in the second annual Patriot League Conference Championship meet last weekend at the U.S. Military Academy. For the second consecutive year, the women swam to the number-two spot in the conference. The Bucknell men slid from last year's third-place finish to fourth in 1992.

Navy, relying heavily on its diving squad, dominated the women's competition with 745 total points. The Bucknell team swam tough to secure its second-place position, only outscoring Army, the 1991 conference champion, 539.5 to 530.

After opening their meet with a disappointing disqualification in the 400-yard medley relay, the Bucknell men had a tremendous obstacle to overcome. They met that challenge head-on, barely falling short of clinching the third-place spot. Fordham, the 1991 champion, captured that position by only a 14-point margin, while Army and Lafayette earned the top two honors.

At the meet, Head Coach Lynn Kachmarik was named Women's Coach of the Year by her peers. Kachmarik coached her team to an 8-2 dual meet record, the best in the Patriot League, as well as to the second-place finish in the conference for the 1991-92 season.

Both teams went on a record-setting binge over the three-day competition, together shattering 18 school records—13 women's records and 5 men's marks. Many personal-best, top-ten performances were turned in as well.

Leading the teams, as usual, were sprint-specialists Margaret Grunow '93 and Jay Gross '93. After all of the points were tallied, both juniors shared the Outstanding Swimmer awards—Grunow with Holy Cross's Jill Addesa and Gross with Lafayette's Andrew Rutherford, the 1991 Outstanding Swimmer recipient. Each of the four athletes amassed a total of 60 points at the meet.

Grunow, who is currently competing in the Olympic Trials, easily surpassed three Bucknell individual school records with her three first-place performances. The co-captain swam the 50 freestyle in :23.58, the 100 butterfly in :56.52, and the 100 free in :51.11., all of which established new meet records as well. Those outstanding swims were all fast enough to qualify as NCAA consideration times; nationally, if too few swimmers make the automatic cuts, Grunow would qualify for the NCAA Division I Championships with her times, a feat never before accomplished by a Bucknell women's swimmer. Grunow's 100 fly performance also set a new Crandall Pool record at the Army athletic facility.

Gross took top honors in the same three sprint events as did Grunow—the 50 and 100 freestyles and the 100 butterfly. His respective times of :20.50 and :44.87 in the freestyle events were meet records and NCAA consideration times, rendering Gross in the same situation as Grunow with respect to the NCAA championship meet. Although Gross is one of only three Bucknell swimmers to break the tough 21-second barrier in the 50 and is only the second to surpass the 45-second mark in the 100, his times were not quite fast enough to break school records. Head water polo coach Jim Harvey '88, who Grunow joined at the Olympic Trials this past week, still maintains a hold over those marks. Gross is closing in on him fast, however, and will look to surpass Harvey's times in the 1992-93 season. Gross's final, individual top spot was secured with a time of :49.98, a new meet record in the 100 fly and third on the Bucknell all-time list.

Kathleen Hartnett '94 also performed heroics for the women, taking two individual gold medals and a silver. Those swims earned Hartnett 57 points and the runner-up spot for the Outstanding Swimmer award. The sophomore took first-place in both the 100 and 200 backstroke events, with times of :58.38 and 2:03.61 respectively. Both times broke long-standing Bucknell school records—her 200 time shattering the old mark by a full five seconds—and became new meet records as well. Hartnett, also a freestyle specialist, grabbed her silver medal in the 50 free, behind teammate Grunow. Her outstanding time of :24.31 is the second-fastest 50 free time in Bucknell history.

BSG passes counter-Jan Plan proposal

Document stresses increased student input

BY SUZANNE W. O'NEILL
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell Student Government (BSG) passed their version of a "January Experience" proposal Mar. 8, calling for fewer on-campus requirements and creating more avenues to complete the January credit requirement.

The student document is designed to "work with the faculty and complement their proposal," according to Mike Thomas '94, BSG president.

The faculty proposal requires all first-year students to stay on campus during January for a colloquy, which would satisfy the first of a two-part requirement. Students would then complete an independent study program during one of the three remaining Januaries in their college career.

The BSG plan states that "students will be required to participate in two January Experiences during any of their four years." These two experiences can consist of any two of the following options: "Winter Study Colloquy", Independent Study, Traditional January Plans, "Devise an 'Experience'", or "the Foreign Nation Experience."

Credit for the colloquy would be on a pass/fail basis, while devising an experience would consist of formulating an experience one year and then teaching it the next.

"The BSG is suggesting sound modifactions ... from the point of the learner"
— John Dunlop dean of students

The foreign nation experience would give students the opportunity to study the cultures of different countries, hopefully stressing multicultural awareness. according to Alex Sherer '93 and Brian Mannix '94, authors of the proposal.

The BSG has often raised the question of cost when discussing the faculty proposal. According to Thomas, the main concern is how the University will be able to fund the performances, guest lecturers, etc. for the colloquy, as well as the cost of staying over January for those students on financial aid. "The [faculty] proposal is great theoretically," said Thomas, "but it's not realistic."

BSG not only wants the colloquy to be optional for first-year students, but would also like to see it open to upperclassmen, increasing diversity among those participating.

"The BSG is suggesting sound modifications because they know what students would prefer," said Dean of Students John Dunlop. "They are coming at it from the point of the learner."

Dunlop feels the emphasis of the faculty proposal is initiative and self-discipline. However, the student proposal stresses student input. While the faculty's Planning Committee has only one student member, the BSG proposal calls for appointing three student representatives in order to get a stronger student perspective.

Changes in the January Program would not be put into effect until January 1994. Since it is a curricular issue, only the faculty would address the trustees in this matter.

According to Thomas, the BSG hopes to "create a better relationship between the students and the trustees" so that in the future there will be equal weight for students in making decisions like this one.

Bison go coast-to-coast

Campus pauses for champoinship game on nation-wide TV

BY BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell was caught up in March Madness Tuesday, and most other campus activity stopped as students watched the Breakin' Bison try to win the Patriot League championship and an automatic berth to the NCAA tournament.

Many students made the road trip to Lehigh's Stabler Arena for the battle against Fordham, televised nationally on ESPN. Although the Bison fell short in their quest, the fans enjoyed Bucknell's evening in the spotlight; it was also a chance for Bison faithful to emulate their crazed counterparts at Duke's Cameron Indoor Stadium and other citadels of college hoops.

A stream of cars with Bucknell stickers headed east on Interstate 80, carrying the estimated 600 Bucknell students at the game to cheer on the Bison and grab some airtime for themselves. Signs and banners supporting the team abounded, and several more adventurous students painted themselves orange and blue.

"It's good to see Bucknell showing some school spirit and getting behind the team," said David Scott '93, one of those so adorned. While noting that Bucknell's crowd was better than many of those for other title games during ESPN's Championship Week, he added, "I hope it continues next year—this tends to be a fair-weather campus."

Just as they had all year in Davis Gym, the loyal subjects of King's Court staked themselves out behind the hoop to cheer on the Patriot League's Most Valuable Player.

"Pat's one of our [fraternity] brothers, and we wanted to cheer for him," said Mitch Benton '93, who helped to initiate the idea. "We wanted to do something special to get him some recognition and help bring the papers in," hoping King would garner Academic All-American honors, as he did.

"They created an atmosphere we haven't had here in a while," senior forward Patrick King said of his cheering section. "They were impressive–they got into it enthusiastically," he continued, "they're all my friends and I've thanked them many times."

Co-captain King said the fans were a big factor in Bucknell's tournament run. "We have the best crowd in the league," he said. "In the Army and Holy Cross games, it was great knowing we had the crowd on our side, the way they cheered when they announced our names. Against Fordam we also had a much bigger crowd [than the Rams]."

Not all students were able to make the pilgrimage to Bethlehem. Eager fans filled The Bison, following the action on the big screen in what looked like a scene from a Raleigh-Durahm bar during Duke's journey to last year's national championship. This night, though, live on ESPN there were player profiles on classmates like King rather than Christian Laetner and the Blue Devils.

Racial hate crimes plague Bloomsburg

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

An anti-racism rally is scheduled for March 26 in the wake of a series of racial incidents on the Bloomsburg campus.

According to John Walker, vice president for university advancement at Bloomsburg, the incidents began in February when two white faculty members received racist letters signed by the Ku Klux Klan.

Recently, in downtown Bloomsburg, a black female student was grabbed in the arm and threatened by a white male, said Walker.

The racist incidents culminated in a cross-burning. The two-foot cross, wrapped in rags, was found burning on the steps of Carver Hall, the administration building.

According to Joan Lientczner, director of university relations and communication, "Carver Hall is significant in that it is the one building used to identify the campus."

A reward of $8,000 is being offered for information leading to the individuals responsible for the cross-burning. Campus and town police are still investigating but have no suspects at this time, said Lientczner.

"We are concerned about all of our brothers and sisters who have been, and continue to be, the target of harassment and intimidation. Every person who values respect and justice for all persons and the dignity of the human spirit must join together in publicly rejecting anonymous and hateful acts. We must not and will not remain silent," declared Bloomsburg University President Harry Ausprich.

Over 2,000 people gathered on the steps of Carver Hall to take part in a prayer vigil held by campus ministers. "We held a candlelight vigil with prayers and singing," said Bloomsburg Junior Susan Krasnavage. "It was not only the university but also the community that was involved."

"It has been impressive how our students have come forward," said Lientczner.

"Students are pulling together to say that we do not approve of this behavior," said Jean Raspen, also a junior at Bloomsburg.

"University officials are meeting with town officials to form a community coalition against race harassment," says Lientczner. According to Ausprich, the coalition will "communicate openly and work together in doing everything possible to oppress individual rights and freedoms." Through the coalition "we can create situations that will foster better intergroup communication," said Pamela Wynn, professor of management.

Wynn says the KKK has denied any involvement in the incidents, but that does not lessen the seriousness of these happenings.

Bucknell student diagnosed with spinal meningitis

AND JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writers

A sophomore resident of Hunt Hall who contracted bacterial Meningitis is being treated at Evangelical Community Hospital. The student has been removed from the intensive care unit, and is responding well to antibiotics.

Dr. Preston Hoyle asserts that the illness is not considered a serious threat to students at Bucknell. "Most of the cases are sporadic single cases, although it can occur in small or large epidemics," he said.

Bacterial meningitis is commonly known as Spinal Meningitis, which is a "bacterial infection of the coverings of the brain and spinal cord."

The symptoms, according to Hoyle, include a sort throat, headache, pain and stiffness in the neck, and muscular aches and pains. The ailments tend to get progressively worse over a period of two to five days.

"We encourage people who have these symptoms to come in and be checked," Hoyle remarked. While he felt that the likelihood of anyone on campus contracting meningitis is minimal, he added that "it is not an illness you can overlook." He noted that the transmission of the illness is commonly limited to close family members, and is not transmitted by casual contact.

Hoyle also said that heightened awareness of the illness has prevented meningitis from becoming an epidemic in the past.

Bucknell's exposure to Meningitis has been relatively minimal in the past, with only five known cases on record.

One of these cases resulted in a fatality in 1985, when a male contracted bacterial meningitis, but failed to receive prompt treatment.

PA Senate debates campus crime bill

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Education Committee of the Pennsylvania Senate is debating the language of a bill which, if passed, would require colleges and universities to make public daily security logs, including names and addresses of persons convicted of crimes on campus.

State Senator Richard Tilghman introduced the bill on Oct. 12, 1991; it was subsequently assigned to the Education Committee for further review and should be reintroduced on the Senate floor later this month.

Tilghman introduced the bill after receiving pressure from Security on Campus, Inc., an organization founded by Connie and Howard Clery, whose daughter was murdered several years ago in her Lehigh University dormitory room.

As stated in a newsletter distributed last week by Tilghman's office, the bill "would require college and university police departments to open their police logs to the public."

According to Jennifer Zeamer, legislative assistant, the bill is designed, at least in part, to allow prospective students full access to crime statistics. At the same time, the bill would provide currrent students vital information about crimes that occur on campus.

Greg Jordan, research analyst and aid to Tilghman, said the bill will promote "more accurate reporting of all the various insundry things that go on on campus."

Jordan explained that the bill would apply to all institutes of higher education, private or public. This bill is an amendment to the College and University Security Information Act of 1988, which defines "institute of higher education." To avoid confusion over the terms, the sponsors of the amendment "piggybacked off [the 1988] law," said Jordan.

The bill would also make no distinction between campus police and campus security, Jordan said.

Agreeing with members of the Student Press Law Center, Jordan said that the Buckley amendment, which formerly held that colleges and universities who released names of student criminals could lose federal funding, should pose little interference in the passage of this bill.

The U.S. Department of Education, along with many colleges, has in the past used the 1974 Family Education Rights and Privacy Act, more commonly referred to as the Buckley amendment, to withhold campus crime reports. The statute protects against the release of academic information; it has often been extended to include campus security information.

But in a November ruling, a federal court issued an injunction against the Department of Education, claiming that the department's interpretation of the Buck-

Although separated by 150 miles, it was just like being there, as everyone seemed surprised by their own, automatic reactions to the television screen. Students were taunting Fordham players and hollering at the referees even though they couldn't really be heard at Stabler.

The Bull Run Inn also reported a larger-than-normal Tuesday crowd of enthusiastic fans for the game, according to Beverage Manager John Slother.

Other students, especially seniors, would argue that the Gateways, with their cable hook-ups, were the place to watch the game because the food was hot, the beer cold, and most importantly, both were free (for the visitors).

By and large, the small living rooms were stuffed with those students who could not get away from books for more than the two hours. Indeed, there are rumors of more than thirty people crammed Davis Gym-style in front of the TVs.

While junior center Paul Olkowski's 80-foot buzzer-beating shot ended the game on an exciting note, there soon was a mass exodus of students up the steps to Roberts Hall; Fordham was headed to The Show, ESPN cut to the Mid-Continent Conference championship, but the students were trudging to the library.

Although the Bison won't be invited to the Big Dance, Bucknell received much more than fifteen minutes of national fame in the process. While Fordham fans chanted "The Bronx is in the Show," Bucknell fans could take some solace in knowing that the 'Burg is on the map (Referencing for sports fans across the country, ESPN commentator Sean McDonough noted that Bucknell is an hour east of Penn State).

However, McDonough also said Championship Week is his favorite time of year. He called regular-season games in power conferences like the Big East "meaningless," since most of the teams advance to the NCAA tournament anyway, and said that he looks forward to covering teams like Bucknell, for whom the quest for a conference championship and an automatic bid really hold meaning.

That meaning was clearly evident Tuesday both in Lewisburg and in Bethlehem, as the student body showed a unity not seen since, well... 1989, the last time the Bison went to the NCAA tournament.

SECURITY LOG

THURSDAY, MARCH 5

A student was apprehended by public safety officers while attempting to gain entrance into Larison Hall carrying a chair. Prior to this, he was also observed trying to gain entrance with the chair in his possession through a window of Harris Hall. Student stated he found the chair in the quad. Officers confiscated the chair, which is Bucknell property, and is to be returned to Vedder Hall.

Another student from Smith Hall also reported being the victim of harassing phone calls.

Officers were dispatched to Smith Hall on the report of a suspicious person loitering around the laundry room. A description of the individual was obtained from the student, who stated that the unknown male was touching her lingerie upon her return from calling Public Safety to inform them of his presence.

An officer investigated a fire alarm in Smith Hall. A student had apparently burned a Pop-Tart in a microwave. The alarm was turned off and order was restored.

A fire extinguisher was expelled for no apparent reason at Swartz Hall, 4th floor. Extinguisher replaced.

FRIDAY, MARCH 6

Another incident of altering the word "Bucknell" at the stadium was reported to the Department of Public Safety. Unknown when incident occurred or by whom.

A bicycle which was unattended and unsecured was recovered in the farm lot. Bicycle was taken to Public Safety Office until its rightful owner can claim it.

SATURDAY, MARCH 7

A student of Larison Hall reported that unknown person(s) had just shot a BB pellet through his residence room window. Incident occurred approximately 1:08 a.m. on this date.

Student reported that unknown individuals returned a "piece" of the "Seven Generations" exhibit and that it was in its proper location.

A fire extinguisher was reported to have been discharged in the men's bathroom, 3rd Larison, and also in the women's bathroom, 2nd floor. The act was performed by unknown individual(s), and the extinguishers were replaced.

His personal books are identifiable with his name written within.

An anonymous phone call was made to the student who had his knapsack removed from the library stating he could find his knapsack in the Taylor lot. Officers did observe someone crawling through the bushes at 5:47 p.m. this date. It was the victim, and the search was apparently a hoax.

Two students approached public safety officers to notify them that they were physically assaulted by an unknown individual who had refused to serve them at one of the fraternities on this date. Investigation is continuing.

Custodian reported unknown person(s) broke a pane of glass in Harris Hall. A heating unit below the window was also damaged.

MONDAY, MARCH 9

An employee notified officers that unknown individual(s) removed his brief case from his vehicle, which was parked on Lit Road, sometime between 4:30 p.m. and 4:45 p.m. on March 6. Vehicle was unlocked at the time of entry. Briefcase contained work and personal papers.

A visitor at Davis Gym reported to officers that unknown person(s) gained entrance to his vehicle and removed money from his wallet which was placed under one of the floor mats. The wallet was then "thrown" within the vehicle after perpetrator(s) removed the cash. One window was left open approximately 10 inches, ample space for anyone to reach in and unlock the door.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11

It was reported to Public Safety that a large amount of cash had been removed from the change machine located in the game room pool area at the Langone Center. The machine is the property of the North Central Amusement Co. It is possible that the machine, when emptied previously by the company's employee, might have accidentally been left unlocked. Damage from senior class party may run to $3500

BY CATHY DARRUP

Amy Clare—The Bucknellian

Beer spilled on the floor of Larrison Dining Hall during the senior party loosened 25 percent of the floor tiles.

Damage done to the floor of Larison Dining Hall could cost the Class of '92 anywhere between $950 and $3500, according to a Physical Plant spokesperson.

The incident occurred during the senior class party held Saturday night, February 29, 1992. An excessive amount of alcohol spilled onto the floor is believed to be the cause for the damage.

Bob Martin, Physical Plant trade superintendent, said that the Plant paid $750 last week for parquet tiles to replace the part of the Dining Hall floor that had been damaged. A supplementary charge of at least $200 will be added to the bill for labor costs. Custodian wages for the evening of the party will also be an additional fee. (The bill does not include the tiles the Plant used for replacement that were already on hand from previous repairs.)

Martin estimated that approximately 25 percent of the floor had to be replaced.

Gerald Commerford, assistant dean for housing, said Monday that the Senior Class actually may not be billed for the damage. The Office of Residential Life and the Physical Plant have yet to determine if the damage was a direct result of the Senior Party on February 29, or if the damage done that night could have been induced by negligence on the part of the Physical Plant to maintain the condition of the floor. At press time, the issue had not been settled as to who will be charged for the damage.

Ken Dunkel, the Physical Plant custodian superintendent, summarized the actions taken by the Plant to repair the floor. He said that the floor became saturated with the excessive amount of alcohol that was spilled during the party. The custodian on duty mopped the floor immediately after the party, but the liquid that had already seeped into the tile caused the tile to loosen and "buckle up," making replacements imperative.

Martin noted that the cost of repairs is potentially much higher than has been quoted earlier. "The floor was actually wrecked," he said, attributing the wreckage to the loosening of tiles. The Physical Plant, however, does not intend to replace all the tiles of the floor. If they had done so, the damage could have easily cost between $3000 and $4000 to repair.

Since neither the final amount nor the recipient of the bill has been determined, the effect the incident will have on future class parties or on this year's senior class budget has yet to be determined.

Stolen sculpture pieces returned; motive behind theft still unknown

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

... abortion is not even an issue. "It is a distortion of the Iriquois way of thinking and a misinterpretation of the multivalent symobolism in the piece."

— Mary Evelyn Tucker
Associate Professor of religion

Pieces of the "Seven Generations" monument stolen March 1 from the lawn north of Kress Hall are back in the possession of the University after the Department of Public Safety received a tip from a student who found a note on her door indicating the pieces had been returned.

According to Jen Hunt '93, the Kress resident who reported the return of the pieces to Public Safety, the note was from friends across the hall who knew that she was interested in recovering the lost art.

"It was not a secret note," said Hunt. "My friends saw through their window that the statue had been returned, and they left me a note to tell me, because they knew that I had been involved in finding the missing parts."

A public safety officer patroling the campus discovered that at least two parts of the art piece were missing after a person removed the four iron rods that held the monument in the ground. The dedication plaque, which was most likely taken at the same time, is still unaccounted for.

Director of Public Safety Vince DeCerchio said that he would continue the investigation, except that there are no further leads to explore. "The items were returned anonymously, so we really don't know where to go," said DeCerchio.

DeCerchio reported the theft and return of the pieces to the Lewisburg Police Department, who consider the matter a closed case.

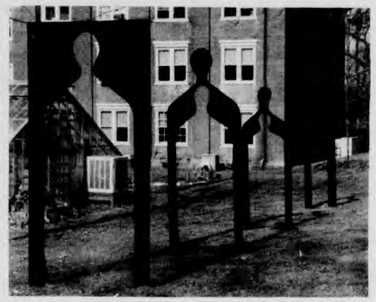
DeCerchio said that if he did uncover any evidence that would lead to a conclusion, then the person could possibly be prosecuted through the college judicial process. "The items have been returned, and in many criminal cases that is enough," said DeCerchio.

The school had planned to install the monument as a permanent fixture by anchoring the bases in concrete, but the ground was still frozen at the time of the dedication.

The statue will be put back together and cemented soon. "We're not going to remove the statue because of one or two thoughtless or intolerant people," said Larry Shinn, vice-president for academic affairs.

Shinn refers to the concern from some that the statue was taken because it takes an anti-abortion stance because the seventh generation is represented by a fetus.

Shinn feels that the artist, Frederick Franck, makes it clear in his explanation on the piece that he is not attempting to make a political statement, rather he suggests that for any decision we make today, we should consider the consequences that decision will have on the next seven generations of our species.



Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Stolen pieces of the "Seven Generations" sculputre were returned during the earlier morning hours of March 7. Authorities do not know whether the act was promted by political motives or was simply an act of vandalism.

Mary Evelyn Tucker, an associate religion professor active in getting the piece, agrees that abortion was not even an issue that Franck considered in his presentation of the "Seven Generations".

"It is a distortion of the Iriquois way of thinking and a misinterpretation of the multivalent symbolism in the piece," said Tucker.

Janice Butler, director of the women's resource center, has heard concern from some about the piece, but is not confident that abortion was the cause for the theft.

"There has been some speculation on the pro-choice side that the fetus representing the seventh generation was troublesome, but I have no idea if it was a possible motive," said Butler.

Tucker says that the misunderstanding is the result of the earlier people thinking in terms of all of the species, where we now have a very human rights centered view.

"Where the native people were talking in terms of cosmology, we're involved in human rights," said Tucker. "The double irony in this way of thinking is that in it could lie our destruction. We're obsessed with our own lives to the point where it could lead to our own extinction."

ley amendment violated the first amendment.

Although Jordan described the bill as "popular" and said he expects few to object to a bill intended to increase safety on campus, the Buckley amendment "could be used as an argument right now, I suppose."

Since the bill's introduction in October, legislators have voiced support for it, said Jordan. Colleges and universities have seemed generally receptive to it as well, he said.

Currently, the Bucknell Department of Public Safety maintains records of on-campus incidents and reports crime statistics each year in accordance with state and federal law.

But University policy prohibits the release of names with these incident reports.

Passage of this bill would not require Public Safety to significantly alter its methods of recording criminal incidents.

"We keep something similar to logs anyway so it would not drastically change the way we do anything," said Vince DeCerchio, director of Public Safety.

Although DeCerchio said that he sees no problem making public "information concerning the release of names of people who have been arrested" for criminal incidents, some distinctions would have to be made to determine exactly which incidents complied with the bill.

Senate Bill 1378:

The following is an excerpt of the campus security bill proposed by Pennsylvania Senator Richard Tilghman:

"Each institution of higher education shall make, keep and maintain a daily log, written in a form that can be easily understood, recording, in chronological order, all response to valid complaints received crimes reported, the names and addresses of persons arrested and the charges against such persons arrested. All entries in said daily logs shall, unless otherwise provided by law, be public records available without charge to the public during regular business hours and at all other reasonable times."

10,000 Maniacs to play at Amherst

The singing group 10,000 Maniacs has reached a preliminary agreement with the Entertainment Committee at Amherst University to play on April 3.

The group will be paid less than $25,000 to play at the campus. The deal was made by Assistant Dean of Students and Director of the Campus Center Jerry Johnson when he heard from an agent in the music industry that the group was going to tour and perform in club-type appearances.

As of February 26, 1992, no final contracts had been signed to definitely bring 10,000 Maniacs to Amherst. However, people involved with the deal do not anticipate any problems. Tickets will be available in mid-March but no definite date has been set.

Schlesinger says Bush is beatable

Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. lectured at Middlebury College in Vermont about the current political climate and presented his predictions for the upcoming Presidential election. Schlesinger served as Special Assistant to President John F. Kennedy and has received the Pulitzer Prize twice.

Schlesinger described a pattern in which American political consensus alternates between support for private action and for public action.

The lecturer pointed out a list of Repulican administration failures and criticized Bush's handling of certain issues. Schlesinger also commented about Democratic candidates and severely criticized Tsongas.

Schlesinger summarized his thoughts by saying, "George Bush is definitely beatable in 1992 although no candidate in either party is very obviously electable."

Rape investigated at Williams

Williamstown Police and Williams Security are still seeking suspects in the attack and rape of a female Williams student that occurred in early February.

A few suspects have been questioned, but the perpetrator has not been identified yet. As a result of the incident, rape awareness and safety measures have been a concern on campus.

Many students are looking into the possibility of a student escort service. Also, there has been an increased concern to make more phones available around the Williams campus.

A demonstration was organized to raise rape awareness. Several students wearing nylon stocking pulled over their faces walked between campus buildings.

According to the school newspaper, "The point [of the demonstration] was to convey the fear and paranoia women feel when walking alone."

Gillette protested by "dump day"

College students from more than 25 Boston area schools are holding a Gillette Dump Day on April 3 to protest the manufacturer's testing of products on laboratory animals.

Student Dump Day participants, from schools including Emerson College, Harvard, Brandeis, and Tufts, will dump thousands of Gillette products collected from students on the doorsteps of the Gillette headquarters in Boston.

According to a statement by the Gillette Company, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration requires that laboratory animal tests be conducted for new prescription drugs and over-the-counter drugs before these products can be tested on humans.

The statement also indicates that until alternatives to laboratory animal tests are validated by the scientific and regulatory communitites, Gillette will continue to use animals in evaluating the safety of its products.

Top Ten Changes "Cheers" Should Make In Order To Compete With "Beverly Hills 90210"

FROM: The NBC executives
TO: Production Staff Of "Cheers"
RE: Changes to be made

It has come to our attention that thanks to Fox's new show "Beverly Hills 90210," life for us is no longer a day at the beach. 90210 is drawing larger and larger amounts of viewers. Something must be done! If you have not seen the program, it is a teen-drama featuring trendy plots with a Politically Correct twist. Kids love the groovy characters and adults like the moral messages. We must make some changes in our own format in order to compete. Here are our suggestions.

10. Norm poses shirtless in a fab "Teen Beat" pictorial.
9. A new kickin' intro theme with the Cheer's gang partying it up on the sand with their cool buds and lots of tasty waves.
8. Awesome new On-line Rollerblades for Carla.
7. Woody's groovy brother: a handicapped, left-handed, blind, gay surfer of color named Stan joins the show.
6. More hip babes in black mini-dresses.
5. A younger balding, whacked-out, cocky, whiny ex-alcoholic who chicks really dig.
4. California Coolers on tap.
3. Sideburns for everyone.
2. Under the throngs of bogus peer pressure, Rebbeca turns to bulimia, but stops after deciding it is "like totally gross."

Leadership conference set for April

Women's Leadership Conference to examine non-traditional power structures

KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Inclusion, Empowerment and Transformation: A Challenge to Traditional Leadership" is the second annual women's leadership conference to be held at Bucknell. But if you think that you shouldn't attend the women's leadership conference because you're a man, or if you think that most of the topics discussed during the weekend will only pertain to militant feminists, think again.

The weekend conference, to be held on April 3, 4, and 5 in the Langone Center, will explore the areas of concensus leadership (a type of leadership where issues are discussed as a group, and a concensus is reached and agreed upon) as opposed to the more traditional hierarchical (president, vice-president, etc.) leadership. It will consist of workshops, games, and keynote speakers, devoted to exploring the idea that "power with others" is more effective than "power over others."

One concern that the planning committee has had, however, is that people may think that because it is presented by the Committee on Women's Leadership, it is only for women to attend. "We're trying to encourage everyone to attend; both concensus and women's leadership are based upon equality," said committee member Chrissy Toto '95. "It's totally open," affirmed planner Beth Vincent '93. "And it's an invaluable experience for college students."

"People may think that this conference is just for feminists, but it isn't really so much political as it is a way of just presenting other kinds of leadership," commented Joyce Dollinger, a member of the University Committee on Women's Leadership. The committee is responsible for the organization and planning of the leadership conference. "With concensus leadership, everyone is equal, and they are able to speak out about what they want and what they think. It gives people more of an opportunity to share their opinions and ideas." Added Dollinger, "This leadership is much harder to put into practice than the hierarchical kind. With hierarchical leadership, a lot of organizations don't give people opportunities to speak. But just because the people in charge have been elected to those positions doesn't necessarily mean that they're smarter or have better ideas than the rest of the members in an organization."

The conference was organized for the first time last year by Kari Rasmussen, then a senior at Bucknell. "She had attended a national women's leadership conference in Washington D.C., and got the idea to plan a women's leadership conference here at Bucknell," remarked her sister Mare Rasmussen '93.

Linda Hollinshead '93, who attended last year's conference, commented, "I enjoyed it. It was really well organized, and it was interesting to see a lot of women professors from other campuses come to Bucknell and participate in our program." Said Beth Vincent '93, "I was amazed by the amount of time and preparation that had gone into organizing the conference. It was done entirely by students, and was absolutely professional." "I was impressed when I saw some of the ideas presented at last year's conference implemented in different areas and groups on campus. I'm really excited about this year's conference, and especially about the speakers," added Mare Rassmussen.

There will be three keynote speakers at the April conference: Angela Bowen, a lesbian/feminist activist and writer who will discuss methods of building concensus leadership across lines of race, gender, age, class and sexual orientation; Robin Morgan, activist, writer, and the Editor-in-Chief of Ms. Magazine; and Blandina Cardenas Ramirez, a Civil Rights Commissioner and current Director of Minority Concerns at the American Council on Education. "We've tried to include a wide variety of topics, and speakers with a variety of ethnic and religious heritages," noted Vincent.

The conference is open to all Bucknell students for $15 if they have a meal plan, and $20 for those without a meal plan. The general registration fee for all off-campus students, administrators, faculty, staff and community members is $80. The late registration deadline is March 18.

Registration will begin at 1:00 p.m. on Friday, April 3, 1992 in the Langone Center. The conference will begin with a reception at 4:30 p.m. on Friday and will end at 2:30 p.m. on Sunday, April 5.

Three beers for green cheer

BY SUE O' BASALLA AND TARA MCGILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Color it green for St. Patrick's Day this Tuesday.

Green beer, the beverage of choice among Leprechauns will be making its annual appearance in our local pubs next Tuesday, March 17th.

Patrons of the Bull Run Inn will be able to purchase shamrock-hued pitchers or drafts on St. Patrick's Day. At the Towne Tavern, pub-goers will be entertained by an authentic bagpipe-player while downing their green brew. If you're too young (or too cash-poor) for the bar, never fear. You can create that St. Patrick's Day ambience at home by following the secret recipe: add food coloring.

Kelly-colored suds were once available by the keg; distributors injected dye into the kegs they supplied to bars. But, according to John Slother, beverage manager of the Bull Run Inn, fear of liability suits over contaminated beer has ended the practice. Keeping the Irish spirit alive, bars now simply add their own green coloring to each pitcher and draft.

For those who prefer their beverage uncolored, the Beer Barn offers special green-labeled Miller Light and Miller Genuine Draft by the case.

Of course, no one in Ireland really drinks green beer. But at least the Americanized version of Irish bifters goes down a bit easier than the motor-oil-colored Guinness Stout they actually drink there.

Sexual-health care provided for women and men

Have questions? Need answers? Don't be embarassed, upset, or nervous—you won't be the first to have a skyrocketing blood pressure

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

There is no need to worry that everyone will wonder if you have contracted the latest venereal disease to hit campus, or are opting to go on the "Pill," if you make a visit to Roz. No nurse enters into the crowded waiting room of the Student Medical Center and hollers, "Next for the Gyno-Nurse." No one asks you to fill out your sexual history while sitting next to the hot guy waiting for a prescription of amoxycillin. Instead, female and male patients enter to see Roz through a side door and are assured confidentiality and answers to their questions—whatever they might be.

Rozalyn Yannaccone, or just plain Roz, as she prefers to be called, is the nurse practitioner for Gynecological Services. This means that she has the certifications of a registered nurse plus extra training in the field of gynecology. This also means that she doesn't shudder when someone suggests that he might have warts in the wrong place. And it also means that there are no dissertations about pre-marital sex if you stop by for a pregnancy test or a prescription for birth control pills.

WHAT HAPPENS AT A BASIC EXAM

Roz's gentle manner and straightforward answers should put anyone at ease. If you don't know what to ask her, she, with her 14 years of experience on this campus, knows what to ask you. And if you're still at a loss for words, you can just point at the appropriate chart. They line the wall behind Roz's desk and are more explicit and interesting than any biology or sex-ed book.

Roz understands that visiting the gynecologist is a big step for many students. She says, "Most women are afraid of their first pelvic exam. Blood pressures are usually sky high." Yet Roz feels that these exams are important and that college is a "time to begin taking responsibility for one's own healthcare." For this reason she tries to make the visit as pleasant as possible. Most of the visit is spent talking. After answering any concerns or curiosities that you might have, she explains what will happen during the actual exam. She clues you in on why a Pap smear is needed and what it will feel like. Basically she talks you through all the uncomfortable parts of the exam, explaining what exactly she is doing. A routine "yearly" physical exam lasts about half an hour. A contraceptive appointment takes about an hour, as more needs to be discussed.

SEXUALLY TRANSMITTED DISEASES AND THE SEXUAL PYRAMID

What are the most prevalent sexually transmitted diseases (STD's) on campus? According to Roz, they are chlamydia and venereal warts. Bucknellians do "catch" such things and, left untreated,the diseases can be very harmful. 60 to 80 percent of women and ten percent of men do not even realize that they have chlamydia. This is why yearly gyno exams are so important. The test for chlamydia costs $9 through Roz. When this common disease is discovered early, it can be treated, thus preventing infertility.

Herpes, like chlamydia, was something that Roz rarely saw when she first came to Bucknell in 1978. She attributes the rise in diseases to "more people having more sexual partners in their lifetime." While most women that Roz examines have generally had no more than three sexual partners, they have been exposed, in actuality, to many more. Because of the "sexual pyramid," one is not only exposed to a current partner, but also everyone else that person has had sex with.

Vaginal infections are another common occurrence at college. Because many students stay up late, either studying or partying, resistance is lower than normal. Community living and bad nutrition also help aid in the infection of such diseases. Because of sexual contact, both women and men can become infected. Prescriptions for both partners are available from Roz.

And while no one at Bucknell tested positive for AIDS at last spring's screening, it doesn't mean that no one is positive right now. Roadtrips, visitors, summer vacation, semesters abroad, and January term all could have introduced new carriers to the Bucknell sexual pyramid. If you think that you might have had any risky partners, ever, or just want to make sure, a free, confidential testing will take place again this spring on Mar. 16, 17, and 18 at the Student Medical Center.

BIRTH CONTROL

Charge your "safer sex" kit on your phone bill for $5 and you will receive 12 condoms and contraceptive jelly. Otherwise you may book a two-part appointment with Roz to discuss your birth control options. One visit is for discussion, the other for decision-making. Roz likes her patients to look over some reading material about their birth control options and have time to ask for their partner's opinion.

While the Student Medical Center does not currently offer birth control at a discount, Roz feels that the University is changing and moving in that direction. (Ten-percent discounts are offered at the Lewisburg Apothecary and Weis Markets though.) Reduced or even free birth control is a controversial topic, but then again, says Roz, "My position itself was very controversial when first decided." Before Roz arrived, there were no female physicians on the staff. Many female professors and students felt that there were many issues that were difficult to discuss with a male.

Amy Clare—The Bucknellian
Meet Roz. Ask this gyno-nurse anything and she'll give you a straight, honest answer.

PREGNANCY

One of those difficult issues to discuss might have been pregnancy. Roz conducts pregnancy tests for $6. While she acknowledges that drugstore pregnancy tests (about $10) are now very accurate, she recommends coming into the office for testing. This school year she has performed about 25 pregnancy tests. The majority of the time they are negative and have to do with problems with birth control pills. She feels that it is important to come in though, because it "relieves people's minds." No need to stress about being pregnant when you might not be!

If you're not relieved by the results, Roz can counsel you on your pregnancy options. She says, "It's very important to talk about all the options." Each month she receives dozen of pictures through the mail of couples that wish to adopt. If a woman wants to know more about adoption Roz will refer her to the Birthright in this area, or the Susquehanna Valley Crisis Pregnancy Center in Lewisburg. Both of these organizations are Pro-life and will help you with the adoption process or in raising the baby on your own.

For those patients who choose to seek an abortion, Roz feels that "clinics are the best choice." While some area hospitals perform abortions, most, including Evangelical in Lewisburg, do not. The closest clinics are in Harrisburg. Roz usually refers her patients to Harrisburg Reproductive Health Services and Hillcrest Clinic and Counseling Services. Both perform abortions in the first-trimester. Harrisburg Reproductive also does in the second-trimester. A first trimester abortion costs about $250 and by Pennsylvania law can be performed on anyone over the age of 18.

MEN VISIT ROZ, TOO

Men can also be infected with sexually transmitted diseases, have concerns about birth control, and experience emotional problems concerning sex.

While most men usually come to Roz's office with a sexual partner to decide upon a method of birth control, many actually come to express concerns about a partner from another school.

Many other men just telephone with their questions. They should not feel uncomfortable scheduling an appointment though, as Roz examined many men for STD's while working at a family planning clinic before coming to Bucknell.

TO MAKE AN APPOINTMENT

Call Roz at 523-1332 to schedule your appointment. If you are experiencing a problem, she can usually see you that day or the next one. Regular yearly exams require about a week's wait. Roz is in her office, on the left side of the Ziegler Health Center, every Tuesday, Wednesday, and Friday from 8:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

How to get great sex

BY BUD J. FRYE

Men are tough but sensitive, they know what they want and they always get it. The more sexual conquests a man successfully completes, the bigger a stud he becomes. Women are soft, indecisive, and if they regard sex in the way men do, they are all sluts. If you believe this, I've got a bridge to sell you. Women have been oppressed in more ways than men can ever imagine. They've had to adapt themselves to suit a male-dominated world, but there comes a time when someone has to draw the line. The women of this campus have been forced to accept the inconsiderate treatment of the Bucknell men for far too long. This inconsiderate treatment of course refers to sex.

That's right, SEX, the final frontier. It is a battle that has been waged between men and women since the dawn of time. In the old days all it took was a club and a good swing and you were set. But today's woman is different. Today's woman is smart. It takes more than a whack across the head to get her now. In this modern age of technology, the handy club is obsolete. Today's man has to be smarter, quicker, more upwardly mobile, and he has to use stealth. Today's man needs a RAP.

The idea of the perfect rap has evolved over the centuries to the point that there are now different types of rap: the long-term rap, the short-term rap, the "lets go back to my room and talk" rap, the "Hi, my parents are rich" rap (How does that work?!?), the "we can still be friends" rap, the "I'm just a struggling college student and I just want to find myself" rap, and of course, the forever popular "Hi, I'm really drunk, do I know you?" rap. These are the chemical weapons of the battle, and they are systematically doing away with good sex as we know it.

Romance is a thing of the past. Forget about the candlelight, the soft music, and the bottle of wine for two. Today romance means a lot of beers, a strobe light, and whatever music it happens to be fun to "go at it" to. Here at Bucknell, even the concept of a date has been driven to extinction, and ladies, the best part about it is that it is all because of men. As time passed the women of the world evolved positively, and the men somehow regressed back to the stick. Instead of just hitting women over the head, we tested ourselves to see just how little effort we could get away with.

But there is a solution. There is one way that romance can make a comeback, and that is a complete and total role reversal. Ladies, take control of the situation and be the men that we can't be. Instead of letting men lay the rap, the women of this campus should take the bull by the horns, be aggressive, and go for it. You've been treated like pieces of meat long enough. From now on if you want something (or someone), go for it (or him) like a pit-bull with a purpose. Be forceful, be bold, but be sure to get what you want and don't take any crap. Lay down the law and teach men a thing or two about how it should be done. It's time for the men to sit down and let the women take over. Forget about your egos guys, it's for an outstanding cause — good sex.

Majority of students have, enjoy sex

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Most Bucknellians seem to feel comfortable talking openly about their sexuality. Only two out of 60 students that were questioned opted not to answer. Most seemed more than happy to have someone new to divulge the information to.

What did they have to tell? Twenty-four percent wanted us to know that they are virgins. One freshman female said, "I'm waiting for the right guy." To others it did not matter if it was the right person or not. They just wanted sex. One of the 42 students who had engaged in sex before said, "At that age (16) I was ready to burst." Others who were sexually experienced had better control of their hormones and said they had sex because "the person loved me, respected me, and was caring."

Not all first time experiences were so wonderful though. Looking back upon their first time now, 36% are not glad that they lost their virginity to who they did. One senior male said,"It probably wasn't the right person." Another senior remembered, "I was drunk, didn't know the person." Yet another senior said, "Sex is very different for me now."

To others the first time is fondly remembered. One sophomore female felt it was good because, "We waited long enough." She and her boyfriend of three years are still together. Another freshman female feels fine about it because "it was a planned decision." Another senior said, "It was the right person, although I was too young."

How young is too young to have sex? Most Bucknellians lost their virginity at age 16. The next most common ages were 17 and 18. Fifty-nine percent were not virgins when they arrived on campus.

College changed many students' perspectives on sex. When asked how long you should know someone before sleeping with that person, one female sophomore responded, "At college it would be a few months, at home...longer." A senior male recognized that it could depend upon what kind of relationship you wanted it to be. He said, "Depends on whether you want it to be long-term or not. If you do want long-term, then you wouldn't do it at first." Another senior, a female, said, "You can't set a number of days. Sometimes it's never right if the relaitonship is wrong; sometimes it's a great relationship and sex feels right in the first few days." One sophomore male recognized, "There are always one-night stands."

Do students really have sex on the first "date?" Yes, and 24% of those surveyed have. Another 70% though have only had sex in a long-term, monogamous relationship.

Whether they've only had sex with hook-ups or steady partners, almost all respondents (73%) have had unprotected sex before. It's not that they don't worry about pregnancy or AIDS, howe er. The majority (82%) and (89%) do. Blame it on condoms, as one junior female said, "Condoms are so unenjoyable —and messy." Or as one junior male said, "I just wasn't expecting it to happen that night. I was unprepared, but I just couldn't resist."

When birth control is practiced, most Bucknellians do use a condom (55%). The other half claims to practice the Pill.

Whatever the method, whatever the context of the relationship, it is taking place, and "quite frequently" as one male freshman boasted.

Voices from the closet

Five gay men tell what it's like to be the same, but different, at Bucknell.

The Bucknellian asked a member of the Bucknell Gay Men's Support Group to lead a question session about being gay at Bucknell.

The Bucknellian: What is it like to be gay at a conservative school like Bucknell?

Sam: You can check out anybody you want to without anybody knowing.

Ed: No seriously, it's like being a paradox. You feel all alone yet surrounded all the time.

J.C.: For me it has been very positive. All my friends have been supportive and open. Even guys I know who belong to groups like sports teams and fraternities have been cool. I take both positive and negative feedback since this is a new experience for a lot of people.

Bill: Word. I hate those Bible-thumpers who feel they have a right to quote me into the grave.

Ed: Lots of people have stereotypes. Yet it saddens me to know that few people are willing to challenge their ideas.

Chris: For me, I guess I feel that it sucks sometimes, that I feel limited socially. But I've found it's also kind of special. Being different isn't always bad.

The Bucknellian: What has been your most difficult time at Bucknell?

Sam: Being around the locker room at the fieldhouse.

Chris: Sam, come on. For me the most difficult thing was the first time I came out. Saying the "G"-word and not knowing what to expect was scary.

Sam: Okay. I'll be serious. The most difficult thing is always hiding books and papers under my bed when someone knocks at the door. Or having to censor every conversation on the phone. It feels like I'm living a spy movie or something.

Bill: Once I was using the Macs in Dana Engineering when some guy started to ask questions: "Are you a faggot?" Only after I asked him if he wanted to go outside so that I could kick his ass in did he stop. I guess a lot of people think you can push men like us around.

J.C.: I live in fear of being assaulted.

Ed: For me the most difficult thing was to accept myself for who I am.

Mike: I'm tired of hiding my wonderful relationship with my boyfriend. We've dated for two and a half years. I also hate the bookstore. I'd be happy to find a birthday card for my boyfriend that doesn't have to have a man and woman on the front.

The Bucknellian: How does Bucknell change your options?

J.C.: I feel as if I don't do anything anymore. I hate most parties. I hate to watch women get used.

Chris: Well, my original ideas about marriage and family are out. Although I can't relate to my friends. I also am not sure about what to expect.

Ed: Me too. I got derailed on the marriage track.

Sam: I still have problems trusting people. Being labeled is a difficult thing. Not being able to read people. Putting some friends in awkward positions because they know and others don't.

Bill: I wake up angry every morning and I don't know why.

Mike: I'm tired of sneaking around. Imagine all the wonderful things you have with your girlfriend and not being able to tell your roommate.

The Bucknellian: What is your worst fear at Bucknell?

Sam: Being alone.

Ed: Losing my best friend. If he found out that I was gay he'd hate me.

J.C.: Being assaulted again. I was a victim of assault as a sophomore and I would never want to live through that again. I'd rather die.

Chris: Knowing that on campus that there is a gay student like me living in fear and self hate. When I know that I could help.

Mike: Graduating and going into the working world. Straights don't have to fear of being fired or getting health insurance or finding housing. But if you're gay that's the reality.

Bill: Telling my parents and family. Being rejected by them and not being able to come back to school.

The Bucknellian: What are your hopes for B.U. or yourself?

Chris: To learn to accept heterosexuals.

Bill: To learn to accept myself.

J.C.: That the 10% can find a place to be comfortable. This group represents all of Bucknell—different races, religions, Greeks, non-Greeks, athletes and engineers. Can Bucknell be more open to us? I hope so.

Mike: To settle down with my boyfriend, get a house and adopt a couple of kids.

Sam: Just to be happy.

Ed: For me, I'd like the legal system to change and give gay Americans basic civil liberties that everyone who is straight takes for granted.

Editor's note: The participants names are not their real ones.

What the Health is Going On?

Methods of birth control and their effectiveness

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI

"Let's talk about sex, baby, let's talk about you and me..."

Although the market includes numerous methods of birth control for both men and women, there is no denying that birth control products are geared mostly towards women. This is most easily explained by the fact that it is the woman who becomes pregnant, and it is therefore understandable that she would want to be the one to protect herself.

To get the men's methods out of the way, there are the condom and sterilization. The condom comes in many different colors and sizes. They are available in your local laundry room or in your local Bison. Regular stores sell them too. Sterilization is another option for men. This involves the cutting, sealing, or tying of the tubes that carry the sperm in males. Of course, you want to be pretty sure that this is what you want before having this procedure performed, because once it's done there's no going back.

There are also other "more natural" methods, where no actual products are used. The first is abstinence, or refraining from sexual activity. Additionally, there's the withdrawal method, when the man withdraws before he ejaculates. Equally effective is the rhythm method, refraining from sexual activity during a woman's fertile period.

However, women prefer a more foolproof method of birth control, and for this reason they use artificial products. Such products include the pill, diaphragms, sponges, vaginal spermicides, cervical caps, and the recently approved contraceptive implants. Each product should be considered carefully, as not all of these are effective or safe for all women. Basically, ladies, one size does not fit all! Factors such as age, frequency of sexual activity, convenience, personal beliefs and those of your partner must all be taken into account. And of course your doctor will tell you which methods are best for you.

If you choose to be sexually active, then you need to choose one of these to use. The safer sex kit, which includes 12 condoms and jelly can be purchased at the Health Center for $5.

The most convenient and commonly used method is the birth control pill. Prescribed by a doctor, it has many advantages as well as disadvantages. Among the more positive aspects is effectiveness; according to Wyeth-Ayerst Laboratories, "If the pill is used correctly, less then one woman out of 100 using it will become pregnant during one year of continuous use." This is, of course, a theoretical value, and the actual use effectiveness is 90 to 96 percent. Other advantages include a more regular menstrual cycle, fewer ovarian cysts, less breast disease, less painful menstruation (yes!), and fewer breast tumors. However, the disadvantages range from mild symptoms such as nausea, vomiting, missed periods, weight gain or loss, and headaches to more serious side effects such as blood clots, liver tumors, and high blood pressure. For this reason, the pill should be taken with caution and its use should be monitored regularly.

Other less regulated contraceptives include the diaphragm, the cervical cap, the sponge, and suppositories, all of which constitute a barrier method. Wyeth-Ayerst Labs agree that "barrier methods prevent pregnancy by placing a physical or chemical 'wall' between the sperm and the cervix." The diaphragm and the cervical cap (smaller than the diaphragm) are made of soft rubber and are shaped like a cup to cover the cervix and prevent sperm from entering the uterus. They are available only through a doctor, as they are individually tailored. Once again, one size does not fit all. And just like anything else, if you gain or lose weight, you have to be refitted. Both have a use effectiveness of 83 percent. When used with a condom, they are nearly 100 percent effective.

The sponge is made of a foam-like material and is used in conjunction with a spermicide. It should be left in place for at least six hours after intercourse, and has a use-effectiveness rate of 75 to 92 percent. 75 percent -"Things that make you go hmmm..."

Suppositories are inserted 10 to 15 minutes before intercourse and should be allowed to melt before sexual activity is resumed. Although not extremely effective, they are more convenient (i.e., "neater") than other methods.

And now...Deep Thoughts: "I used to think that douching after intercourse was an effective form of birth control. But then I decided I was only helping them out." Douching is, in fact, not an effective form of birth control, although it may be used at other times to cleanse your body. Another common myth is that having sex in water is another form of birth control. Again, this is not the case.

According to Mademoiselle magazine, "safe sex is an oxymoron," so we at least hope you practice smart sex.

What to do when your roommate brings the hook-up home

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It's Saturday night and for the ninth consecutive night you find yourself sitting outside your room waiting for the mystery person rolling around on the floor with your roommate to leave. By the time you're finished counting all the cracks in the ceiling, you decide to take a stand and demand that your room be turned into a legal brothel so you can start charging an hourly rate.

Well, ok, maybe not, but there are several other prime options that are sure to give your roommate the oh-so-subtle hint that the nightly or weekend hook-up sessions are not so acceptable. While some students may opt for the chicken route, by feigning sleeping, sleeping with earplugs or quickly backing out of the temporary love shack to avoid a potentially embarrassing situation, most find this option a bit inconvenient. Waiting for a break in the make-out session can be tiresome and finding a temporary resting place for your weary body might be impossible.

Rather than allowing your roommate to continue this deplorable behavior, it's time to take a stand. It's time to let your roommate get caught with his/her pants down, so to speak.

An excellent way to end a hook-up in progress and give your roommate an obvious hint is to play the I'm-a-dumb-roommate routine. Burst into the room as though nothing were going on and say, "Oh, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to interrupt. You mean you're still practicing CPR? Wow, this is the ninth night in a row, and with a different instructor and everything!? Gee, you must really need help." Though not an effective roommate bonding exercise, this method is sure to get even the vaguest hint across.

Another viable solution is to put on the too-drunk-to-care act. Walk into the room staggering noticeably, drooling heavily and shouting, "Oh, dahn't mand moi. I's jus gonna get in ma jammies and go beddie-bye. Don worry a bit." With just the right amount of slurred words and drunken stumbles, this Oscar-winning act will certainly lead to a full night's sleep.

And last, but not least, the most risky and daring method of them all, though absolutely worthwhile and educational, is the Hey-nice-technique routine. Open the door to your room just a smidgeon, just enough to see the action, and when the moment is right, yell, "Hey! Nice moves! I say wild boars do that once on Wild Kingdom. I oughta try that one of these days." Despite being completely tasteless and disgusting, this option is not only enlightening, but also extremely entertaining.

EDITORIAL

'Ray for the scholar-athlete

While the Breakin' Bison could not capture the Patriot League Championship Tuesday night, they are much luckier than most of Bucknell's athletes, who toil in relative obscurity, never feeling the glow of the camera lights or the support of the crowd.

Most students, faculty, and staff have attended a basketball game this year, but how many of us have attended a cross country meet, crew regatta, or women's tennis match at Bucknell? Very few. Although these athletes rarely perform for more than their families and close friends, they have worked just as hard, and have achieved equal success. The members of the Breakin' Bison squad are but a small number of the dedicated varsity and club players, coaches, and managers. Their quest is not for glory, but for success; through hard work, most reach that plateau.

Last year Bucknell was the Men's All-Sports Champion in the Patriot League's first season and also won the Presidents' Cup for overall excellence in all sports; in the East Coast Conference Bucknell won the Commissioner's Cup, the men's all-sports championship, each of the ten years it was awarded.

It is important to remember that all of this success comes without the aid of athletic scholarships. While students do receive need-based financial aid, coaches are at a disadvantage during recruiting, as the Patriot League and the Ivy League are the only non-scholarship conferences in the NCAA's Division I. In this year's men's basketball tournament, two of the three schools Bucknell played, Holy Cross and Fordham, still have scholarship players from their pre-Patriot League Days. In last fall's NCAA Cross Country Championships, Bucknell and Dartmouth were the only non-scholarship teams among the 22 teams invited, and the Bison finished thirteenth.

The Patriot League is dedicated to the ideal of the scholar-athlete, and the belief that sports should be one part of a well-rounded learning experience. Nowhere is this ideal of excellence in both areas embodied better than at Bucknell.

Of the 26 varsity teams at Bucknell, 17 had team grade-point averages at or above the all-University average of 3.0, and several teams were well above that level. Even more impressive, in exit surveys conducted by the Athletic Department, nearly all graduating athletes said they did better academically during their season.

Over the past 11 years Bucknell has had 65 athletes receive regional or national academic honors, more than nearly every other school in Division I. Patrick King recently became Bucknell's eighth basketball Academic All-American in the last seven years.

In each of the last three years Bucknell has had an athlete take top national honors. In 1989, basketball player Jen Walz was named the top female scholar-athlete in the nation in her sport. (Her number hangs in Davis Gym, and she is building a successful career at General Electric) In 1990 Joe Markulike was selected as the top baseball Academic All-American. (He played a year in the minor leagues and also works for GE) Last year, runner Kelly Marsh received a substantial graduate scholarship from the National Association of College Directors of Athletics, and earned another $10,000 award to Bucknell in recognition of her achievements. (She is attending Harvard Law School after graduating with a 4.0 average) And senior runner Matt Deardorf is under consideration for several major awards this year.

The NCAA has recognized this commitment by giving a well-deserved automatic berth in men's basketball to the Patriot League. The National Invitational Tournament could also send a message by giving the Breakin' Bison a bid.

There is great turmoil in college athletics, with questions about low graduation rates, pliable academic standards, payoff to players, and other recruiting violations. Accompanying calls for reform is much rhetoric, usually hollow, about student-athletes. These would-be reformers say classes come first, and sports is a training ground for excellence in later endeavors. In other words, Bucknell is everything they say college athletics should be, and the NCAA should be showcasing Bucknell and the Patriot League.

Goldstein vs. Maloney: the saga continues

TO THE EDITOR:

In response to Evan Coyne Maloney's clarification of his past opinions, I must say before continuing that I write with much trepidation. I am not the person he would lead you to believe I am. Though it is quite flattering, I do not think I control the campus, nor do I believe I am facist. What I would like to say is simply that I attacked the language of his text. Indeed, it is here that the problem still lies, for I am not at all dissimilar to him in that I believe in the party line of the A.C.L.U. and Voltaire. Where, in fact, I am still offended lies in his comparison of the "PC" to the Nazis. If you allow me to "deconstruct" his text I will show where in fact my problem still lies.

First and foremost, Nazis have always been associated with the right wing. Mr. Maloney could just have easily have chosen the Cold War Soviet Union or some other repressive left wing government, yet he specifically chooses Nazis. But even if Evan used Stalinists as an example, the comparison could not stand. Unlike Nazis, the "PC" are not an organized "governmental" group, or for that matter any kind of organized group like the S. S. We do not wear hats or shirts imprinted with "PC", nor do we make those who we find racist, sexist, or anti-Semitic wear arm bands stating their prejudices. True, some administrators on college campuses have kicked students out who have fostered hate propaganda, but to say they are in complete control of this country, or part of some organized group like the S.S., is fallacious.

Those who consider themselves politically correct act on their own fruitions—there is not a "PC" party line, or a "PC" militia. It is further fallacious to imply that all who consider themselves "PC" will rip down signs, censor books, or scream down speakers, just as it is fallacious to believe that every Republican is not PC, yet it is true that everyone who considers himself or herself a Nazi is willing to kill for the Nazi Aryan vision. We are individuals; treat us as such.

I commend Evan's wish to question anything that attempts to change his thinking, or for that matter limit free speech, but I wonder if he questions what made him think in such a way in the first place? Does he question his parents's way of thinking, or even Jesse Helm's thinking?

Inherent in comparison is similarity (The American Heritage Dictionary). Apart from Evan's superficial comparisons, there is very little similar in their respective paradigms. By linking these two groups, Maloney is on the one hand denigrating the "rainbow" image of the "PC", and on the other hand unintentionally mollifying the image of Nazis. True, individuals who consider themselves "PC" but limit free speech ironically may be contradicting the bulwark they stand upon. But isn't their vision wholly different from that of fascists? Is it so wrong to wish that every person in this country should be treated with the respect each may want, as long as one does not infringe upon their right to free speech? As a man who is of Jewish descent I take offence at Maloney's comparison for its unintentional mollification of the Nazi image. Though I know his intention was to show that some tactics of the "PC" may be Nazi-like, I just cannot buy that Hitler is in any way similar to myself. My point here is that Evan could have written his article from a more academic and more responsible viewpoint, instead of going "right" for our throats. But this may be the point I am missing. Perhaps the article is a vindication of his right to free speech, the true satire, and if so I am the one who is wrong.

I do not wish to take away Evan's right to say what he feels. What I do wish to say is that I believe there is a responsibility that should go along with your right to free speech. I commend Evan's wish to question anything that attempts to change his thinking, or for that matter limit free speech, but I wonder if he questions what made him think in such a way in the first place? Does he question his parents' way of thinking, or even Jesse Helms' thinking? Certainly it is his right to launch a heterosexual rights day, be nasty to R.A.'s in Swartz, fallaciously pigeonhole liberals on campus, and be disrespectful to professors like Teresa Amott. But does it take that much energy in changing mankind to humankind that it will result in loss of freedom? I invite Evan to explain his views on the world, give solutions to solve racism, or even explain why he is so penchant on "infiltrating" and uncovering the supposedly inherent contradictions in being liberal on a campus that is predominantly un-"PC"?

Student wants to present opposing side of abortion

TO THE EDITOR:

While I do appreciate the thoughtful article on a volatile topic in Greg May's dicussion in "Coffee with Alice" entitled "So you think abortion is murder," I would like to respond to his argument. I agree that there needs to be calm discussion on both sides in this issue. However, in order for their to be discussion, both sides need to be heard and I would like to clarify some of the incorrect points in May's article.

In the first sentence, May states that "the pro-Life movement at Bucknell has been able to present their view with little debate: abortion is an act of murder and should be condemned." There are a number of things I would like to discuss. There had been a noticeable lack of discussion on both sides of the issue, prior to Dr. John Willke's visit to campus and lecture on February 18, 1992. On behalf of Bucknellians for Human Life, the statement that we found the most offensive was that 'our view' is "abortion is murder and therefore should be condemned." Mr. May points out that semantics play a big role in the debate and this is where we would like to point out the importance of the use of the word 'murder.'

While abortion is killing a human being it is not unlawful, therefore, it is not murder. While we do condemn abortion (although never the woman) as a violent act of killing another human...

Bucknellians for Human Life makes it a point not to use the term 'murder' for a few reasons. First of all, Webster's defines murder as "to kill a human being unlawfully with premeditated malice." While abortion is killing a human being it is not unlawful, therefore, it is not murder. While we do condemn abortion (although never the woman) as a violent act of killing another human, we would not call it murder.

On the "viability" issue, May stated that "Before this point (viability) a fetus could hardly be considered an individual since it has never been capable of sustaining its own life, and cannot hold any rights whatsoever." I would like to point out that a newborn, or for that matter, a three-year-old child, is not capable of sustaining his or her own life either; yet we would call them 'viable.' I would also like to update the medical information that May supplies. There are presently cases of children survivng after being born at as early an age as twenty weeks. The number of weeks that a child can survive is constantly decreasing with the growth of scientific technology. "Viability is a measure of the sophistication of the life support systems around the baby; it does not measure the humanness or aliveness of the baby himself or herself," as Dr. and Mrs. John C. Willke state in their book Abortion: Questions and Answers.

I must add that later in May's article he says that "The pro-life movement needs to accept that the issue is not as clear-cut as outright murder and that a woman has rights of her own." I won't rehash the murder issue, but I believe both sides would agree that this is by no means a clear-cut issue, and it never will be. We do agree that a woman has rights of her own, we just believe that all women (even unborn women) have rights.

The Women's Resource Plantation

In the best-seller Backlash (552 pages, Crown, 1992), Wall Street Journal reporter Susan Faludi chronicles a decade of resistance to the women's movement. She argues that a conspiracy has turned "feminism" into a dirty word and has portrayed feminists as whiny, shrill and man-hating. A nebulous conspiracy, she says, persuades women to reject the feminist label and to shun the feminist cause.

But according to Karen Lehrman, reporter for the New Republic, "There is another and contradictory explanation for women's rejection of the label: women believe that they are strong, independent, and can do it all on their own. Or at any rate they believe that the kind of help offered by the organized women's movement is at best beside the point. To some degree this skepticism is a measure of the feminist movement's success. Yet underlying it is a deep discomfort with the orthodoxy of the movement, with a mentality that conceives of only one kind of feminist... Ironically the orthodox feminist doctrine has promoted an adversarial stance that has all too often burdened women with precisely the status they have been struggling to escape: the status of victim."

The feminist leaders are the whip-cracking slave masters of the female plantation. If insubordinate women think for themselves-or stray too far from the plantation- who will the "leaders" lead?

The feminist leaders are the whip-cracking slave masters of the female plantation. If insubordinate women think for themselves—or stray too far from the plantation—who will the "leaders" lead? Hence there is the feminist aversion to certain women who choose to be housewives or choose to enter beauty pageants. According to the feminist leadership, women have always been "put in their place." Ironically, today that place is trudging along in lockstep with the orthodoxy defined by liberal thought-police. This conflicts with freedom of choice, and it has been destructive not only to women as individuals, but to the true cause of equality.

Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Plantation, wants to inflict her orthodoxy on her sisterhood. This will insure their victim status, but only as victims of her vitriolic mind control.

The last thing women need are leaders who preach that women cannot advance or be happy without a national apparatus preaching revolution through entitlement. This entitlement mentality reinforces the self-concept of victim, it fosters condescension in men, and leads both to discount women's achievements.

The Women's Resource Plantation, and its spawn—the Women's Studies major, are patently political exercises in the "parochialism of knowledge." Apparently all women scholars have had "experiences" that give them unique "perspectives" that men are not qualified to question. In fact, because of this experience, only women ought to teach these courses. (Who then should teach Shakespeare?) Thus gender becomes an intellectual asset. Elaine Showalter, chairwoman of English at Princeton, is calling for a "transformation of the curriculum" to include "gender as a fundamental category of literary analysis." This is the opening trumpet of the feminist war against literature. But a parochial claim perverts the ideal of a cosmopolitan intellectual community in which intellectual merit is something one must achieve.

Most women don't consider themselves feminists (the polls support this). Many young women assert themselves as individuals and resent anyone claiming to speak for them. They know something that has

What is America's real problem with the Japanese?

BY ROBERT GAZZOLA

In the past couple of weeks at Bucknell, in the local area, and in the rest of the country, we've seen the rise of the new trend of "Japan bashing." "The Japanese are the cause of our economic problems" and "they are throwing millions of Americans out of work." Boy, it certainly is easy to blame all of our problems on them isn't it? And it's also nice to have someone to direct all of our frustration towards. Heaven forbid that maybe some of the problems with our country are perhaps our own fault. To say that the primary cause of our economic misfortune is due to the Japanese is pure ignorance. I'm not saying that the Japanese are perfect, not by any means. But neither are we!

Maybe the fact that we're so angry at Japan is that we need someone to hate. The communists are gone. Russia is now a debt-ridden subservient ally. So who do we hate now? How about Japan? They're highly visible, they're doing better economically than us, why not? What would this country do without an enemy? We need someone to invoke our sense of nationalism.

Now if someone talks about Japan's role in WW2 in support of anti-Japanese views, I'd ask them, what about Germany? Why isn't there a large outcry against Germany? Why aren't there news reports and billboards blasting German economic growth in America? If you compare the trade surplus that the U.S. has with Germany and with Japan, and the shares of the American economy that both countries have taken in recent years, I think that you will be surprised to find a lot of similarities. There is more to the recent anti-Japan sentiment than just our economy. It is merely a reflection of our need to direct our national frustration at someplace other than where it is needed, right at home. Don't let the media and the narrow-minded popular opinion distort your views.

To say that the primary cause of our economic misfortune is due to the Japanese is pure ignorance.

I heard a local radio commercial the other day which portrayed a Japanese person in a very negative and stereotypical manner. Even now an increasing number of news programs are playing up the Anti-Japanese theme. The longer we as a country hold to our Japan bashing, the greater possibility for the growth of racist tendencies toward the Japanese people. And it won't be limited to just Japanese Americans or nationals; rather it will include all Asian-Americans. Articles appearing recently in the Wall Street Journal have already documented dramatic increases in discrimination toward Asian-Americans in the U.S. This growth of racism can not be tolerated! It must stop!

Let us find out what we can do to strengthen our nation's economy. As Bucknell students, and the future generation of American leaders, we need to discover how to become competitive again in the increasingly global market. Look inward as opposed to outward. We can still be economically critical of Japan, but not to the gross proportions that we are engaged in today. We can't take the easy way out-now is the time to focus our efforts where they are needed the most. But, I'll tell you right now that blaming Japan won't do it.

Is anybody out there? Who's responsible for the poor?

BY JOHN SHIRE

Roughly two weeks ago, a columnist for the New York Times, Anthony Lewis, wrote a piece harping on President Bush and the rest of the political and power elite for making policy that separates them from the rest of society. The catalyst for the column was of course the incident at a supermarket's electronic checkout scanner to which our President expressed amazement, suggesting an even broader problem as Lewis stated, "Upper-income Americans, whether in public or private employment...hardly experience the problems that weigh so heavily today on American society." Mr. Lewis cited health care, public schooling, and crime as the breaching issues that separate Americans within the top-fifth income bracket from the rest of the nation. He explains that the President gets medical care at public expense and states that. "Better-off families simply opt out of [the most depressing feature of contemporary life] the public school system by purchasing private instruction." Further, he contends that the elite avoid the menacing problem of crime by protecting themselves with security alarms or by living in units with private security guards. The sum of the argument is that, "It is not a recipe for a healthy democratic society." What Mr. Lewis is really suggesting is that the President and the rest of the elite have distanced themselves so far from those whose income brackets are below them that they do not realize the dreadful impact that their policies have on those whose income falls below the top three percent bracket.

Fourth in a Series

What Mr. Lewis is really suggesting is that the President and the rest of the elite have distanced themselves so far from those whose income brackets are below them that they do not realize the dreadful impact that their policies have on those whose income falls below the top three percent bracket.

Mr. Lewis is not saying that the President should not receive free health care. He is not saying that the elite should not go to private schools. Finally, he is not arguing that those who can afford to provide themselves with security systems should opt not to do so. Rather, he argues that the elite know not what they do when they continue to place heavy tax burdens on the middle class. He believes that the elite have no compassion for those who are being pushed from mid-level income brackets into poverty. Mr. Lewis is convinced that the elite enjoy the distance between themselves and those below. Evidence can be seen in the fact that Bush's policies were moderate for a while. He was in favor of tax breaks for this and that at the middle and lower income levels, but the cuts were not significant enough to really help. They were more a slap in the face, like here, take this and stop whining. Ironically, as a result of this weak attempt to help lower-income receivers, Bush lost roughly 40% of his support in the Republican party and the evidence can be seen in nearly every primary.

What should one do who is unsatisfied with the political system, when there are no good candidates for an election and no one has any sure way of bridging the gap between the rich and the poor? One can vote against the candidate one hates the most. One can vote for a candidate who has a reasonable chance of ousting the incumbent, or one can simply not vote. Not voting is an exercise of power in that it shows a lack of support for the current government; unfortunately, by not voting one can also imply that one is relatively satisfied with the current political system. It does not really matter because one vote will not make a difference in today's political system. Maybe all one can do is view this system as a little push for everyone to work a little harder at what they do in an attempt to reach a position in which one will truly have an influence in elite decision making. This sure seems like a better alternative than continuously blaming those in positions of power for the hardships the average American must endure.

People have the power to act responsibly

BY ERIC LYON

Professors and students say some pretty bizarre things. One of the more bizarre opinions I hear around campus is a unique interpretation and definition of power. Some folks declare that women can't be sexist and minorities can not be racist since they hold no power in our society. By this argument, even if a minority commits the very same bigoted act as a white male, the minority is not racist.

This argument is part of the current "victim's revolution" which wrongly attempts to absolve victims of all guilt in their misfortune.

In an effort to relieve these professors and students of their self-imposed duties in semantic manipulation, I relay the following story chronicled by Chris Matthews in his book Hardball (Summit:1988). I hope this will clarify the true nature and meaning of power:

Senator Bill Bradley (D-NJ) came to the Senate with his reputation as Princeton All-American and National Basketball Association star preceding him. Invited to make a speech at a large banquet, the confident legislator sat at the head table waiting to make his address.

When the waiter came around and put a pat of butter on his plate, Bradley stopped him. "Excuse me. Can I have two pats of butter?"

"Sorry," the waiter said, "one pat to a person."

"I think you don't know who I am," Bradley said. "I'm BILL BRADLEY, the Rhodes Scholar, professional basketball player, world champion, United States Senator."

The Waiter said, "Well, maybe you don't know who I am."

"Well, as a matter of fact I don't," Bradley said. "Who are you?"

"I'm the guy," the waiter said, "who's in charge of the butter."

When some minorities and women endlessly cry "victim," they begin to waive their right to be taken seriously as a voice in our society. By saying, "I'm a victim of a sexist society and that is why I didn't get the job," a person is giving up their butter.

When some minorities and women endlessly cry "victim," they begin to waive their right to be taken seriously as a voice

It is one thing to identify sexism or racism in our society, but it is dangerous to entirely connect that idea with individual misfortune. In Patricia Bowman's rape trial, many contended that William Kennedy Smith was found not guilty because of Smith's political clout. Secondly, they argue that pervasive sexism in our society allows men to rape with little chance of retribution.

What this thinking excludes is the fact Ms. Bowman "gave up her butter." She left a bar alone and drunk early in the morning and followed Mr. Smith home. After drinking more alcohol, she consented to foreplay on the beach, and was subsequently "raped" during the second episode of intercourse. How could Mr. Smith conclude that she did not want to have sex?

Ms. Bowman had a right to personal safety in the Kennedy compound. She also had a right to prosecute Mr. Smith because she believed she was raped. She also had the power to act responsibly.

When one says Bowman was not guilty in the matter contributing to her own misfortune, one misses the larger picture. Victims do have power, (i.e., the power to avoid misfortune by exercising good judgement).

If I leave a bar drunk, and wreck my car, should I prosecute the bartender for serving an inebriated person? I had the power to stay sober, or to drink in moderation. The bartender did not have the power to pour unwanted beer down my throat.

Richard Cohen relates the following tale about how giving up your butter applies to those below the poverty line, all of whom are considered helpless victims of racism or classism by some "power" thinkers on campus:

In 1987 a mother of 14 confronted the then mayor, Marion Barry, and asked the city's help in finding a home. He replied, "Why don't you stop having all these babies?" This was not exactly an answer to her problem, but the mayor was criticized not for being non-germane, but for daring to hold the woman accountable for her plight, as if there were no connection between having 14 kids and having some difficulty finding a place to live. But there it was, and Barry was right in blaming this victim.

Everyone has the power to decide unwisely, or to fall into misfortune. If one makes the connection that they are powerless to steer their own fate, one is sorely mistaken. In our society some have more power than others, but if you consider yourself "butterless" in all situations and decisions, you truly are a victim. That is to say a victim of yourself and those who taught you that due to the power structure in America, you are absolved of contributing to your own misfortune.

Sincerely Swersky

BY RICHARD SWERSKY

As I pondered what to write about this week, I turned to the most inspirational breed known to man-the female! When I asked one for her opinion for a subject, she stated firmly and without hesitation, "Write about why guys are so intimidated by girls." This puzzled me for a bit. I figured (not to be sexist, but rather factual) that guys (on the average) are bigger and stronger than girls. So why should they be intimidated by them?? But the more I thought about it, the more real this statement became.

I tried to think of examples to support this theory. And I came up with evidence that only is valid when a guy is attracted to a girl. For when a guy thinks of a girl as only his "friend," he has no problem with intimidation. He actually treats her similarly to one of his guy friends. He calls her, talks to her, and even takes her out while thinking nothing of it.

A guy's downfall comes only when he is attracted to a girl.

A guy's downfall comes only when he is attracted to a girl. Think of the situation when a guy is attracted to a girl but doesn't know her personally. The majority of the time a guy will not go up and talk to her out of the blue even though he is attracted to her. And if he does, it was probably torture getting up enough courage to do it.

The torture is usually a long-winded, pointless conversation between his heart (what he really wants to do) and his mind (what he thinks he should do). It goes something like:

HEART: Hey, go up and talk to her.

MIND: No, no. You don't even know her. You'll probably make a total fool out of yourself.

HEART: How?? By introducing yourself?? Just go up and start a conversation.

MIND: No, it's not right. I'll just probably meet her somewhere, sometime, and if I don't, it just wasn't meant to be.

HEART: What a great cop out!!

The conversation goes on for a while longer with the mind, that rational, logical being, usually winning the argument.

The mind is actually where the intimidation begins. But one has to give the mind some credit. The mind is on the lookout. I mean, let's face it, no one wants to make a fool out of himself. Everyone hates embarrassment. The mind is just considering every precaution necessary to avoid humiliation. But this usually comes off as being scared, second-guessing oneself, or just plain being a wimp.

The heart is constantly trying to defeat the intimidation factor. The heart is not capable of thinking before doing. It just does it...unless the mind is strong enough to stop the heart from doing it. Hence, the heart does not possess the objectivity that the mind lives on. And this is why the heart usually loses the battle to the mind. So it turns out that the guy does not go up and talk to the girl even though deep down, he really wants to.

Similar situations occur when a guy wants to call up a girl, ask out a girl, or go visit a girl. The guy is all ready to go through with it but with less than a second left on the clock, the opposing team calls time out. The mind freezes the situation and scrutinizes it. Then comes all the "wells" and "buts" and "what ifs" that hinder the guy from really doing what he wants to do. The mind really acts as a sort of "rational" devil's advocate or more simply, a kill-joy.

The comical part comes when the guy actually goes through with it. He finds out that it was actually pretty easy and then wonders what inhibited him before. The guy seldom makes a fool out of himself and the girl is flattered. So both parties benefit! And the possibilities are endless.

It turns out that guys might come off as being intimidated by girls simply because they think too much. How much easier (and sometimes pleasurable) it is to think about something rather than actually doing it!! But I'm convinced that it is all part of the mysterious cycle we call life. In the long run, the guy will eventually listen to his heart and do what he wants to do. He will find the girl of his dreams and she will find him. (Whether they can keep each other is another story). But we often ask as mortals (and economists will appreciate this one), how long is the long run?? Well..., I guess we'll just have to wait around and find out.

eluded the feminists: women are just as different from each other as they are from men.

The women's movement is running out of both steam and fresh meat. They don't have much to do, so feminism is imploding into multicultural feminism, as groups try to outmaneuver each other for victimhood priority. With so many divisions—radical feminism, lesbian feminism, Marxist feminism (this comes verbatim from A Woman's Guide to Bucknell), and so on ad infinitum—the whole concept of "sisterhood" is dissolving.

My advice to everyone is to regard self-proclaimed "feminist leaders" with skepticism. If women want a variety of female opinion, I suggest the following (to start a long list): Camille Paglia, author of Sexual Personae (Yale University Press), Sally Quinn (Washington Post), Mona Charen (nationally syndicated columnist), and Karen Lehrman (New Republic) who concludes:

"Women should feel as free to have five children as to re-create themselves through plastic surgery, wear bustiers, skin-tight miniskirts, and spiked heels, and read hardcore pornographic magazines. This might offend your sensibilities, but the beauty of real feminism [italics added] is that it's none of your business."

Visiting artist focuses on AIDS issues

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In conjunction with Bucknell's AIDS Awareness week, mixed-media sculptor and performance artist Mimi Holmes will be conducting a series of events discussing the topic of AIDS. Drawing on her background of art, theatre, and storytelling, Holmes integrates audiences more intimately into her work than traditional artists.

Opening Monday in the Langone Center Cave will be Holmes' installation "What Are We Doing? Where Are We Going?" Composed of over 200 paper mache masks depicting the fears and facts about AIDS, Holmes drew her inspiration from a roadside installation of crosses she viewed in Alabama. "I wanted the work to seem rather fundamentalist upon a first look and then reveal more information on closer inspection. I was trying to deal with both my own and societal fears concerning AIDS, hoping to galvanize both myself and others to take positive actions to help with the epidemic."

Mimi Holmes, mixed-media sculptor and performance artist, will be presenting her performance "You Gotta Take Precautions" in cooperation with her installation in the Langone Center Cave.

On Tuesday and Wednesday from 12–1:30 p.m., Holmes has invited the Bucknell community to express their reactions and feelings to the AIDS epidemic by participating in the creation of the installation. The public is invited to the Cave to paint a sign, cross, or mark and contribute it to the work-in-progress to be displayed in front of the Langone Center. Holmes will discuss the work in a gallery talk at 12 p.m. on Wednesday.

In addition, Holmes will present a performance piece to compliment her installation entitled "You Gotta Take Precautions," on Wednesday at 8 p.m. in the Cave. A one-woman show, Holmes will portray a bag woman preaching safe sex and AIDS awareness, challenging the audience to treat their lives as holy.

Holmes will present another performance on Thursday at 3:30 p.m. with students from Theater 314. The piece, to be created by the students, will also be related to the installation.

A graduate from Agnes Scott College with a double major in Art and Theatre, Holmes worked for three years after college in a professional theatre before returning to school to receive an MFA in Studio Art from Florida State University. It was there that Holmes first began experimenting with Performance Art as a means to combine her interest in theatre with art.

Holmes' work has culminated in exhibitions in over 25 states, and artist residencies at the art colony of Blue Mountain Center and at the Ucross Foundation. The Alabama State Council on the Arts awarded her an Artist Fellowship and an Individual Artist Technical Assistance Grant. An active member of the Women's Caucus for Art, Holmes occupies a position on its National Board of Directors.

Currently an assistant professor of art at Cornell College, Holmes integrates her fascination with the natural world into her work. "I like to think of myself as an object-maker; a post-holocaustal shaman of sorts... I am fascinated with the natural world and many of my forms are inspired by insect, animal, and plant shapes/coloration. My sculptures are containers for ideas in much the same way our bodies are vessels for our spirit/soul."

Senior recital reflects a life-long dedication

BETH B. MORILLA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Determination and dedication are two key words to describe Peter Hill '92, a Bachelor of Arts major. All are invited to attend Hill's senior recital this Sunday at 7:30 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

Student profile

Hill will be performing various classical and contemporary piano pieces. A piano player since the age of seven, Hill is no stranger to performing. His musical career at Bucknell has included performances in student recitals and master classes. He also performed recitals in his sophomore and junior years.

Hill, avidly dedicated to the piano, estimates that he practices an average of 25 to 30 hours a week. During his first three years at Bucknell, Hill studied the piano with Professor of Music Barry Hannigan. He currently studies with Lois Svard, associate professor of music. Hill works as a teaching assistant in music theory and is also an active member of the Rooke Chapel Choir.

When he isn't performing or practicing, Hill enjoys listening to the new, contemporary music of composers like Alban Berg. Hill believes that he is better at performing slow, melodic, rubato pieces where he has the opportunity to interpret the piece and is not limited to the constraints of set tempos.

Looking forward to the future, Hill plans on attending graduate school with a major in piano performance. He hopes to attend the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston. Eventually, Hill would like to become a concert pianist.

In Sunday night's recital, Hill will be performing Prelude and Fugue in B Flat Minor (from the Well-Tempered Clavier) by J.S. Bach, Sonata, Opus 31, #2 in D Minor by Ludwig Van Beethoven, Etude in A Flat Major, Opus 25, #1 by Chopin, Sonata Opus 1 by Alban Berg, and Sonatine by Maurice Ravel.

Garland takes charge with Control Songs

Musician David Garland will be presenting his collection of songs entitled Control Songs on Tuesday, Mar. 17. This performance will be in the Langone Center Gallery at 8 p.m. and is the third of four productions in the Gallery Series. Directed by William Duckworth, chair of the music department and professor of music, the Gallery Series is partially funded by Meet The Composer and the Bucknell University Department of Music. The series showcases performance artists and experimental music concerts.

Garland describes his show as a solo performance in which he sings primarily with pre-recorded accompaniment. Although Garland considers his lyrics "unusual," it is important to him that he perform his works in a traditional way. "I don't try to be gratuitously different; songs can be about anything in the world," Garland stated.

The collection that Garland will perform is called Control Songs because the main topic of these songs is control. "The issue of control is something as basic to the way people live as love," said Garland. "A sense of control plays an important role in our lives. Everyone, to a degree, is a potential victim to random difficulty, yet we act as though we know what will happen in our lives. We all have to have our illusions to some extent."

Garland, who is based in New York, has performed in several New York locales, including Carnegie Hall. He has toured Europe, and his music and performances have been supported by grants from the National Endowment for the Arts Inter-Arts program, Meet The Composer, and the New York State Council on the Arts. Garland is a member of The Worlds of Love, an ensemble that includes drummer Ikue Mori and banjoist/synthesizer player Cinnie Cole. This group released an album in the spring of 1989. Lately, most of Garland's work has been as a soloist. He recently completed recording arrangements of pieces by Brian Wilson of the Beach Boys. Garland is currently working on a second solo album.

In addition to recording and performing, Garland is the producer and host of "Spinning on Air," a radio program on WNYC-FM, which is affiliated with National Public Radio. His latest project was doing the sound and production for a radio program. "Long hours went into that," Garland commented.

Venus Abiertas opens Celebration of the Arts

BY JEAN PETERSON
Special to The Bucknellian

Christopher Columbus wonders why he is obsessed with soap bubbles and how close his sailors are to mutiny. Juan Pizarro takes a moment from the conquest of the Incas to interview with a CNN team. American game show contestants reveal that, when it comes to south-of-the-border, ignorance is bliss. These and other scenes incorporating dance, theatre, visual art, and music comprise the program of Venas Abiertas: Enscenas sobre Latinoamerica, a performance collage written and performed by Bucknell students, faculty, and guest artists. Presented by the Department of Theatre and Dance, the show features the works of guest artists Bernardo Solano, Graciela Daniele, and Eugenio Huanco, as well as talents more familiar to Bucknellians: Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance and Karl Patten, professor of English. With many scenes conceived, scripted, and performed entirely by students, Venas Abiertas represents a true artistic and creative collaboration. Opening this Friday in the University Theatre in Coleman at 8 p.m., the show will run through Sunday. Tickets are $4 and are available at the Langone Center Box Office.

Venus Abiertas kicks off Bucknell's annual Celebration of the Arts, a gala weekend of performances, exhibitions, and lectures. Sponsored by the Bucknell Association for the Arts, this years theme is "Discovery 1992: Focus on Latin America."

In addition to this weekend's performance, Gary Grant, chair and associate professor of Theatre will lead a discussion on Latin American theatre tomorrow at 10:30 a.m. in the Langone Center Forum. Following will be a lecture given by Anne Horton, writer, lecturer, and curator at 2 p.m., also in the Langone Center Forum. Horton's lecture, "Frido Kahlo and Her Contemporaries," will compliment the exhibit on display in the Langone Center Gallery, "Discovery 1992: Six Latin American Women Artists." A reception will be held in the Gallery at 4 p.m. The annual banquet will be held tomorrow night at 5:30 p.m. in the Terrace Room. Tickets are available at 717-524-9726 for $16.

Many of the participants speak of the unusual and risky beginning of Venus Abiertas. "We essentially started from zero," recalls director Gary Grant. Student author Marc Haimes '93, whose "Our Price is Right" scene provides a running joke about the rewards of ignorance, describes the first meeting of the writers as "a 7-way ping-pong table of ideas, with three or four balls going at once." Grant observed that the process has been "a true collaboration... There has been very little sense of ownership of an individual script... rather a flexibility and openness about sharing, contributing, and shaping individual work to suit the totality of the project." Grant added that of the 23 performers, remarkably few are theatre majors, and that many are "Latino students who were attracted to the project because of its focus on Latin America, and on aspects of their experience that get little attention elsewhere on campus."

The extent of student and faculty collaboration in both writing and performing is another unusual aspect of the collage, one which Charles Sackrey, associate professor of economics, sees as a strength. "This experience has democratized relationships between students and faculty... especially since, in so many cases, the faculty have been able to learn so much from the students." Sackrey credits Grant for a "strong central vision" that holds the scenes, dances, stories, poems, music, and visual images of Venus Abiertas together. That "vision," according to Grant, addresses "not only ignorance about the region, but how ignorance is created; not only knowledge, but perspectives on knowledge: how it is invented, validated, and disseminated."

Venus Abiertas opens tonight in the University Theatre in Coleman, kicking off the weekend-long Celebration of the Arts. Clockwise from upper left: Gabe Portuondo '93 presents a speech in Spanish, translated by Daisy Dominguez '95; George Hannah '93 commands center stage; Tony Goss, Bea Spielman, member of the Association of the Arts, Karl Patten, professor of English, and Jean Peterson, professor of English, twist their faculty meeting into a convention of dictators; Veronica Flores '94 weeps over the body of Gabe Portuondo; Danna Frangione, director and associate professor of dance, coaches Jessica Herbster '94; Gary Grant, chair and assistant professor of Theatre, and Eugenio Huanca, the guest musician for _Venus Abiertas_, discuss the musical and textual integration of the script with George Hannah.

Wrestling earns second place at ECWAs

Bob Ferraro '94 named Outstanding Wrestler; Ferraro, Mike Van Doren '92, Ken Herceg '92, and Phil Elliott '93 earn national bid

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell wrestling squad finished its 1991-92 season last weekend by totaling 71 points and a second place finish at the East Coast Wrestling Association Championships. The team was lead by a pair of individual champions as well as a trio of runner-ups.

Co-captain Ken Herceg '92 and Bob Ferraro '94 each earned their first career ECWA titles, while co-captain Mike Van Doren '92 and Phil Elliott '93 were awarded two of the three conference wildcard spots. The foursome will represent Bucknell and the ECWA at the NCAA Championships to be held March 19-21 in Oklahoma.

The championships proved to be successful for Ferraro but also his father, Bison Head Coach Bob Ferraro, Sr., as the pair swept the post-competition awards. A 190-pound sophomore, Ferraro, Jr. was awarded the tournament's Outstanding Wrestler Award while his father was named the ECWA Coach of the Year after leading his team to a regular season conference tie for first place.

Bucknell finished the first day of the two-day meet with a slim 3/4 of a point lead over host Rider College, with both squads qualifying five wrestlers for the finals. Eventual champion Central Connecticut State trailed by seven points and had four grapplers in the finals.

After scoring a 10-3 victory in the first round, the fourth-rated Elliott was paired against the top seed in the 134-pound tournament, Lance Banfi of CCSU, who had already topped the Bison wrestler once this season. This time Elliott upset Banfi by a 7-4 decision, earning a place in the class finals. In that bout the Bison junior ended the regulation time limit with an 8-8 tie, but was taken down in overtime, leaving him with a 10-8 loss and a second place finish.

Entering the competition as the number one seed, Van Doren had no trouble reaching the finals in a 12-2 major decision and a second period pin that matched him with Rider's Mike Bartholomew, the tenth ranked 150-pounder in the nation according to the Amateur Wrestling News. Bartholomew gained an advantage early on a questionable referee's call and was able to hold on to leave Van Doren, last year's champion, as this season's conference runner-up.

Bucknell's 167-pound entry, Herceg, entered the championships as the number one seed and was able to live up to that billing in three impressive bouts. The Bison captain opened with a first period pin and won in the semifinals with a 55 second fall over Hofstra's Dion Visconti. Herceg shutout Rider's Tony DeHaven, 4-0, to earn his first conference championship.

Ferraro also reached the finals on the strength of two pins, in 2:12 and 4:36, before facing Rider's Bill Tassogloy. The sophomore's 11-3 major decision not only earned him the individual title and O.W. Award, but pulled the Bison to within less than one point of CCSU in the team standings.

The afternoon's final competition, the heavyweight finals between co-captain Ben Myers '92 and the Blue Devils' Kevin Marriner, would decided the team title. In the two squad's match during the dual bout season, the Bison were able to win 24-22 as Myers scored a major decision in that match's final bout, but at the championships, Marriner, the defending champion, scored the one point victory that clinched the title. Myers was able to keep the score even throughout the match as the bout ended in a 1-1 tie, but Marriner was awarded the decisive point for his advantage in riding time.

Afterwards, Coach Ferraro commented, "I was happy with the performance. The team wrestled very hard and just came up short. We lost a couple of one-point decisions and couldn't win the close ones, but we knew that Central Connecticut was going to be tough."

As for the four Bison wrestlers going to the NCAA Championships, Ferraro predicted that "all four have a very good chance to win some matches, and once you win one you're in a position to place. We've wrestled a lot of Top 20 teams and met many All-Americas, and that should help us in Oklahoma."

Each of the Bucknell foursome will be trying to finish in the top eight in their class, thereby becoming the third All-America in school history. Bucknell's last wrestler to gain All-America status is current assistant Bryan Burns '91, who finished eighth last season.

Mike Van Doren '92, shown here in a match held this January in Davis Gym, earned a trip to the NCAA Championships on a wild-card berth based on his second-place finish at this past weekend's ECWA championships. Van Doren entered the competition as the number one seeded wrestler, but fell to Rider's Mike Bartholomew.

Letter to the Editors

TO BUCKNELL STUDENTS :

Intercollegiate athletic programs should be an integral part of a college's undergraduate offerings, not something enjoyed only by a select few. The fact that Bucknell's teams are for more than the athletes was never more evident than at the recent Patriot League Basketball Tournament.

Parents came to watch their sons play, alumni returned to celebrate alma mater, faculty and staff were present in considerable numbers, and many in Lewisburg and neighboring communities continued their annual tradition of following the Bison at tournament time.

But the largest and most vocal group of Bucknell fans in Stabler Arena was made up of students. Your support of the Breakin' Bison has been great all year, and the backing you gave YOUR team in the final Tuesday night was terrific. The effort and contributions of the team and fans this year is college basketball at its very best.

Thanks for the support and I hope we'll all be following the Bison somewhere next week.

BRAD TUFTS, ASSOCIATE DIRECTOR OF ATHLETICS

Bison improve record to 3-3; open home season this weekend

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Don't you love Central Pennsylvania weather? One day it rains buckets, the next day people are out sunbathing, and the next day the wind chill is subzero. It is hard enough just trying to stay healthy, much less trying to get through a baseball schedule. But that is exactly what the Bucknell baseball squad has had to put up with.

The Bison had a Saturday doubleheader at Franklin and Marshall rained out, which they made up on Sunday. A Tuesday matinee at Gettysburg was also washed out. It is difficult for a team to get its timing down when they are frequently driven indoors by the weather. Rain and cold will force the team to practice in the fieldhouse all this week in preparation for this weekend's home openers.

"The bad weather hurts our hitting and fielding the most," says catcher Mark Kennedy '92. "It's tough trying to get in good practices in the fieldhouse after we've already been out on the diamond."

On Sunday, the Bison returned to Lancaster for the make-up twin bill against F&M. As it turned out, Bucknell helped christen the Diplomats new stadium by handing them two straight losses.

In the opener, home runs by Kennedy, Dave Koerner '92, and Jim Zervanos '93 helped Bucknell jump out to an 8-1 lead after two and a half innings. Starting pitcher Kurt Waldner '93 picked up the win, as the Bison cruised, 9-4.

Pitching was the name of the game in the nightcap, as Jack Kazanjian '93 and Dave Scranton '95 combined on a four-hit shutout. Kazanjian tossed the first six innings, giving up just four singles, while striking out two. Scranton hurled a scoreless inning in relief, as Bucknell rolled, 7-0.

Matt Sniegocki '93 led the hitting attack with two hits, including a monstrous home run, and two RBI. Kennedy and first baseman Mark Sordi '94 also had two hits apiece.

Kennedy has gotten off to a quick start with the bat this season. "I've been working with my roommate [Koerner] inside, hitting off the tee and in the cage," explained Kennedy. "It has helped me be more patient at the plate." He went into the F&M series leading the team with a .438 average, and he raised it by going three for six in the doubleheader. Kennedy now has two homers, ten RBI, and four doubles in six games this season.

Weather permitting, the Bison will open their home season with four tough games in two days. Tomorrow, Big East foe Villanova will be in town for a noon doubleheader, followed by C.W. Post on Sunday for a 1 p.m. double dip. The jam-packed schedule continues during Spring Break, as Bucknell plays eight games in eight days. Manager Gene Depew will be forced to use his entire roster in the next two weeks that lead up to the opening of Patriot League play.

In particular, the pitching staff will be under pressure. "We have a tough schedule, but it will help that we have good freshman pitchers," said second baseman Mike Kearns '93. "We should be able to handle it because our pitchers have shown good patience and poise, and it helps that they are throwing strikes."

Having a lot of games in a short period of time can also work to a team's advantage if they can get on a roll. The winning feeling carries over into the next game. Kennedy envisions a successful season if this can happen. "I think we can look for 30 wins if we get hot. We should challenge for the Patriot League title and an ECAC bid," said the senior catcher.

All this assumes that it won't rain every day for the next two months, which may not be out of the question in this part of the country.

Peter Ho — The Bucknellian

Catcher Mark Kennedy '92, shown here in a game played last season, currently leads the Bison in batting average, runs batted in, hits, and is tied with Larry Trout '93 and Dave Koerner '92 with two homers each.

Bison nearly upset Lafayette

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What constitues a successful athletic season? Does the number of games won determine the success of a team? Bucknell's head women's basketball coach Juliene Simpson doesn't think so, and neither does her team.

After winning their first tournament of the season last November, the Bison faced some hard times, losing 13 straight games before picking up their third win of the season. However, the win over Lehigh, a team which finished the season with a 1-19 record, did not serve to boost the confidence of the Bucknell squad. Bucknell picked up that essential, missing ingredient two games later against defending League Champion Holy Cross.

The Bison played a tough game against Holy Cross, but were behind throughout the most of the contest. With five minutes remaining, the Bucknell team picked up its first lead and realized that they could indeed win. Bucknell accepted the challenge and went on to defeat the league power-house 72-66.

The victory over the Crusaders sparked a late-season Bucknell surge, as the team came on strong at the end of the season. The Bison won three of their last five games, including a surprise upset over George Mason. George Mason, a leader in the tough Colonial Athletic Association, welcomed to their arena a team that they thought would be an easy opponent. The Bucknell women proved them wrong, coming back from a 17-point deficit to take home a 68-64 victory.

The Bison ended the regular season with a deceiving 7-19 record, losing many very close games on the year. The team's 4-10 Patriot League record going into the Tournament, however, did not fool the Lafayette head coach, Pat Fisher. Two weeks before tournament-time, her squad played its last regular season game in Lewisburg. The Leopards barely squeezed by a much-improved Bucknell team, returning to their Easton, PA campus with an 85-82 victory.

At the Patriot League Championship Tournament last weekend, Bucknell, the seventh seed, faced Lafayette, the number two team in the league, in the first round of play. The favored Lafayette team opened the contest with a 6-0 run and expanded its lead to seven with 10:54 left in the first half. Bucknell then went on a small run of its own, behind a layup by Monica Nawarskas '94, a running jumper by tri-captain Joy Sandler '92 and a baseline jumper by Juliet McGee '93, which cut the Lafayette lead to one.

Following that period of play, Lafayette continued to stay one step ahead of Bucknell, eventually grabbing its biggest lead of eight with 1:55 left in the half. During those last two minutes, the Bison showed their opponents what they are made of, taking advantage of every opportunity afforded them. At the 52-second mark, Kristi Dunleavy '93 hit a twelve-foot baseline jumper, cutting the lead to six. Lafayette was then called for two quick fouls in the remaining 33 seconds, and Anne McGovern '93 and Sandler each converted on both of their free throw attempts. At half-time, the Leopards found themselves barely holding onto a two-point lead.

> "Bucknell will be a force to be reckoned with next season. They certainly didn't play like a seventh-place team tonight."
> — Pat Fisher
> Head Coach,
> Lafayette College

During the first eight minutes of the second half, the two teams played a fairly even game. Bucknell still had yet to see a lead, however. At the 12:16 mark, Dunleavy dished off a pass to McGovern, who was open in the corner; McGovern sank a three-pointer to cut Lafayette's lead to one. From that moment, the two teams began to wage war upon each other, and the Lafayette lead varied between two and four points for the next five minutes.

Tri-captain Lisa Fink '93 was then fouled with 7:11 left to play. The junior sunk both free throw attempts to tie the score at 43-43. One minute later, tri-captain Kirsten Ellison '92 forced a foul and went on to give Bucknell its first lead of the game.

Bucknell seemed on the verge of taking control of the game when tragedy struck—Sandler, one of Bucknell's biggest leaders on the court, went down with an injured knee with 5:03 left in the game. The senior, who lost a season of play due to a pre-season knee injury her sophomore year, was later diagnosed as having torn the anterior cruciate ligament in her left knee, the same injury she sustained two years before in the opposite leg. Sandler is currently visiting a doctor in Pittsburgh and will have to have surgery for the second time in her college career.

After Sandler went out of the game, the Bucknell team lost much of the momentum that it had picked up, and Lafayette once again increased its lead to seven. The Bison eventually cut that lead to two with 28 seconds left to play, but could not pull off the upset. The final score of the game was 64-58 in favor of the second-seeded team.

In the loss, the Bison shot 43.5 percent from the field, while Lafayette shot only 34.4 percent. Bucknell also outshot their opponents from the free throw line. However, Bucknell was plagued by poor rebounding—32 to Lafayette's 46—and strong defensive play by the Leopard squad. McGee was Bucknell's high-scorer with 17, followed by Fink, who had 12.

Following the game, Simpson said, "Lafayette plays an excellent game and has balanced scoring. We executed our game plan well—the only thing we didn't do was win."

Lafayette's coach commented, "Bucknell will be a force to be reckoned with next season. They are very intense and play very hard, and that is what makes them tough to beat. They certainly didn't play like a seventh-place team tonight." In fact, in a tournament in which there were no upsets, Bucknell played the only close game over the weekend.

Finally, to cap off what the team feels was a very successful season indeed, McGee and Sandler were picked for Second Team All-League honors. McGee, a power-forward, led the Patriot League in rebounding all season with an average of 9.4 per game. In games against fellow league teams, Sandler led the league in 3-point shooting percentage with a .418 average. The guard was also 3rd in scoring against league teams and was 8th in over-all scoring.

Next season, Bucknell will look to improve upon its first year under coach Simpson. The team promises to be a strong one, losing only two seniors, while welcoming back the skillfull play of Kelly Dee '94, who, in early January, suffered the same debilitating injury as Sandler did last weekend.

Crew preps for Augusta Invite

BY EDWARD WILLIAMS

"Compared to last spring, the crew is much further ahead," according to Men's Captain Chris Norrie '92. Since January 23, the men's and women's crews have been running, erging, and lifting. The work of the athletes has led Head Coach John Skotedis to have high expectations, "given that the intensity to winter workouts and the commitment to weights and ergs is stronger than in the past."

Women's Captain Kristin Gundersen '92 is optimistic about the spring season. "We only have eight [varsity] rowers, but they're good." The novice team is young this season, having three oarswomen who have never rowed. But Gundersen thinks that "depending on how fast they catch on and what their competition is, they should do well."

Skotedis believes that the spring will be a "challenging" season for the varsity men. The heavyweights are racing in an eight as opposed to last spring's successful four. The lightweights also face tough competition in the Northeast. However, Norrie believes that "this spring will be the best ever." Novice Men's Coach Jimmy King's main objectives are "to help win the Patriot League Championships, and beyond that to qualify for the Dad Vail Regatta," the intensely competitive conclusion to the season. Yet since novice competition varies from year to year, King finds it difficult to predict how his boats will do.

The teams are headed to Augusta, Georgia for spring break. They will spend the week training on the Savannah River, and on March 28 the competitive season begins with the Augusta Invitational. Gundersen commented that "Augusta should be a good race to see where we stand against some of the stronger programs." Similarly, King observes that it is "the first indicator of how the season will turn out." In the past, crews from Syracuse, Princeton, and University of Wisconsin have participated, as well as both the Canadian and the Soviet National Teams. According to Skotedis, "this high level of competition should be one of the most important races of the spring."

the tournament's MVP.

Though the team and fans were disappointed by Tuesday's loss, the season may not yet be over for the Bison. "I think we deserve an NIT bid," said Woollum. "We won twenty-one games, and that's pretty darn good." Woollum also understands that NIT bids are based largely on computer rankings and power of conference. "I'd like to bury the guy who invented that computer with cement shoes in one of the rivers in the Bronx. People have to realize that there is a lot of good basketball played in this country outside the big conferences, and we need to reward some of those teams."

If the Bison do no receive a bid to the NIT, last week's tournament will mark the end of two great Bucknell careers. Patrick King scored the 1000th point of his career in Tuesday's loss. No small accomplishment considering he had eight points going into his junior year. Bill Courtney will also graduate in June. Courtney entered the starting lineup early in his junior year and has started every game since. He has been named to the All-League first team for two consecutive years. Bucknell fans will miss the talent and leadership of those two players.

Though Courtney and King will not be back for the Bison, the tournament also gave Bucknell fans hope for next year. The play of Chris Simpson and Raymond Brown, combined with the experience and leadership of the class of Olkowski, Bright, and Russell Peyton '93, should provide the Bison with formidable returning players. October 15th is only seven months away.

Swimmers place second at ECACs

BY BRAD TUFTS
Special to the Bucknellian

The Patriot League basketball award isn't the only new runner-up plaque in Bucknell's athletic trophy cases. The Bison men's swimming team was also a second place winner last weekend at the inaugural ECAC Championships held at the University of Buffalo.

Coach Dick Russell's team, led by Don Steenson '92 and Jay Gross '93, set a school record of 3:02.12 while placing second in the final event of the meet, the 400-yard freestyle relay, to finish with 470.5 points and edge the University of Massachusetts by one point. The host school, with 598.5 points, captured the big hardware. Rounding out the top ten in the 17-school meet were Patriot League runner-up Lafayette, Boston University, Rutgers, Towson State, Lehigh, Rhode Island, and Colgate.

The freestyle relay performance by the quartet of Steenson, Gross, Diets Conze '94, and Kevin Schroth '92 capped a final evening marked by several other outstanding Bucknell efforts. Gross won his second event of the meet with a 44.79 clocking in the 100 freestyle, only .42 seconds behind Jim Harvey's school record. Steenson paced a one-two Bucknell finish in the 200 backstroke in 1:50.85, only .21 off his own school record. Steve Droste '93 was runner-up in 1:52.26, also second on the all-time Bison list.

Other standouts on a "super Saturday" were Rick Steenson '95, who placed second in the 200 butterfly in 1:51.50; Stew Harris '95, who set a school record of 16:11.41 while finishing third in the 1650 freestyle; and Chad Farrell '92, who took the consolation final of the 200 breaststroke in a school-record 2:09.33.

On Friday, the Bison opened and closed the action with third place finishes in the 200 medley and 800 freestyle relays. In between, Marc Murphy '93 and Harris were third and fifth respectively in the 400 individual medley. Gross won the 100 butterfly in 50.52 with Rick Steenson third in a career-best 50.73.

Thursday's opening events included a Bucknell record of 3:24.69 by the second place 400 medley relay team of the Steensons, Farrell and Gross. That foursome had suffered a disqualification at the Patriot League meet. Other Thursday competitors were Gross, who finished second in the 50 freestyle; Rick Steenson, who finished fourth in the 200 IM; and Conze, who finished fifth in the 500 freestyle.

"Super" is one of Coach Russell's favorite words, and he used it often to describe his team's performance at Buffalo. The meet capped a season in which the Bison set eight school records and posted 34 other performances that rank among the top ten of all-time at Bucknell.

Volleyball clinches conference title

BY MIKE LUTZ
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Spikin' Bison secured their regular season division title this weekend with a crushing victory against previous league favorite Scranton University. The men's Blue team also beat Kutztown and Messiah University on Saturday while the Orange team defeated Kutztown on Saturday as well.

There were many heroes this weekend for the Bison but there were a few who really stood tall above the crowd. The Orange team, which previously lost to Kutztown in three straight games and did not score more than a total of 20 points, was down to Kutztown two games to none on Saturday. They proceeded to stage one of the most incredible comebacks in Bucknell's volleyball history.

After losing the first two games, the Orange team was down 12-3 in the third game when Rob Winchell '92 and Brad Wealand '93 led a comeback that will not be forgotten by those who witnessed it for a long time to come. The team fought hard and came back to win the third game 16-14. Then the Orange team won the all-important fourth game 15-11, and went on to find itself down in the fifth (a rally scoring game when a point is scored on every point) 12-8. In a rally scoring game this is an almost insurmountable lead. But the Bison hung tough and a key dig by Ari Lewis '93 put the Bison over the top with an astounding 16-14 triumph.

This victory was sweet not only for the Orange team, but for both the Blue and Orange team's coach Pat Musselman. She will not be payed a single penny to coach the Orange team this season, but she coaches and takes stats for both teams. Musselman, in her first year of coching the men's volleyball team, has successfully reached her personal goal of pushing the Bison to the top spot in the conference. She has earned the right to a four-day trip with the Blue team in April to go to the Club Volleyball National Championships in Buffalo, NY. She will be the first volleyball coach from Bucknell to go to a national tournament.

As far as the Blue team was concerned this weekend, three individuals shined. The first of these three is serving guru Brian Sell '94.

In the second game against Scranton, which was the preseason favorite to win the conference, Sell served 13 points in a row in a series when he and the rest of the team were playing insane defense. In his string of 13 serves, Sell had one serve that contacted the floor untouched directly on the back line and one incredible dig when a ball was hit at over 80 m.p.h. directly at his head. Sell not only played well in this game (when the Bison won 15-2 in less than 10 mins.) but his consistent passing throughout the weekend was one of the primary reasons for the Spikin' Bison to go 9-0 in individual games.

"You have to want to play your tail off for your teammates because that is absolutely the only way a volleyball team can reach it's true potential."
— Keith Martin '92

The other two heroes for the Bison were swing hitters Keith Martin '92 and Ben Jarosz '94. Martin went seven for seven (seven kills out of seven hitting attempts) in one game and started off three for three in the next. Jarosz was nine for ten at one point in the Scranton match and during that string he hit two balls between defenders' legs! One can only imagine the consistency and velocity with which Jarosz was hitting the ball.

"The team has finally come to the realization that you must have fun out on the court," said Martin. "You have to want to play your tail off for your teammates because that is absolutely the only way a volleyball team can reach it's true potential. You must be psychotic on defense and be 100% determined that no balls hit the floor. You must believe. You must believe in yourself and more importantly you must believe in the people around you. Overall, you must have a great time playing and being with each other. Basically a good volleyball team is like an overgrown family."

The Bison's record of 16-2 proves that Keith's philosophy is correct and that truly, a volleyball team must be a close-knit group.

Wrestler Bob Ferraro '94 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of March 7-13.

Ferraro, at 190 pounds, was given the Outstanding Wrestler Award last weekend for his performance at the East Coast Wrestling Association Championships. His 11-3 major decision over Rider's Bill Tassogloy not only earned him the individual title, but it helped Bucknell to finish second at the ECWA's.

Ferraro, whose father Bob Ferraro, Sr. was named the ECWA Coach of the Year, will join three other Bison wrestlers later this week at the NCAA Championships in Oklahoma.

Tennis gets ready for title defense

BY JOHN BLUMBERGER

The Bucknell men's tennis team has been practicing with intensity since its return from winter recess. The season, which spans from the middle of March through the Patriot League Championships in late April, will commence next week with an away match against Mt. Saint Mary's.

The captain of the team is Andrew Cantor '92, who has been a strong singles player for the past three seasons. Cantor's extremely consistent style of baseline play coupled with his mental toughness has helped add to the team's success in recent years. Cantor knows the team will have to work hard in order to be ready for the challenging matches, but he says, "The potential is there to have a good season." In a scrimmage match against Susquehana University last Wednesday, Cantor easily won at third singles by a score of 8-0. Currently, Cantor is working on improving his serve and volley to make his game more complete.

Chris Rimpel '93 admits that the team's first true test will be in their matches on the spring recess trip to Boca Raton, Florida. Rimpel's game relies heavily on his forcing serve and volley style, yet, he can resort to baseline play if this strategy is not working. Against Susquehana, Rimpel won the fourth singles position by a score of 8-0. Rimpel hopes to have a strong showing in the Patriot League Championships this year, and he is working hard to improve his volley and the consistency of his game.

Cris Stenstrom '94 uses his strong serve and volley strategy in order to win his points quickly. Stenstrom says in regards to last year's first place finish at the Patriot League Championships, "Playing out of our minds at the Patriot League tournament last year and winning it was a tremendous feeling." Although three of last year's top players are not returning, Stenstrom would like the team to finish the season with a winning record and go for it at the Patriot League Championships. The team, doing well as a whole group, is very important to Stenstrom. He won 8-1 at the second singles position last week against Susquehana and is working on improving his backhand.

Greg Downing '94 is also hoping to have a peak in his serve and volley game at the Patriot League Championships. Downing says one of the best qualities of this year's team is that there is a great deal of camaraderie between teammates during matches and off the court. Downing's serve and volley game makes him a very strong doubles player for the team. At the scrimmage against Susquehana, Downing and Taylor Clark '95 won with a score of 8-4.

Coach Craig Reynolds notes that the team must be consistent throughout the season. With four freshmen comprising the eight man squad this year, Coach Reynolds is working hard to improve the team, and he notes that it will make progress as the duel matches continue. The trip to Florida will certainly enable the young players to gain experience from playing several competitive matches.

Mark McGuire '95 plays an all court game and relies on his two fisted backhand and his ability to mix up shots. McGuire's greatest weapons are his mind and strong will to always give 110 % for the team. Mark won at the number one singles position against Susquehana with a score of 8-2. In his first doubles position with Stenstrom, they won with a score of 8-0. McGuire is looking forward to the Patriot League Championships and is currently working on his footwork and consistency.

Mike Price '95 plays with an all court style, but he says he feels most comfortable back on the baseline. Price looks forward to having a good season and hopes to play well during the Patriot League Championships. Playing at the fifth singles position at the Susquehana scrimmage, Price won his pro set 8-3. At the second doubles position with Rimpel, they won 8-1. Price is working on improving his serve and volley game and his consistency.

Rick Zeoli '95 says he relies on his consistency rather than his power in competitive play, but will attack the net when given the opportunity. Zeoli hopes to be playing his best tennis during the Patriot League Championships. Playing at the sixth singles position during the scrimmage against Susquehana, Zeoli won by a score of 8-2. At the present, Zeoli is working on improving his serve.

Taylor Clark has a baseline style of play. Since he is one of the four freshmen to make the tennis team, he will gain experience as the season continues.

With Navy, Army, and Colgate in the Patriot League, Bucknell will face some competitive matches this season. But, it is quite evident that this group of athletes is truly willing to work as a team. Together, the squad will try to accomplish its goals and keep on improving throughout the season.

Bucknell distance runners scored in two events, and the Bison came up with several other fine performances while scoring a total of 11 points in the IC4A Championships at Princeton University last weekend.

Matt Deardorff '92 and Bob Kelly '92 finished one-two in the first section of the 5000-meter run in 14:27.87 and 14:30.08, respectively. Overall, the two placed third and fifth, for a total of ten points. The race was won by Terrance Mahon of Villanova in 14:24.77.

The other point came via an eighth place finish in the mile by Tom Eagleson '93 in 4:14.18.

Joe LaBarge '93 cleared the opening height of 15'1" in the pole vault (something seven entrants failed to do), but missed at 15'7" to finish 16th.

Rich Van Emburgh '95 in the 500-meter run (1:05.34) and Jason Cahilly '92 in the 3000 (8:30.1) did not advance to the final.

In the women's ECAC Championships, also held last weekend, Tameka Hinton '95 ran the 200-meter dash in 25.98, but did not advance. Gina Abraham '93 just missed scoring in the 1000-meters when she placed ninth in 3:01.5.

Each competitor will now have to adjust to the outdoor facilities by their first meet at Wake Forest the first Friday of Spring Break.

Do the Bison diserve an NIT bid? I say yes!

Now that the automatic bid to the NCAA tournament has eluded the Bison, the question is will the NIT place a call to the 717 area code?

Unlike the NCAA which pretends to operate on a superior moral plane (paid for by the $1 billion CBS package), the National Invitational Tournament openly plays to political and financial profit. In other words, a .500 Notre Dame team is a lock while the 21-9 Bison are "on the bubble." Rather than vent my frustration and disappointment over the system and Tuesday night's loss, I'm merely going to try and explain how the NIT selects and what Bucknell's chances are of being selected.

The athletic directors of Fordham University, Manhattan College, St. John's University, and Wagner College comprise the selection and seedings committee (better known as the Metropolitan Intercollegiate Basketball Association) for the tournament. Their mission: to pair teams that will sell out a mid-week game while costing them the least possible travel dollars.

What does Bucknell bring to the bargaining table? A 21 win season is impressive, but not enough on its own. The 18 point thrashing of Delaware (27-3), winners of the North Atlantic Conference and owners of the nation's longest winning streak at 20 games, at Delaware definitely helps. A near upset of Georgia, who boast big victories over Arkansas and Shaquille O'Neil—I mean LSU, down in Athens can't hurt. Other strong resume points for the Bison include victories over East Coast Conference champs Towson State, Missouri Valley regular season co-champs Illinois State, and a blowout of Fordham in the Bronx.

What hurts the Bison? Despite winning 11 of their last 13 games, the loss at Drexel in the second to last regular-season game smarts. Bucknell's small enrollment and basically obscure media market could prove fatal. But Frank McLaughlin, Fordham Athletic Director and committee head, as well as Patriot League President Carl Ulrich have been lobbying hard for the Bison since the red light of the ESPN cameras went off Tuesday night.

In my opinion, the NIT should make a statement for academic institutions that also play basketball, as opposed to the Louisvilles of the world, and satisfy its budget by selecting Bucknell to travel to Villanova, Temple, Richmond or Penn State. While most teams take the postseason for granted, an NIT bid would be welcomed with open arms by a community which proved itself worthy of national recognition.

The NCAA selections will be announced this Sunday. Following those picks, the NIT will send out its bids later that evening. Keep your fingers crossed that all of the favorites in the remaining conference championships go on to victory and the NCAA. Also, root for Penn State or Villanova not to get NCAA at-large bids so that the NIT needs only to fund a bus ride to either State College or Philadelphia.

Bucknell falls short in bid for NCAAs

Rams top Bison in Patriot League Championship 70–65

BETHLEHEM — In an atmosphere unique to March, Bucknell and Fordham fans jammed into Stabler Arena in Bethlehem, PA. Nearly one hour before the start of the game, boosters had already begun chanting and screaming in support of their favorite team. It was the climax of a long season for both teams, but the ultimate prize, a berth in the NCAA tournament was on the line.

Both teams had earned their spot in the finals of the Patriot League Tournament. They each posted league records of 11-3, and they each were victorious in two previous tournament contests. No one doubted that the two teams would put on a show worthy of the ESPN cameras.

The events of the game proceeded very much as one would have expected before hand. The two teams played evenly in the early going. Fordham had the better of the play inside as Fred Herzog and Sanford Jenkins each had four points in the early going. The Bison countered with points from the perimeter and in transition. Chris Simpson '94 had five points in the early going, utilizing a combination of outside jumpers and slashing drives to the goal. Mike Bright '93 also contributed five early points with a three pointer and a fast break slam, which tied the score at twelve. The teams traded baskets for the next four minutes with Fordham gaining a slim advantage at 21-20.

The next five minutes of play were dominated by the Rams who went on a 13-6 run. The inside play of Herzog and Jenkins was augmented by the outside shooting of Jean Prioleau. Fordham also received a major contribution from reserve forward Sherwin Content who added six first half points. The front line of the Bison had difficulty stopping the Rams, especially when Paul Olkowski '93 was forced to leave midway through the first half with foul trouble. "Herzog has three inches on me," remarked Patrick King '92 "it was tough trying to front him."

Despite the size differential, King, who was named Patriot League Player of the Year, worked tirelessly on both ends of the floor. As it has for the entire season, that work paid off. King led a minirally by the Bison by converting from the foul line on four straight opportunities. Simpson was again instrumental in keeping the Bison close, adding another four points in the last two minutes giving him twelve points in the first half. When Bill Courtney '92 hit his first bucket of the half with two seconds left, the Bison took the momentum into the locker room trailing 39-36.

That momentum continued to propel the Bison early in the second half as Courtney knocked down a three pointer to tie the score. After Herzog converted a three-point play, Mike Bright blocked a Jenkins shot attempt which started the Bison transition game. Bright finished off what he started with a two-fisted stuff. When King followed that play with two more free throws, the Bison took a one point lead at 43-42.

Fordham, however, is a veteran team. All five starters are seniors. They were not flustered by the Bison's momentum, or the frenzied crowd of Bison fans. The Rams stepped up the defensive pressure to help them regain the lead. "They played good solid defense the whole way," said Bucknell's head coach Charlie Woollum. Fordham continued to wear down Bucknell in the paint as well. "The twelve offensive rebounds they had really hurt us," remarked Woollum "but they have talented kids who are tall and quick leapers and can get those rebounds." The Rams were able to re-establish a lead which would waver between four and six points for the majority of the second half.

With five minutes left, down 61-53, the Bison made their final comeback effort. Chris Simpson, in a spectacular play, took a defensive rebound the length of the floor, beat three Fordham defenders on the way, scored a lay-up and drew a foul. Simpson hit the charity shot to cut the lead to five. Patrick King followed that with a three point play of his own to cut the lead to two. Finally, with 2:27 remaining in the game, Bill Courtney went to the line for two shots with the Bison trailing 61-59. He made the first, but the second one squirted out. That would turn out to be a microcosm of the entire second half. The Bison let many opportunities go by the wayside. Missed lay-ups and free throws sealed the Bison's coffin in the end.

After Courtney missed the free throw, the Rams scored the games next five points to build a 66-60 advantage with forty seconds left. Fordham converted two easy buckets from there, and not even a 90 foot hurl from Olkowski could keep them from collecting the championship trophy. The final score was 70-65.

"They're a great basketball team and I wish them all the luck in the NCAA tournament,"said Woollum afterwards. "I'm also very proud of my own team. We won twenty-one ball games this year, and that is quite an accomplishment."

TIP-INS
Patrick King '92 and Bill Courtney '92 were selected to both the First All-League and All-Tournament teams.

Despite the loss in Tuesday's championship game, the Bison enjoyed a successful Patriot League Tournament. The Bison crushed Army in the first round, 74-55. Bright led the Bison with eighteen points and nine rebounds. The Bison also got a huge contribution from Raymond Brown '94, who hit on six of seven shots to score twelve points while replacing the foul-laden Olkowski. "Raymond played a great ball game." said Woollum, who was also pleased with the entire team's performance. "We expected a tough, physical game. I was pleased with our kids because they didn't lose their concentration because of the physical nature of the game."

The Bison would return the next day for a semi-final confrontation with Holy Cross. Holy Cross had the better of the play for most of the first twenty-five minutes of play, but trailing by thirteen points early in the second half, the Bison went to their two seniors. Bill Courtney scored twenty-six points in the game, and King added twenty-three. More importantly, when the Bison faced their largest deficits, either Courtney or King stepped up to make the big play. Courtney converted on pull-up jumpers, driving lay-ups and long range threes. "He [Courtney] is a great player", remarked Holy Cross' Bill Walker, "You let him get going and he can put up points in a hurry." King scored in his normal fashion, getting good shots down low and getting to the line. Olkowski added fifteen points and eleven boards and emerged as a force in the paint in the second half. Holy Cross was led by Walker who poured in a game-high twenty-seven points. Walker's contributions were not enough to get the Cross to the finals as they fell to the Bison, 86-77.

Two Bison were named to the All-Tournament team. Bill Courtney added that honor to his two straight first team All-League selections, and Patrick King will need to make room on the mantle next to the Player of the Year award. Those two were joined on the all-tournament team by Walker from Holy Cross, Dozie Mbonu of Lehigh, and Fred Herzog and Sanford Jenkins of Fordham. Herzog was selected as

Laxmen crush Scranton; face Tigers

DARREN MILLMAN

In a game which was about as lopsided as the Gulf War, and only slightly shorter than the Allied ground offensive, the men's lacrosse team opened up its season with an 11-4 spanking of Scranton last Saturday.

Head coach Sid Jamieson lauded what he called an "outstanding defensive effort." According to Jamieson, close defenseman Jeff Kangas '94 had "his best game yet at Bucknell," taking Scranton's top player out of the game.

Defensive midfielders Mike Conway '92, Greg Brown '92, and Fran Casey '93 combined with Kangas, Gabe Portoundo '93, and Sean Krieg '94 to limit Scranton to only 15 shots the entire game. Those few shots which did manage to leave the sticks of Scranton attackers were deftly snared by Bison goaltender Colin Barker '94. Barker "looked extremely confident" recording 10 saves while relinquishing only a single goal in 45 minutes of play, stated Jamieson. Matt Wojnovich '94 played part of the second half for Bucknell, making what Jamieson called "several excellent saves."

Despite the 11 goals and 49 shots racked up by the offense, Jamieson commented, "As is usually the case, the defense is further along than the offense at this point in the season." Attackman Kevin Roth '92 led all Bison scorers with four goals. Garrett Austin '94 tallied a goal and two assists from his midfield position, while fellow midfielder Justin Zackey '94 added a goal and an assist of his own. Attackmen Todd Streelman '93 had two assists, and Doug De Pietro '93 scored a goal and an assist to round out the Bison who registered multiple points.

Dan Snyder '93, Chris Wyszynski '95, Rick Herrema '93, and Chuck Twoguns '93 each added a goal apiece, while Matt Comyns '92 assisted on a goal to complete the list of Bucknell players contributing to the victorious cause.

Snyder remarked, "I thought we played really well. We came out strong, and were up 10-1 at the half. From there we just cruised till the end of the game."

It is unimaginable to think of the Bucknell football team clashing with a perennial power like the Fighting Irish of Notre Dame. It is equally difficult to envision a regular season schedule which would pit the Breakin' Bison against a nationally-ranked basketball factory like Indiana.

The men's lacrosse team, however, is no stranger to games against the nation's best. Tomorrow, the Bison will take the field at Princeton to challenge a Tiger squad which was ranked third in the nation in the preseason coaches' poll. Last weekend, Princeton allowed the Blue Jays of Johns Hopkins to come back from a four goal deficit to win the game by one. Naturally, the Tigers will be eagerly looking for their first win of the young season

Faculty debates aim of curriculum, philosophy of course distribution

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In an effort to develop a coherent curriculum to help better prepare Bucknell students for our changing world, the General Education Committee has proposed a Common Learning Agenda which expands the current distribution requirements.

The General Education Council (GEC) was established by the Faculty in 1987 to review the curriculum requirements, which had not been changed substantially since 1970. The B.A. degree program "has been widely perceived as having lost the sense of purpose and coherence with which it was instituted in 1970," according to the GEC's proposal.

One of the changes would require all first-year students to take a Foundation Seminar, limited to 15 students per seminar. Elaine Garrett, associate professor of modern language and chair of the GEC, says that "a very high percentage of students take a course that could easily be modified into a Foundation Seminar," such as many of the current Freshman Adviser Seminars and 100-level English courses.

According to Stephen Stamos, professor of international relations and chair of the faculty's Curriculum Committee, "the demand for FAS's has overwhelmed our ability to offer them" in recent years.

Foundation Seminars are to serve as what the proposal calls "a launching point for a student's Bucknell educational experience." Although the Foundation Seminar will impose an additional requirement on students, Teresa Amott, associate professor of economic and a member of the GEC, claims that "these really remain electives" as "there will be a large pool of courses" from which to choose to fulfill this requirement.

Just as the Foundation Seminar will be an introduction to a student's academic career, the proposal also calls for a senior-year Capstone Experience which "provides the formal opportunity for integration and coherence that currently is lacking in many students' course of study." Capstone courses would not necessarily be an additional requirement imposed on students, as one of the courses that they may normally take in their major could be taught as a Capstone Experience.

Capstone courses would be designed to provide synthesis and integration for what students have learned during their time at Bucknell. Students would be able to fulfill the requirement by taking courses within their major, interdisciplin-

BSG advocates multi-cultural requirement

BY JOHN GODBOUT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell Student Government passed a resolution on Sunday, March 15, recommending a multicultural course requirement for all students.

BSG's Public Affairs Committee proposed that the multicultural course requirement take the place of one of the current distribution requirements in either humanities or social sciences.

The proposal was based on the results of a survey sent to students by BSG. The survey asked for students' opinions of such a required course.

Seventy-one percent of the returned surveys agreed that Bucknell should have a program that will "foster an undergraduate education of non-western cultural identities, including subjects dealing with racism, sexism, homophobia, and classism."

The committee felt that the current curriculum requirements provide a limited and homogeneous cultural education. Courses that would provide a more effective education should be required of all students.

The proposal alludes to the Foundations of the Future, which cites a need for a multicultural education.

Sophomore rush brings housing woes to Greeks

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It appears that Greek students are quickly realizing that the time has come to make decisions regarding where they wish to live next year. Unfortunately for many Greeks, this decision may be out of their hands, as restrictions are being imposed on fraternities by specific alumni corporations mandating that the houses be filled, while several sororities have provisions in their by-laws making it necessary to fill their respective suites.

With the advent of sophomore rush at Bucknell, it appears that the Greeks and the Office of Residential Life have vastly different perspectives regarding the appeal of the housing being offered to the students next year. In fact, this differing viewpoint can be adequately summed up by saying that the administration sees the residence halls and fraternities as half full, while the Greeks see them as half empty, and likely to stay that way.

According to Ed Dadez, associate dean of residential life, the seemingly new problems are old news, and the students should have foreseen these problems last year. A letter went out on May 16, 1991 outlining the plans for sophomore rush, he says, adding, "What do I do, have mandatory classes where everybody comes in for roll and I read the letter to them? My God, we're adults."

Dadez added, "I don't think there is a problem [with the fraternities]. In most cases there are enough brothers to fill the houses. It's a question of the brotherhoods making the sacrifices."

Clearly the problems are arising out of a sense of tradition that the Greeks are naturally compelled to cling to, whereby the seniors typically live in apartments. According to Dean Gerry Commerford, this must change. "I have a different attitude towards what a fraternity experience should be than what we have here," he said. "I look at it as a four-year experience. And what happens here is that you're actively involved for two years, and then you distance yourself from it. That's unusual—very unusual."

The distancing that Commerford speaks of comes during the senior year for many Greek members when they opt to live off campus rather than live in their houses or suites. Commerford maintains that those days are over, but that this change will create an atmosphere that will ultimately benefit the Greek organizations, as the older, more experienced members will be in the houses. The problems, he says, are that "whenever you interrupt something, there are going to be people that have stubbed toes."

Unfortunately, the road to sophomore rush has not yet been smoothed over, as the complex problems associated with the fraternity housing may be the least of Commerford's problems. While the sorority suites will undoubtedly be filled by chapter members, the problem of filling the middle section of the building is as yet unresolved. In a letter written by the Panhellenic Council, the group expressed severe reservations about placing sophomores in the same building as sorority members, citing a conflict of interest.

They claim that it would be unreasonable to have those students rushing a sorority living in the same building as the chapter members, whereby an unfair advantage would be afforded to the sophomores. Commerford says he does not care who lives in the building, as long as it is full, and consequently has requested the assistance of Panhel, BSG, and RHA in resolving the issue by next week.

Why are the Greeks so mad, then? As Commerford stated, the sense that tradition is being broken is clearly an issue, though it seems that the real problem is that nobody wants to be the first class to be the subject of the changes. Current juniors that had planned for three years to liberate themselves from the campus during their senior year are now encountering resistance from their Greek alumni councils who are demanding that the house must be filled to a pre-determined capacity. Chapter members that have already signed leases to live downtown are finding this a bit hard to swallow. "I know that there are members of our house that wanted to live off-campus next year, but can't because the house has to be filled. I would have a problem with that," said

Though sensitive to the problems caused by sophomore rush, Ed Dadez, associate dean for residential life, says students were made awareof the new policies as early as last spring.

King takes shot at pros

The dream continues for Patrick King '92. The former junior varsity walk-on, who recently was named men's basketball Patriot League Player of the Year as he led the Breakin' Bison to the conference championship finals, signed a guaranteed two-year contract with TTL Bamberg, a German First Division professional team yesterday afternoon.

"I'm really glad to get this off my chest," said King. "Contract negotiations have been going on for a while, and now I'm looking forward to trying to win a championship over there."

After a teasing taste of Spring, three inches of snow blanketed Bucknell's campus right before Spring Break. Though spring officially began over a week ago, campus temperatures continue to dip into the 20's and 30's, with the threat of snow continuing into the weekend.

nary courses, student teaching, or even perhaps independent research projects, internships, or January Projects.

One faculty member expressed concern that it would be difficult to teach broader, more general courses at a University which also pressures professors to be "scholars" with specialized research; Professor Jeff Turner stated at a faculty forum that "I feel like I'm being spread all over the map."

However, Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs, does not "think that there is a conflict between specialization and multiple perspectives." He went on to say that "the people who are best able to generalize are those who are deeply involved in their own field."

The GEC feels that students need to be exposed to multiple perspectives in order to be able to "choose among competing perspectives, find one they prefer, and be able to say why," according to Garrett. Amott stated that "in an increasingly heterogeneous world, people need to understand that there are different ways of looking at a problem."

The current distribution requirement of four humanities courses, two social sciences courses, and two laboratory sciences would be amended to require a mathematics course or another natural science course. Eugenia Gerdes, GEC member and dean of arts and sciences, said that "for 70% of the students we will not be requiring an additional course because they are already taking a math course."

To meet the demands of the 21st century, a "Broadened Perspectives" requirement would also be imposed, consisting of two courses. The first, "Perspectives on the Natural and Fabricated Worlds," could be a course in either technology in a human context or the natural environment. The "Perspectives on Human Diversity" requirement consists of either an international or cultural diversity course, and could be satisfied by a semester of study abroad.

> "The whole curriculum should move students along a scale of intellectual development."
> —Elaine Garrett
> Chair, GEC

Garrett summed up the main purpose of these Broadened Perspectives requirements, saying that "no one should graduate without knowing something about somebody else." In response to the recent Bucknell Student Government survey which showed that a majority of students are in favor of requiring a multicultural course, she commented that "it can only help" in supporting the GEC proposal.

For the first two years after the initial implementation of this proposal, students will only be required to take one of the two Broadened Perspectives courses to ensure that enough relevant courses will be offered with sufficient faculty to teach them. These two courses could be used to satisfy some of the 4-2-3 Distribution Requirements.

Also, if the proposed January Program is passed, one of the requirements could be satisfied by a relevant Winter Colloquy.

Responding to some faculty concerns about imposing more requirements on students, Jackson Hill, professor of music and associate dean of arts and sciences, said that "what we have done is a modest expansion compared to what has been done to programs" at other colleges and universities.

Stamos asked faculty members for specific examples of how these requirements would affect majors in their departments so that the Curriculum Committee will be better able to evaluate and modify the proposal.

Garrett stated that "the whole curriculum should move students along a scale of intellectual development." The GEC's proposed changes strive to make the curriculum more coherent and thus help students in the process of their academic development.

A major guiding force in the GEC's deliberations has been the Foundations for the Future document, adopted unanimously by the faculty in 1991. This document put forth six Common Learning Objectives to enable Bucknell to achieve its mission, which it claims is "to liberate students to be critical and complex thinkers and original decision-makers who have learned compassion, civility, and a concern for social justice."

According to Professor Garrett, the Common Learning Agenda is the "enactment on a curricular level of that planning document," Foundations for the Future.

The GEC's proposal is currently being discussed in a series of faculty forums to give the faculty "ample opportunity to air out their concerns," according to Stamos.

Student suggestions will be considered, and the GEC is currently in the process of finding out from BSG what processes will be most effective for hearing students' responses to the proposed curricular changes. Although this proposal would not affect any students currently at Bucknell, their reactions will be important to determine how the changes may affect future students.

After hearing faculty and student recommendations, the Curriculum Committee will discuss and modify the proposal before taking it to the faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences for a vote this spring. As Garrett emphasized, "this process is not over yet."

Officers of public safety were dispatched to Gateway Silbermann on the report of a student in need of medical attention. Officers arrived to find victim with severe abdominal pain. A student medical driver was summoned who transported victim to the hospital.

FRIDAY, MARCH 13

Officers were dispatched to Roser Hall for a reported fire alarm activation. Upon arrival, it was observed that unknown individual(s) did activate a pull station for no apparent reason.

Between the hours of 1:10 p.m. on 3/12 and this date at 8:45 a.m., an employee reported that damage had been done to her vehicle while it was parked in the Car Pool lot. A note was found on the damaged vehicle from the driver of the suspect vehicle which was a student at Bucknell. Student at fault was driving a BU van and was in the process of parking it in the lot when the damage occurred.

SATURDAY, MARCH 14

Officer of public safety was asked to meet LPD at Kappa Sig Fraternity on the report of a noise complaint. The president of the fraternity was advised of the complaint (loud music) and the band ceased playing. Incident occurred 1:47 a.m. this date.

While on patrol, it was observed that unknown person(s) did uproot a yew tree from the front of Hunt Hall.

While on patrol, it was noticed that two panes of glass had been broken out of a stairway in Hunt Hall. Two other panes were also found broken at Hunt, apparently by a rock which was found near one of the broken windows.

Student Security, while on patrol, did locate a backpack with contents in the Vaughan Lit building and returned them to the public safety office until claimed by the rightful owner. Property returned to owner.

Student of Trax Hall reported that she has been the victim of harassing phone calls which are being made to her residence room phone. At the time of investigation, it was learned that two other females in Trax also received calls of the same nature.

Officers were dispatched to a student residence hall on the report of a female throwing a concrete block through the windshield of an automobile and causing a disturbance. Public Safety Officers learned from witnesses that said vandalization was part of a series of abusive actions that evening against the owner of the car by a female. The victim will press external charges relative to this incident with the Lewisburg Police Dept.

SUNDAY, MARCH 15

At approximately 1:15 a.m. a disagreement occurred between two students attending a party at the Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity house. Words were exchanged and one of the students chased the other student out of the house. This resulted in a pushing contest between 10-12 students outside the house in which two of the participants were struck in the face. Friends of the persons ejected from the party returned a short time later to the house to investigate. Public Safety and Lewisburg Police calmed the disagreement, dispersed the groups and closed the party. There were no serious injuries sustained.

MONDAY, MARCH 16

A student, who resides in Harris Hall, reported to public safety that he too has been the victim of harassing phone calls which were being made to his residence room phone.

A student notified public safety that he had placed his jacket on a chair at Kappa Sigma Fraternity on 03/13 and when he returned to get it on 03/14, the jacket and contents were missing. On 03/16, student checked his post office box and found his BU ID, MAC card, and birth certificate were returned, apparently by the person who removed his jacket. However, the $20.00 that was in a pocket was not returned.

Upon investigation of harassing phone calls to a student's residence room phone in Trax Hall, it was learned that several other female students also received calls of the same nature.

TUESDAY, MARCH 17

Vandalism to the university's pay loader was reported to the public safety office. Damage consisted of stones in the oil pipe, seats were slashed, numerous wires were cut and the front end rear wires to the lights were out. The approx. $1,000 damage caused by unknown person(s),.

Two students were involved in an altercation at Davis Gym during a basketball game when the one sustained an injury to the eye as a result from a punch. The injured student was transported to the Evangelical Hospital Emergency for treatment. The alleged suspect did submit a written statement admitting striking the victim.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18

Officers responded to Gateway Kalman-Posner on the report of a fire alarm activation. It was discovered that someone intentionally set a piece of paper directly under the activated smoke detector and lit it creating enough smoke to activate the system.

A student reported that while he was in his room in Harris Hall, unknown person(s) did throw an object at his residence room window breaking it. A piece of a bottle was found within the room. Incident occurred 1:45 a.m. this date.

A Bucknell male student became verbally abusive towards a public safety officer while officer was engaged in issuing the student a parking citation.

A computer center employee reported that unknown individual(s) removed a piece of equipment from the IBM lab in the basement of Rooke Chemistry. The property of Bucknell was removed sometime between 03/16 and 03/17/92..

External review provides impetus for increased student decision-making

Task forces to explore philosophy of judicial system, programming, and alcohol policy

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN AND CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Within the next few years, students may have a more significant impact in three major aspects of the University, when the plans of Barbara Shailor, acting vice president for student services are realized.

Shailor, along with President Gary Sojka, appointed an external review committee to analyze the status of student life at Bucknell. That report, submitted in January, has been the impetus for change; task forces, appointed by Shailor in response to the review, are addressing these key concerns: the philosophy of the judicial review system, the University's wide use of programming, and the alcohol policy. Intertwined within all of these issues is an increased push for student involvement in decision-making.

While the issues involved with these three task forces appear repeatedly in the pages of the external review, the report stresses a number of larger, yet detailed, problems within the division of student services. The four members of the review committee included in their report seven major themes and observations, several of which noted a tension between the University and its students.

"The messages sent in the Handbook and residential life materials are clear: students are not trusted," the report reads. It later states: "It is as though students are not thought to be capable of managing their own individual and collective lives, or of making life's little decisions."

The group's sense of University apathy is explicit in the their third obsevation: "Bucknell does not appear to expect much of its students, nor do students seem to ask much of each other."

Shailor sees the task forces as addressing this problem by giving the students a greater voice in the evolution of the new guidelines and philosophies of the student life department. Students serve on each of the three task forces.

One area of the report not reflected in any of the task forces is that "many on the Student Life staff are unnecessarily gun-shy." By this, the committee refers to a tension between the Student Life staff and the rest of the University—students, administration, and faculty. In its conclusion, the report suggests several methods for improving these relations, many of which point towards a need of the Student Life staff to feel appreciated by the University.

> "It is as though students are not thought to be capable of managing their own individual and collective lives, or of making life's little decisions."

The four members of the committee spent two days on campus and interviewed 11 administrators, 31 student affairs professionals, 21 faculty, and 15 students. In January, they submitted a report which was divided into four general sections: general impressions of Bucknell, major themes and observations, expectations of student affairs, and recommendations.

Though critical of certain facets of the University, the external review board was, in part, impressed with Bucknell. It specifically stated Bucknell is a "quality institution" that "attracts the two most important ingredients of a good academic institution: a strong and dedicated faculty and firstclass student body."

In addition to the external review, Student Services is taking into consideration a document by the University Council submitted in April, 1991. "The Foundations for the Future: A Strategic Plan for Bucknell" provides guidelines for Bucknell education in the 1990s. It outlines Bucknell's mission through the 1990s as an educational institution, and states that "Bucknell's mission is to liberate students to be critical and complex thinkers and original decision-makers who have learned compassion, civility, and a concern for social justice."

The main crux of the "Foundations" document is to outline six common learning objectives that will achieve this educational mission. They are:

1. Integrating compartmentalized disciplinary knowledge and multiple perspectives.
2. Understanding our natural and fabricated worlds.

3. Developing international and multicultural perspectives.

4. Fostering creativity, personal reflectiveness, and moral discernment.

5. Nurturing independent and collaborative learning.

6. Creating a holistic, supportive community of mutual respect.

Members of each of the task forces cited the objectives as the best possible guidelines which a division of student services can follow. The goal of the task forces is not to improve these objectives, but to examine the philosophy behind the system and to decide the best method for achieving these objectives.

PROGRAMMING COMMITTEE

Gordon Meyer, assistant professor of management and chair of the Philosophical Review for Programming, said that his committee's "primary objective is to articulate a set of grand objectives of programming that the division of Student Services ought to have."

One of the most pressing problems the committee faces is incorporating an effective, centralized calendar system that would eliminate the problem of competing events. This system would encourage entire campus community involvement and more collaboration between groups on campus that would otherwise have nothing in common.

Whatever system is ultimately implemented into the programming curriculum, Meyer believes that listening to students is crucial: "The committee encourages more student-run and student-initiated programs rather than having them run by the professional staff [faculty and administration] who may not be in touch with what students want, need, or are inclined to get involved in."

He warns against exclusively student-run programming, however, and would rather see faculty and students working together. "We need to think of ourselves as a community with multiple interests that some will overlap and some won't," Meyer says.

"Student development is not only concerned with minds in a classroom but it should also be concerned with the student being a member of a community and having compassion for others," he said.

ALCOHOL POLICY

The task force that will review the current alcohol policy is co-chaired by Gerry Commerford of Residential Life and Mark Abrahamsen '93. They have been assigned the responsibility of reviewing the problems that have become apparent within the enforcement procedures and sanctions of the current alcohol policy.

The task force is currently discussing a "wrist-band proposal" with Peter Brady '93, president of the Inter-Fraternity Council (IFC). Although conclusions concerning the alcohol policy have yet to be drawn, Commerford is certain that "the recommendations the committee makes will be in the best interest of the community."

Commerford thinks that "some changes" will be made, but warns that the University is limited in its capabilities to change the enforcement policy because of state law.

JUDICIAL REVIEW BOARD

A primary recommendation of the external review board was for the University to "scrap the present judicial system" and "begin crafting a new one."

John Dunlop, dean of students, and Jack Pyper, associate dean of arts and sciences, co-chair the task force in charge of reviewing the philosophy of the current judicial system. Their committee has discussed the principles behind an ideal judicial system.

One aspect of a judicial system that the committee feels may be beneficial is a "decentralized" or "multi-centered" approach. A decentralized system would be advantageous to the campus community, according to Dean Pyper, in that "it would have more of the campus involved, but all the jurisdictions would be 'in tune' [coordinated] in their punishments or actions they're taking."

The committee seems likely to advocate a high ratio of students to professional staff in the new judicial system. Based on personal experience, Pyper believes that the students would work well with the professional staff. "Students and faculty are rarely on opposite sides of the case," he says. "If anything, students tend to be tougher on their peers than the faculty and administration."

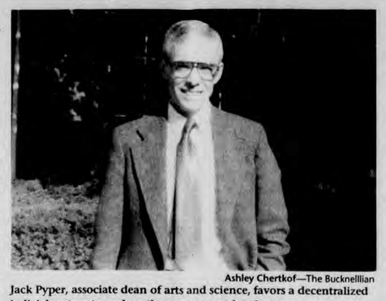
The committee also hopes to look to the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) for its input. Mike Thomas '94, BSG president, believes that education is the one crucial element that is missing in the present judicial system. "A student needs to be educated about the violation he has committed," Thomas insists, "and not just forced to pay a fine."

Pyper agrees. "The committee is not in favor of fines," he says, "and feels that community service and other methods would be better. We're trying to have sanctions 'fit' the situation by relating the crime with the punishment through an educational process."

The external review committee criticized the current judicial system for its lack of direction. But according to Dunlop, though in the 22 years in which the University has operated under the present system, some unwritten guidelines have been followed.

Rather than start completely from scratch, the committee has "identified principles and practices that are inherent in our current system," said Dunlop.

By the end of the semester, the task force hopes to establish a new philosophy for judicial review. Once this philosophy has been determined, another task force will investigate the appropriate type of judicial system for the University.



Ashley Chertkof—The Bucknellian

Jack Pyper, associate dean of arts and science, favors a decentralized judicial system to replace the current, outdated one.

Living with AIDS

After his older sister introduced him, Henry Nicols, a 19 year old AIDS patient, emerged from the unsuspecting audience to take the stage before a large Weis Center crowd on March 17.

Having made the point that one cannot tell that a person has AIDS by looking at him or her, he went on to dispel many myths surrounding the disease.

Nicols, a hemophiliac, contracted the HIV virus from a blood transfusion. Once it was discovered that he was HIV positive, his family told no one for six years for fear of others' reactions.

Since going public, Nicols and his sister have spoke at campuses around the country.

New major program declared

The Office of the Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences announced a new interdepartmental major for a Bachelor of Arts degree, in an effort to serve students who seek to concentrate in areas which transcend departmental limits.

The new major requires no less than eight, but no more than twelve, required courses from relevant departments, which will culminate in a required senior project for which credit may be earned.

Students should consult with a faculty member in the department that offers the greatest number of courses relevant to the proposed topic.

Local forum confers on future

The Forum for the Future, a group of 13 area organizations, institutions and businesses, sponsored a conference "Shaping the Future II: Education and Community Involvement" on March 27.

The conference questioned education's relationship to the changing society, its impact on the economy, and how these topics affect Central Pennsylvania.

The keynote address was presented by Robert Miller, 1991 Pennsylvania School Boards Association president and retired manager of construction projects and operations for Westinghouse.

Group sponsors essay contest

An essay contest on the meaning of feminism is being sponsored by Women Organized Now! Interested members of the University community are asked to address the topic: "What does feminism mean to you?"

The author of the winning entry will win a $25 prize and have his or her entry published in an upcoming issue of Tapestry. Entries should be typewritten and double-spaced, and must be submitted by April 20 to: Women Organized Now!, Box C-1495.

Course drop dealine nears

Following the passage of a new drop/add policy by the faculty, students may, in any two of their eight semesters, drop one course before the end of the ninth week of classes.

This is an extension of the policy previsouly restricted to first semester freshmen.

The deadline for late course drops this semester is Monday, April 13. Questions concerning this policy can be directed to the associate academic deans.

Whistle blown on cafe name

The Hog Rock Cafe, a cafe in the Northwest Arkansas Mall, must change its name to Tony C's Cafe, in order to avoid possible trademark violations threatened by lawyers for the Hard Rock Cafe of New York.

Cafe owner Tony Catroppa said that he designed the logo of the Hog Rock Cafe not to infringe on the registered trademark of the University of Arkansas, whose lawyers reported the name to lawyers for the Hard Rock Cafe. Catroppa believes he could win the case if it went to court, but did not want to spend the time and money to do so.

"It was a catchy name. I don't believe we hurt anybody," said Catroppa.

Convictions cost students' aid

Applicants to Southwest Missouri State University who are convicted of drug offenses may be ineligible for financial aid for a period of anywhere from one year to permanently.

The Department of Education recently began using a computer matching system to screen federal financial aid applicants, in an effort to enforce the Drug Abuse Act of 1988.

Denial of federal aid is at the discretion of the state or federal judge trying the drug case. If the judge decides, the offender's name is placed in the Justice Department's database.

Lehigh debates pill policy

Controversy has erupted at Lehigh over the University Health Center's policy of distributing the "morning-after" pill, which many see as a safe solution to an unwanted pregnancy, at no cost to students.

Lehigh students said very few students were aware of the availability of the pill, and only the recent publicity of the policy in local and campus newspapers has brought the issue to the public.

Some students are offended by the fact that tuition dollars are funding this policy, but the director of the Health Center claims that it is not an unusual policy, that many schools provide the same service.

PA students help taxpayers

About 30 accounting students from three Penn. colleges are helping taxpayers prepare their income tax returns in the weeks before the Internal Revenue Service's deadline.

The students are each volunteering four hours a week at the tax office in the Rauch Business Center at Lehigh. There is no charge for the service and students earn no credit for participation.

The office will stay open through April 14 on Tuesdays and Saturdays. Students say it is good review for the CPA exam.

Security officer shoots student

University of Toledo police found the body of a nineteen year-old nursing student face down in the snow, shot fourteen times. Five days later a security officer was arrested for the murder.

Since the arrest, police say there have been other crimes that they are suspecting the officer with committing, such as death threats over the phone to female students, nine arsons, two bomb threats, and a Jan. shooting spree.

Most states require basic police training for all officers of state, city, federal, and campus departments, but many private schools are not bound to the same guidelines.

A visitor on campus from Penn State reported to public safety, that while her vehicle, a Penn State fleet vehicle, was parked in the 7th St. lot, unknown person(s) did cause damage to the vehicle. Incident occurred sometime between 12:00 p.m. and 2:30 p.m. this date. However, the visitor is not positive the damage happened at Bucknell as it is possible it could have occurred at Penn State.

Two acts of vandalism occurred by unknown individuals in Larison Hall were reported to public safety. A large hole in the hall of the lst fl. TV lounge was found and a snowball was thrown through a student's residence room window.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19

A resident of Roberts Hall had sprayed the detector with a water pistol activating the fire alarm. Student to pay for replacement of detector.

FRIDAY, MARCH 20

University charges are pending against a university fraternity for an alcohol violation which occurred on this date.

Officers responded to Kappa Sig Fraternity on the report of a fire alarm alarm in activation. It was discovered that unknown person(s) activated a pull station for no apparent reason.

The fire alarm system was activated for Larison Hall. Officers responded to learn that the alarm activation was caused by a snowball which had been thrown and struck the fire detector activating the system. This occurred at 12:45 p.m.. At approx. 5:22 p.m., a student, a resident of BU Cottage, called and reported he is the individual who struck the detector with the snowball. He stated it was an accident as he was trying to hit a friend with the snowball and his aim apparently was off, striking the detector. Student to pay for damages.

SATURDAY, MARCH 21

A small grease fire in an oven at one of the mods was the reason for the fire alarm activation on this date. The resident of the Mod did extinguish the fire with an extinguisher located at that location.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22

A student reported that his mod had been broken into while he was gone from 10:00 p.m.-10:58 p.m. this date. Two broken windows and a damaged door frame were noticed. A CD and a six pack of beer were the only two items missing.

MONDAY, MARCH 23

A bicycle was found by a student security supervisor and returned to the public safety office until its rightful owner can make claim for it. Bike was found in the snow between Mod 19 and the dumpster.

Unknown person(s) wrote obscene words on the front sidewalk area at Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity.

Debate over evolution/creation rekindles questions of origin

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Over one thousand people packed the Weis Center Wednesday, March 18 to examine the question which has plagued human minds for millenia: "What is the origin of man and the universe?"

The debate between evolution and creation spoke to the hypothesis, "The theory of evolution is superior to the theory of special creation as an explanation for the scientific evidence related to origins."

Giving the affirmative presentation was Michael D. West, Ph. D., Senior Research Scientist at the University of Texas Southwestern Medical Center, who began with an appeal to "fact," accusing creationist authors and speakers, including his opponent, of misquoting and quoting out of context in order to weaken the theory of evolution.

West pointed to geologic evidence and fossil remains to dismiss the chronological sequence of biological development put forth by proponents of special creation, and noted that evolutionary theories actually began among "Christian men." Giving a rough picture of molecular development, West asserted that mutation and evolutionary progression were not only theoretically logical but that the principles were displayed in molecules.

Countering West's presentation was Duane T. Gish, Ph. D., vice president of the Institute for Creation Research, San Diego, California. Speaking to a largely Christian audience, Gish immediately pointed to infighting and discrepancies amongst evolutionary scientists, asking why, if evolution is true, such diverse and conflicting theories existed within the evolutionary school. Examining protein molecules, applying the second law of thermodynamics, and pointing to large gaps in fossil evidence, Gish sought to disprove evolution by noting that no intermediate fossil evidence exists to prove the progression from one life form to the next.

Both speakers, in their presentations and rebuttals, exposed large gaps and revealed the indefinite character of both theories of origin. Neither position could be scientifically proven, and perhaps the most telling truth coming out of the debate was that evolution requires just as much "faith" as special creation.

Jim Nowland '93, a member of Delta Upsilon.

As for the idea that the seniors living in the house makes the fraternity stronger, Nowland said, "I'm not going to say that's false, but it's definitely not necessary."

> "... we're not happy with the situation. It is more unfair to the houses that don't have as many members or options."
> —Dan Hauck '94
> President, Tau Kappa Epsilon

Dan Hauck '94, President of Tau Kappa Epsilon, is equally critical of the new system, saying, "Although our house has no real right to complain, we're not happy with the situation. It is more unfair to the houses that don't have as many members or options."

Hauck also objected to the idea that seniors living out of the house hurts the brotherhood. "In our case, the senior apartments are as big a part of the fraternity as the house itself. Because of sophomore rush, we're losing an important part of our house and part of our appeal, too."

Clearly the Greeks are finding that sophomore rush is creating more problems than solutions, as the individuals within the groups are making very difficult sacrifices for what can be termed 'the good of the chapter'.

While Commerford and Dadez believe that a chapter not willing to make these sacrifices should reconsider what it stands for, many Greeks are wondering if this is the same Greek system in which they decided to become a member.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

WHY YOU SHOULD START PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT WITH YOUR EYES CLOSED.

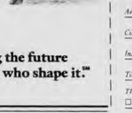
For retirement to be the time of your life, you have to dream a little—about the things you've always wanted to do: travel, explore, start a business. Just imagine...

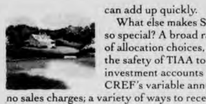
With a dream and a plan, you can make it happen. Your pension and Social Security should provide a good basic retirement income, but what about all those extras that make your dreams possible? You'll probably need some additional savings.

THE DREAM IS YOUR OWN. WE CAN HELP YOU WITH THE PLAN.

TIAA-CREF Supplemental Retirement Annuities (SRAs), tax-deferred annuities for people like you in education and research, are a good way to save for retirement and save on taxes now. SRAs are easy—you make contributions through your institution before your taxes are calculated, so you pay less tax now.

You pay no tax on your SRA contributions and earnings until you receive them as income. And saving regularly means your contributions and their earnings can add up quickly.





What else makes SRAs so special? A broad range of allocation choices, from the safety of TIAA to the investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity; no sales charges; a variety of ways to receive income, including annuities, payments over a fixed period, or cash. You may also be able to borrow against your SRA accumulation before you retire.*

All this, plus the top investment management that has helped make TIAA-CREF the largest retirement system in the country.

So start dreaming and planning for the time of your life. Because the sooner you start your SRA, the greater your savings and your retirement will be.

The Packwood House exhibits Americana charm

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you've been trying to think of something to do with your parents when they visit you during parent's weekend, stop right here. The Packwood House Museum in Lewisburg is the perfect place to spend a Saturday.

This unobtrusive building, located on Market Street, was originally a log-house tavern built in 1796. It served different functions over the years, such as a weaving shop and a store, but its most memorable use was as the American House Hotel from 1848-1887. Because of its proximity to the Susquehanna River, the hotel catered mostly to river traders, however business declined with the advent of the railroad, and the hotel closed. In 1891, George Kelly bought the property, by now a three-story wooden structure, and divided it into three townhouses. His daughter, Edith Hedges Featherstone and her husband John, renovated the building early this century, and made it their home. After her death in 1972, the Featherstone Foundation and Packwood Trust were created in order to transform the home into a museum.

"Edith graduated from Bucknell University in 1905," commented museum administrator Ricki Walter. "She was an artist as well as an antique collector, and decided that she wanted a place where her work, as well as all of her collected pieces, could be displayed. So in 1976 the Packwood House Museum came into existence."

The museum has 27 rooms which are decorated with Edith Featherstone's art, antique furniture and accessories, and glassware. "Ninety-five percent of what you see here belonged to Edith, and the rest are gifts to the museum," informed Walter. "She had a prodigious collection, but she didn't collect pieces from any one specific time period. The collection varies according to her tastes." And so it does. Upon entering the house, one sees a Bucknell L'Agenda from 1952 sitting on a table, along with iron chairs emblazened with roosters—Edith's favorite pet. An ancient Lewisburg fire hat hangs in the same room which houses a collection of fine European china. Walter adds, "Edith also hadn't set up any period rooms, but she had many items from the 1930's so we set up the kitchen according to what one would have looked like during that time." A notable local commodity, Pennsylvania Redware, is also featured in the museum. "While digging in the garden Edith found a redware dish that had belonged to one of the regular patrons of the tavern. She was so excited that it was in good condition she decided to expand her redware collection," Walter said.

Elizabeth Danneberg—The Bucknellian

Pictured above is the Empire bedroom, of 19th century design, with wooden floors and ceiling rafters to authenticate the look. The room is arranged as it would have appeared in the building's hotel days.

In addition to the house itself, there is a Chinese garden, designed by Edith herself. "It's very low maintenance, which is exactly what Edith wanted," remarked Walter. "Every September we hold a garden walk and a high tea outside." The Packwood House Museum also runs a small gift shop next door with quite unique items. "We carry a lot of Lewisburg gifts," she comments. "Visitors to Lewisburg seem to be fascinated with the street lamps and so we have leaded glass suncatchers, silver pins and tie tacks and also some stationery with the street-lamp emblem on them."

The Packwood House features exhibits on a regular basis. The next exhibits, Indoor Art and Scholastic Art, will be held from April 25th through May 8th and 10th. "When you think of a museum you will sometimes think of a dark and dusty, pretty boring place. The Packwood Museum is not that at all." Walter smiles, "We run children's art exhibits, quilting and geneology workshops, and we're planning an excursion to the Brooklyn Botanical Gardens."

And, like many old buildings, the Packwood House has its share of ghost stories. Some more recent than others. As Ricki Walter was leading me through the first floor, and explaing how Edith had sleigh bells located all over the house, which she used to jingle in order to keep away spirits, she related this story: "Last Saturday a woman was touring the third floor rooms, when she said that she could hear a man's voice speaking in the attic above. "No one else could hear the voice, but the woman insisted that she could hear him speaking. His name was Karl, and he had died an untimely death of some sort. We asked one of the tour guides who had known Edith very well if he knew anything about it. It turns out that he remembers Edith saying that a man had died in one of the upstairs rooms. Now we're checking it out to see what really happened and who died up there a long time ago."

According to Walter, most visitors to the Packwood House Museum are from the Lewisburg area. "We are busiest from about the beginning of April to the beginning of September," she notes. "We also hold an annual Christmas arts festival for about 1500 children from the Lewisburg area." Admission to the Packwood House is $4 for adults and $1.75 for students. The museum is open Tuesday through Friday 10-5 p.m., Saturday 1-5 p.m., and Sunday 2-5 p.m.

The Collegiate Perspective (and other fairy tales)

In the tradition of the "theme" columns that have appeared here in recent weeks, leading candidates for this edition's subject were the 1992 presidential race, the pros and cons of increasing our economic aid to Russia, and cleaner alternative energy sources. With this in mind, therefore, the question to be asked became, "What issue would provide the readership with the most intellectually stimulating diversion?" Here, this writer was faced with his weekly dilemma.

Ah, no I wasn't. Man, I can't lie for beans.

•A recent change in the nature of many soda vending machines on campus involves them taking dollar bills to facilitate purchases. With this innovation in mind, why don't we see dormitory washing machines that take singles, so that we could forever end the miserable college tradition of having to scrounge for quarters? Come to think of it, maybe machines that take credit cards would be more appropriate at this point in time.

•Why don't you ever see people drooling on the desk when they fall asleep in class, like that scene in Ferris Bueller's Day Off? I'm beginning to suspect that this concept is just another Hollywood myth.

•Wal-Mart mania. Why here? Why now?

•What's the deal when you're about to fall asleep at night, and your whole body suddenly spasms, thus leaving you completely wide awake? What's that all about?

•As my sixth grade teacher once said to me, "There is no such thing as a dumb question." As my life wore on, however, I found that there are, however, dumb people asking questions.

•Why are the products in the bookstore's toiletries section called "notions"? Please, someone write in, here.

•Don't you hate it when you're watching a comedian at the Bison, and the person you're with insists on looking at you after every joke to see if you thought it was funny? I suppose that I shouldn't be so touchy, but... STOP THAT!

•Why are all chalk slates called "blackboards" when some of them are in actuality green? I suppose I should be surprised that the PC movement hasn't noticed this glaring inconsistency yet.

•Looking back at the difficulties that I had getting good seats at the men's home basketball games toward the end of the season, I admit to wondering what the big deal was. I arrived there for the Lafayette game at 7:15 for a 7:30 tip-off, and I had a great view! Of course, I got there on a Thursday, but...

•What are the Gateways a gateway to?

•Just once during a review session for an upcoming exam, when one of my professors says something like, "I've got the test right here in front of me," I'd just love to hear him or her conclude this statement with, "and I'm gonna show it to all of you right now!!!" Either that, I guess, or see the whole class bum-rush the instructor and take the exam by force. Six one way, half a dozen the other, I suppose.

Next column: We dive headfirst into the enigma known as Japan, if my foreign correspondent from Bowdoin College gets his rear in gear.

The Farmer's Market—a Lewisburg tradition

A plethora of food possibilities await you each Wednesday at the Farmer's Market, where the locals meet to sell their freshest goods

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Cancel all Wednesday afternoon classes! We're all going to the Auction.

For decades, the Farmer's Market (called the Auction back in the days when the food was put on the bidding table) has been a Lewisburg tradition. Even today, town businesses are inspired to close early on Wednesday afternoons to afford employees the chance to sample Amish pastries, fresh fruit and vegetables grown by local farmers, and the best meat and seafood that Central Pennsylvania has to offer.

Does a trip out Route 45 West to Fairground Road sound tempting? The hours of eating and browsing enjoyment are well worth the five-minute trip, for farmers and bakers travel up to two hours to bring their homemade provolone cheeses, shoofly pies, dandelion salad, tripe intestines, and gnocchi to the Farmers' Market.

One Amish woman, from the farming community of Montgomery, bakes (in only two days and with only the help of her daughter!) over 50 pies, dozens of apple dumplings dripping in a cinnamon sauce, hundreds of cookies, and trayfuls of whoopie pies, which are pieces of chocolate cake stuck together with a creamy filling. She has been selling her delicious goodies for ten years with the assistance of her adolescent son and daughter. Sometimes her little ones, in full traditional Amish outfit, tag along to give customers the best taste of Amish life in the area.

In another booth nearby, a group of Mennonite women have painted the walls blue and white and dress as "Auntie Anne."

Auntie Anne's homemade pretzels, flavored with garlic, sugar and cinnamon, or sour cream and onion, or made out of whole wheat make you wish that these women were your relatives.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

A little Amish girl looks on as her older brother attends to shoofly pie customers. This Amish family has been travelling from Montgomery County for ten years to cater to the Lewisburg area.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

When the weather warms, farmers bring their fresh produce and flower stands outside.

The tantalizing cheese display pictured above is run by an Amish couple who wished not to pose for the picture.

If it's a "real meal" that you are looking for, hunger no longer in the dining hall or on Market Street. The Jasmine Tea Garden booth offers a pleasant diversion from the two varieties of Chinese food that Lewisburg has to offer. Fresh seafood salad and all catches of fish, crab, and shrimp can be wrapped and taken home to feast upon at the seafood store from Williamsport. The homemade, truly Italian ravioli, lasagna, eggplant parmigiana, red clam sauce, linguini, and tortellini at the market will make you forget that a trip to Little Italy is three hours away in any direction. The food is packaged in containers for one or a whole house or hall. If it's a meat delicacy that you're hungering for, think about taking home some tongue souse or frog legs. Smoked turkey, country ham, pork loin, country bacon, country spare ribs, and prime rib is also available.

Other weekly vendors include a colored chocolate stand which sells chocolate to melt and mold into your own shaped candy, a discontinued book depot which sells titles as recent as Katherine Hepburn's Me at discount prices, and a booth filled with such rarities as velvet Elvis pictures and fringed lamps.

When the weather turns warm, many farmers move their produce outside. Baskets of Macintosh, Grannysmith, Rome, and Red Delicious apples, as well as the cider squeezed from them, line the perimeter of the indoor market. Fresh grapefruit, strawberries, oranges, kiwi, potatoes, asparagus, green beans, and mushrooms can also be bought. Naomi Haupt has been bringing Haupt's fresh vegetables and eggs to the market from her family's 163-acre farm on "the other side of Sunbury" for 25 years. Soon her son, Wilford, will be taking over the family farm and continuing to provide the Lewisburg marketers and the patrons of the Shamokin and Sunbury curbside markets with fresh, Pennsylvanian-grown produce.

If you'd like to a part of the Bucknell tradition of buying Wednesday night dinner from the locals, stop by Fairground Road on any Wednesday between 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. The locals are friendly, and the food is good.

Alpha Phi Omega is running a shuttle from the LC to the Farmers' Market at 11 a.m. and 12 noon, every Wednesday until classes end. Call Danielle Lucas at 523-5455 for more details.

BU senior battles for women's rights

Feminist, gay, and peace issues are not just a passing interest for Kathy Mendelsohn '92

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"The personal is political," said Kathy Mendelsohn '92, borrowing a quote from her feminist hero, Robin Morgan. Mendelsohn's overwhelming involvement in organizations ranging from Feminist Outreach to Friends of Lesbians and Gays certainly supports her motto.

Mendelsohn participates in numerous organizations, on and off campus, dealing with the issues of peace, and women's and homosexual's rights. She cites a desperate need to address these issues because, "They are the most important issues facing me and the world today."

The Peace Studies course Mendelsohn helped design is merely one rung on her ladder towards the ideal feminist haven. The course is an attempt to present an integrated study of the political, as well as personal, aspects of peace. It stresses grass-roots organizing, working from the bottom up in dealing with the promotion of peace, rather than working with globally oriented programs.

As co-chair of the Women's Leadership Conference scheduled to take place this weekend, Mendelsohn helped coordinate workshops and find speakers for the conference. "Unfortunately," she noted, "the conference conflicts with the March on D.C. for abortion rights that NOW (National Organization of Women) is sponsoring. CNN expected over one million people at the march."

Despite a tremendous extracurricular schedule, Mendelsohn manages to remain focused on her feminist goals. "It's not easy," she said, "The one factor that helps is being able to see the connections with everything I do. I don't have to compartmentalize my time because everything I do is intertwined and related."

Though her goals, fighting inequality and sexual harassment, are well-defined, Mendelsohn sees no definite end to her battle. She noted, "It [feminist activity] is definitely an on-going process. There is no end. There won't be a time when we can say, 'O.K., we're done.'"

Though Mendelsohn plans to attend the Medical College of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia after graduation, she insists that her work in the feminist field will not cease. "I'm never done!" she exclaimed, "I'll work with the Women's Medical Organization and find outside volunteer programs. I have to find some outlet!" Mendelsohn also noted that the medical school was originally an all women's institution, and the availability of organizations will not be limited.

As for the Bucknell attitude about women's issues, Mendelsohn has seen a noticeable improvement in her four years here. She commented that on several occasions the positive atmosphere was questionable, but on the whole, Bucknell has shown a great deal of progress. "Bucknellians are moving outside of the bubble," she added, "but I would like to see much more communication between Bucknell students and the surrounding communities."

Despite her goals and aspirations, Mendelsohn found that the people involved in promoting the feminist cause were the key to ultimate success. "In the end, it is the connection with passionate, committed people. If more people connect, our goals will continue to be accomplished," Mendelsohn concluded.

Daytona meets Campus Crusaders

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Imagine you're on Daytona Beach having a blast during your spring break. Not so tough, right? Now imagine someone comes up to you and wants to talk about God.

Yes, God.

What would you do? Would you listen for a minute, just to be polite? Would you completely ignore him or her? Or would you listen because you were truly interested in what he or she had to say?

For most people, God and "doing the right thing" were the farthest things from their minds as they journeyed southward for the annual spring break festivities. But for a certain group of Bucknell students, "doing the right thing" was the reason they ventured south.

Chris Ballard '93, Kelly Cusick '93, Rob George '92 Anne-Marie Nielsen '94, Chris Ranney '94 and Chris Whelan '95 formed this group which devoted their Spring Breaks to "Operation Sonshine," a faction of the international religious organization Campus Crusade for Christ. They ventured to Daytona Beach, Florida to meet with 800 other dedicated members of Campus Crusade from institutions across the country to spread their faith in God.

It sounds pretty tough to walk up to someone (on spring break nonetheless!) and just start talking about your faith in Jesus Christ, doesn't it? Well, they thought so too. But they were taught (through the group) that "confrontation breeds confidence like nothing ever will." That was true, as many Campus Crusaders discovered, since "just walking up to someone and talking about God" generally got easier as the week wore on.

The Bucknell students attended an organized Campus Crusade conference which included instruction and application meetings twice daily. Outings were planned for afternoons and evenings. Armed with their faith and little gold booklets entitled "Have You Heard of the Four Spiritual Laws?," pairs of Crusaders approached partiers on the beach and on the strip at night.

Sophomore Anne-Marie Nielsen estimates that well over 3,000 Spring Breakers were approached that week and shared a bit of the Gospel with the Campus Crusaders. But the impact was felt not only by the "approachees" but also by the "approachers." "This past week," Nielsen said, "made me realize how important it is to share my faith."

So next time you're hangin' out on the beach and someone randomly approaches you to talk about God, either give them a chance—or pretend to be in deep sleep. Who knows—you just may learn something...even if it is spring break!

More required courses miss the point

WHILE ALL OF US—STUDENTS, FACULTY, AND administrators—go about our daily routines, there is usually little concern given to why those routines are as they are. The University should be commended for now addressing these philosophical concerns on a large scale with both the Student Services review and the General Education proposal.

The latter, A Common Learning Agenda for the College of Arts & Sciences, is especially important, for nothing is more central than the institution's philosophy of learning. Addressing such questions, Arts & Sciences Dean Eugenia Gerdes has said students have a fundamental need "to view humanity and the world from the perspective of many disciplines and to apply the perspective of one discipline to another." It is puzzling, then, that the committee would choose to accomplish this goal by increasing the number of required courses.

The addition of another "natural science" requirement seems to further compartmentalize learning, rather than lead to interdisciplinary approaches. The intent seems to be to have all students take one math course, but 70 percent already do so; the remaining thirty should be presumed to have good reasons for their choices.

The proposal for required courses in "perspectives on natural and fabricated worlds" and "perspectives on human diversity" address important problems, but attempt to do so in a quick-fix manner which appeals to current fads in education. Students should become attuned to issues of diversity and interaction with the environment, but such concerns should be incorporated within all learning.

Required courses simply are not taken seriously by most students; they become boxes to check off on a form, and many students try to find the easiest way to fulfil their distributional requirements. Before implementing new courses, all of the present courses should be critically examined, and restructured if necessary, so that they meet the broad objectives of the General Education Committee's plan. All students must be able to communicate effectively the knowledge they acquire in their major field of study; currently many do not. The general failure of the writing program shows that layering new requirements on top of old courses does not work. Faculty themselves must be educated about the issues involved, and they should be carefully guided in revising their courses to incorporate a more interdisciplinary approach. Specialized knowledge alone is not enough for students—they must be able to place this information into a broader perspective.

MANY STUDENTS ARE ATTRACTED TO BUCKNELL because of its low number of required courses, allowing students the freedom to construct a schedule which meets their needs and interests. Indeed, this positive feature is always mentioned to prospective students who tour the campus. Adding requirements assumes that students are not mature enough to decide, in conjunction with their advisors, which courses are best for them.

Concern about the larger world and critical reasoning ability are both vital, and students must leave Bucknell with these skills. However, adding requirements will serve to separate such learning from the other "real" courses students will take.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Artist wanted to open eyes about AIDS

TO THE EDITOR:

The reason I decided, after being asked, to take my performance "You Gotta Take Precautions" to the Refectory during lunch on Thursday was to reach those who had not heard my message Wednesday night (March 18). Those attending the evening performance were already among the converted, the knowledgeable, and my information was not really new; although the manner in which I presented it may have been novel.

AIDS among heterosexuals are the fastest rising group almost doubling each year—because many heterosexuals do not see themselves at risk (i.e. not doing IV drugs or engaging in gay sex). Currently, 200,000 people are thought to be infected with the HIV virus and the World Health Organization predicts 30 million people will be HIV positive by the year 2000. Many people do not know they are HIV positive as they do not believe themselves to be at risk, so they don't get tested. They appear perfectly healthy and continue to spread the virus when they don't use a condom in a sexual relationship.

All of these facts and figures scare me. I want to do what I can to increase awareness about AIDS—about how you can and cannot be infected and what you can do to protect yourself. This is why I do artwork—both static and performance—about AIDS. I went into the Refectory on Thursday to raise awareness. The reaction I aroused in the lunchtime gathering was really more interesting than what I had to say. People tended to ignore me and instead concentrated on their food and didn't look up. Maybe they thought if they ignored me I might go away, and by ignoring me they didn't have to deal with me. Do you see a correlation between this behavior and how some people try to ignore the AIDS epidemic, believing it just isn't going to personally affect them? Once I announced myself and my intentions, people stopped talking and listened to me until I mentioned the word (condoms). Then people began to talk louder in an attempt to drown out my words. One gentleman rose confrontationally and asked me how much longer I was going to take. He seemed a little upset. "Not much longer," I told him. I explained I'd brought some condoms to give out, but as it might be embarrassing to ask for one, I would just leave them at the door and they could pick one up when they left.

I apologize to those in the Refectory that I made uncomfortable. I know you were not expecting any of this when you sat down to lunch and were not prepared. I believe an art performance (as opposed to a theatrical production) is more effective when unexpected. When a psychologist or a scientist does a study, he/she does not let the subject know what the expected outcome is as that could affect the results. I did announce at the beginning of my performance in the Refectory that I would only take a few minutes, and that I wanted to talk about my fears and worries about AIDS. But as professors, I think we are used to being the people in control, the people conducting the experiment. It is very difficult to be the

Women's Resource Center's Board supports director

TO THE EDITOR:

As members of the Advisory Board of the Women's Resource Center, we are concerned about misrepresentations of the center's activities that have recently appeared on the opinions page of the The Bucknellian. We are especially concerned that women who need the support of the Women's Resource Center will be kept away by frivolous and ignorant misrepresentation of what we do.

The primary objective of the Women's Resource Center is to foster a campus community in which women and men can live in a climate of mutual respect, understanding, and equality, and where women are encouraged to reach their fullest potential. The Center focuses on the empowerment of women, not their victimization. In line with this philosophy, no women need fear having views imposed on her if she comes to the Center. Rather women are encouraged to explore many sides of an issue so that they can make decisions based on their own needs.

The Center tries to serve the entire community of women at Bucknell. The advisory board is made up of faculty, staff, students, administrators, and local community members with varying opinions. Besides advocacy and counseling for individual women and support for issues of concern to women, such as harassment, discrimination, and violence, the Center sponsors many educational events such as health series, an annual career day, an international women's day, and performers and speakers on all sorts of issues relevant to women.

We especially wish to point out that Janice Butler, the first full-time director of the WRC, in her short tenure as director, has made of the center everything we hoped it would be when founded six years ago to serve the needs of women on this campus. We admire her calm and considerate support for women, her knowledge of women's issues, her tact in dealing with difficult situations, and her candid, helpful, constructive leadership. To impose opinions on women is antithetical to the respect for the autonomy of women which is at the heart of everything Janice and the Center do.

While we understand that an opinions page contains opinions, we wonder if anyone, either the The Bucknellian or the columnists, worry about whether the facts contained in the articles are correct or about what harm might be done by careless and irresponsible falsehoods.

Beltway Bound is only personal attacks, not truth

TO THE EDITOR:

Michael Wardell's "Beltway Bound" column entitled "The Women's Resource Plantation" (in the March 13th The Bucknellian) was nothing but a vicious personal attack disguised as commentary. Once again Wardell is out feminist-bashing, this time claiming that "feminist leaders are the whipcracking slave masters of the female plantation" who can't stand it when "insubordinate women think for themselves." Wardell seems to think that what the women of America really need is Michael Wardell, a man who can tell them "the last thing women need," give them a reading list of politically correct (right-wing) women writers, and assure them of their right to wear skin-tight miniskirts and enlarge their breasts.

Unfortunately Wardell doesn't support his argument with even one example. The column is mostly a series of vague generalizations, and he fills in the gaps with distortions and outright lies. (The Women's Studies major is not a product of the Women's Resource Center, and the inclusion of "gender as a fundamental category of literary analysis" is no more an act of war against literature than is any other type of literary analysis.) Wardell does quote a few women who don't always agree with feminist leaders, but doesn't give one instance of leaders trying to control other women's thoughts.

Wardell further misleads readers by accusing Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center, of such behavior without acknowledging that he has a personal grudge against her. Wardell accuses Butler of "inflicting her orthodoxy on her sisterhood" to keep women "victims of her vitriolic mind control." But Wardell is unable to give any examples of such actions, and the true reason he's upset with her is because she had previously disagreed with him. Wardell had attacked the National Organization for Women (NOW) in his "Beltway Bound" column of February 28th by ignoring all their activities which could be considered mainstream and then accusing them of being a "fringe movement" which doesn't represent most women's concerns. (Ironically, he begins his March 13th column by discounting the notion that the media has misrepresented the women's movement after he, as a member of the media, has done so himself.) In the March 6th The Bucknellian, Janice Butler responded, not by attacking Wardell personally, but by pointing out omissions of fact in his column and logical fallacies in his reasoning. This is the unacknowledged context for Wardell's accusations against Butler. In reality, it is not Butler but Wardell who can't stand women who disagree with him.

I called Wardell to ask if he had any other reason to accuse Butler as he did. He told me, "Just look at her letter." Wardell claimed that since he had quoted women in his column, Butler's criticism of him was an attack on women who disagreed with her. When I asked further he said that the Women's Resource Center has a narrow agenda which he could only define as "feminist." He couldn't provide any more specific evidence in support of his allegations.

As offended as I am by Wardell, I'm more outraged with the editors of The Bucknellian for printing such a piece. This is not a question of censoring the "politically incorrect." This is a question of responsible journalism. The Bucknellian has no justification for participating in character assassination. Since I disagree with Wardell, I could accuse him of robbing his grandmother, cheating on his taxes, and having sex with farm animals. Hopefully the Bucknellian wouldn't print such claims. They have freedom of the press, but they also have an obligation to uphold ethical standards of journalism. No accusations should be printed without supporting evidence, and editors should be especially cautious when journalists have a personal vendetta against the accused which is unrelated to the charges. I hope that in the future the editors will not print such trash in our school paper. In the meantime, they and Michael Wardell owe Janice Butler an apology.

Beltway Bound

Intellectual freedom, the foundation on which a university rests, is imperiled by a dangerous, nationwide conspiracy threatening our twin columns of learning: Lernfreiheit and Lehrfreiheit. Thomas Jefferson, founder of the University of Virginia, declared "this institution will be based on the illimitable freedom of the human mind." But a small, well- organized group of faculty is muzzling their opposition through intimidation, slander and speech codes, and is transforming academic freedom into bureaucratic dogma.

The conspiracy is led by erstwhile student radicals left over from the 1960's: now today's tenured faculty. Their conspiracy is remarkably quiet because the universities give these activist-professors nice work places, big paychecks, and lifetime job security. Instead of protesting, these faculty corrupt the traditionally curriculum to suit their own ideology.

In their most ominous crusade, the "tenured radicals" are rewriting history (e.g., Afrocentricity and the new Columbus myth) in order to suit their pet theories.

These scholar-activists bully administrations into creating new "studies" departments (e.g., black studies, women's studies, gay studies). The new departments are an intellectual quota system for activists, imbued with radical ideology, to mount campaigns designed to assault the traditional pillars of our schools and the traditional values of our society. At some universities, these new departments dominate who gets hired, fired, and what the faculty and students can teach and say.

George Will has speculated, "Today there must be more Marxists on the Harvard faculty than in Eastern Europe." And according to Richard Rorty, Philosophy professor at the University of Virginia, the radicals hide behind "a new American cultural Left made of deconstructionalists, new historicists, people in gender studies, ethnic studies, a few left-over Marxists, and so on. This Left would like to use the English, French, and Comparative Literature Departments of the universities as staging areas for political actions."

Some of the radical faculty are easy to spot. Just listen to what they say:

• H. Gates, Black Studies prof. at Harvard.: "Ours was the generation that took over buildings in the late 1960's and demanded the creation of Black and Women's Studies programs. We have come back to challenge the curriculum."

• J. Parini, English prof. at Middlebury: After the Vietnam War, a lot of us didn't just crawl back into our library cubicles; we stepped into academic positions. Now we have tenure and the work of reshaping the universities has begun in earnest."

• A. Kolodny, Dean of Humanities at U. Arizona: "[Having been ideologically trained in the 1960's,] I see my scholarship as an extension of my political activism."

What do students learn from the "tenured radicals"? According to Dinesh D'Souza, author of Illiberal Education (Macmillian 1991), students learn that "all rules are unjust; that justice is simply the will of the stronger party; that standards and values are arbitrary; that individual rights are a red flag signifying social privilege; that all knowledge can be reduced to politics; that convenient myths and benign lies can substitute for truth; that debates are best conducted not by rational and civil exchange of ideas, but by accusation, intimidation, and official prosecution; that the university stands for nothing in particular; and that the ideal of the educated person is largely a figment of a bourgeois white male ideology which should be cast aside."

O'Brien, the torturer from Orwell's 1984, would be welcomed into the conspiracy, especially when he says: "You believe that reality is something objective, external, existing in its own right. But I tell you, Winston, that reality is not external. Reality exists in the human mind and no where else."

Political Corrections needed on every campus

BY JOHN PEELER

What is it about the "political correctness" issue that resonates? Why do so many people seem to find plausible the allegations of a left-wing ideological conformity dominating our universities? It is not because the argument is right, but because it is wrong.

The PC controversy did not emerge as a result of nonpolitical outrage at the political prostitution of the university. It was developed, and has been sustained on a national level by extreme right-wing elements (such as Dinesh d'Souza) who are determined to seize political control of universities, and thereby control the very language of discourse of our society. That isn't to say that everybody who is concerned about PC is so motivated, but the political character of the national leadership of the movement is clear.

This fringe group has been able to gain a national constituency in our universities because important changes in the universities are upsetting and threatening to many people. Until a generation ago, voices challenging the Euro-centric, male-oriented and bourgeois mainstream of our civilization were scarcely to be heard in our universities.

This fringe group has been able to gain a national constituency in our universities because important changes in the universities are upsetting and threatening to many people. Until a generation ago, voices challenging the Euro-centric, male-oriented and bourgeois mainstream of our civilization were scarcely to be heard in our universities. There were plenty of disputes, but they largely occurred within that mainstream. Alternative viewpoints were usually tolerated, because that's what universities are supposed to do. The university is, after all, essentially liberal in its commitment to that most liberal of values, freedom of speech. But the alternative voices really had no power.

In recent years, challenging voices have secured more of a foothold in the universities. Feminists, socialists, advocates of minority ethnic perspectives, advocates of homosexual perspectives, all find themselves much more able than a generation ago to speak out and to challenge aspects of mainstream culture. People still operating within a more mainstream perspective are for the first time confronting challenges to their most basic assumptions. Some may find that intimidating, and they may perceive that vaguely defined "leftists" actually dominate the university. That is flatly not true of any university in this country. These alternative

Fifth of a Series

All of a sudden, President Bush has pushed forth a plan that will provide financial aid to the former Soviet Union with the intent of transforming the communist system into a free-market economy by placing property ownership into private hands, and by making the ruble into an exchangable form of currency. This is definitely a plan of goodwill because it will promote American business ventures in that portion of eastern Europe; however, one might ask where this money is to come from. One might even press further to ask, is this such a wise decision especially since the American economy is depressed? There are no simple solutions to these questions, but I might suggest that any political leader will feel pressured to act swiftly on such an opportunity, especially during a presidential election year, when a former president, such as Nixon, begins to advise the current executive through a series of opinions pieces printed in nationally distributed newspapers like The New York Times.

Nixon has inculcated his ideas of foreign policy into Bush's mind through a series of political theory pieces printed roughly six weeks ago. He believes that the former Soviet Union is very vulnerable to foreign influence at this point in time, and in the future, it will favor those nations that act now to provide financial aid. This is true, but our economy does not appear to be able to sustain monetary support over a long period of time. So how can the United States provide financial aid without using American savings? The answer is simple. The New York Times headlines on April 1, state "Russia's Economic Plan Backed By International Monetary Fund," but the real question is, who is backing the IMF? Our President has prepared a package for Congress that will transfer $12 billion into The International Monetary Fund, $3 billion of which will be used to promote Russia's comprehensive economic reforms.

How can our Executive propose this package when the money could, and arguably should, be used to provide health care, homes, and jobs to those who need them? On the other hand, how could he not...

How can our Executive propose this package when the money could, and arguably should, be used to provide health care, homes, and jobs to those who need them? On the other hand, how could he not when he has Nixon pushing him from behind to take advantage of Russia's willingness to make economic and social reforms? Bush did not take the initiative to support Russia financially, until Nixon pressed for government action. Nixon is a highly respected politician in the eyes of many. He certainly is not to be ignored. Besides, isn't this what we have all been waiting for—a chance to take advantage of a state that has demonstrated the ineffectiveness of communism? The Soviet Union has been broken down; it has demonstrated that capitalism is more productive, socially and economically, than communism. Nixon's message is that we should build it back up—the American way.

One might question the President's actions, but it is essential to understand the driving forces behind his decisions. Many will criticize Bush for providing monetary aid, directly or indirectly; however, we should all step back and look at the whole picture and the positive aspects. Is it possible that someday the former Soviet Union will be our closest ally, providing the United States an additional market for our service and manufacturing industries? We do not know, therefore we should not limit the opportunities. Bush's proposal has some sound reasoning. At least it is a step in the right direction.

BELTWAY

The radicals are not merely with corrupting the liberal arts; they are assaulting the sciences. The activists call for preferential hiring of minorities and feminists, since their inclusion will bring critical perspectives to "institutionally racist, white-male science."

In their most ominous crusade, the "tenured radicals" are rewriting history (e.g., Afrocentricity and the new Columbus myth) in order to suit their pet theories. Their pet theories are nothing but a victory of conscience over evidence. Nevertheless, the radicals are changing events, excluding contradicting facts, elevating rumor to fact, giving false clarity to the past, and even lying to their students.

These radicals are well organized through societies (e.g., the Modern Language Association) and through scholarly journals (e.g., New LEFT Criticism). They have a clear agenda. They are often the dominating voices in their academic departments. They are our universities' Big Brother. And Big Brother said: "Who controls the past controls the future. Who controls the present controls the past."

Correction: In my last column, "The Women's Resource Plantation," I incorrectly attributed the "Women's Studies Major" to the Women's Resource Center. However one ought to check out the "Women's News" bulletin board located outside the WRC. It features all sorts of advertisements for women's studies at other universities (e.g., Antioch, Clark, Gettysburg, and York). "Women's studies" is a field of study which Camille Paglia rightly calls the "entrenched feminist establishment's disastrous academic counterpart, which is doing so much to damage the promising minds of our next generation." At Bucknell, we can blame the Curriculum Committee of the Arts and Sciences, the Race/Gender Resource Center, and each member of the College of Arts and Sciences who voted to support the major. President Sojka ought to excise this academic cancer while the patient, namely Bucknell University, is still warm.

CORRECTIONS

viewpoints now have more voice and some institutional support (e.g., centers, budgets, journals), but it is ludicrous to think that they really control basic decisions about curriculum and resource allocation.

And yet many people seem to think just that. Paradoxically, one of the main reasons has to do with the very weakness of the left in American society today, even in the university. As conservatives have dominated the political arena in the last generation, they have been able gradually to shift the nation's agenda and change its laws so that many of the liberal gains of the Civil Rights Movement and the Great Society have been eroded. The left has never held power in this country, but even liberals have been out of power and on the defensive since 1969. The Reagan years were a purgatory for liberals, and an inferno for people on the left.

The pen is the last weapon, words the last ammunition, and language the last battlefield left to the left. Words are not neutral; they are freighted with values, implicit and explicit. To fail to examine our words is tacitly to consent to the worldview—and to the world—they represent. And that is where the PC battle rages. Lacking any other point of leverage, some people on the left try to change society by changing language. Semantic guerrillas, they do battle over the words we use to carry on our everyday lives. One commonplace example illustrates the point: if we continue to use "he/ his" generically to apply implicitly to both genders, we buy into the implicit expectation that "normal" people are males, not females.

Everyday language is filled with such implicit values and assumptions, any one of which may legitimately be questioned. But some semantic guerrillas of the left have fallen into a classic strategic error: by calling into question the very fabric of everyday discourse, they antagonize people, in the sense that many worry that any incidental utterance may be censured. People just find it irritating to have language monitors reminding them to consider the implications of everyday speech. So, instead of building support among the mass of the population, these semantic guerrillas anger them and isolate themselves. The battle, instead of focusing on larger issues of social justice and peace, remains mired on the unfavorable terrain of language.

The PC controversy gives us a good view of both the right and the left in this country. Contrary to the PC argument, the left is not sinister, but its lack of political dexterity has played into the more dextrous hands, and sinister intentions, of the right.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Student believes that the war between sexes must stop

TO THE EDITOR:

Mr. Wardell's previous "Beltway Bound" article is commendable for pointing out the movement's major flaw. Mr. Wardell never actually states outright this flaw. But, the fact that people, such as Mr. Wardell, have such a negative reaction to the movement serves as a concrete example of why the feminist movement's techniques used in gaining equality may be doing more harm than good.

The major flaw with the feminist movement is that it portrays men as the enemy of women, an enemy that women must conquer and force to relinquish a small part of their overbearing power. Tied in with this perception of men as the enemy is that women, by right of their oppression, possess a martyr-like moral superiority. The feminist movement's polarized view of fundamentally oppressive males and suffering females is best exemplified through their reaction to the Kennedy rape case and the Thomas confirmation hearings. In both cases the feminist movement was calling for the blood of Kennedy and Thomas even before their respective hearings had gotten fully under way. They were pre-judging Kennedy and Thomas as guilty simply because they were male.

The feminist movement's war-like attitude, i.e., fighting the "Battle of the Sexes," will not create a society where men and women can live peacefully, namely a society where all men and all women can interact on an equal basis without fear. In a battle both sides lose. Both sides take casualties and the survivors of a war have scars that will never fade.

Men have more economic power than women, but they pay a price for this, the price of constantly working, of seeing their children growing up as strangers, of never being allowed to show emotion...

The feminist movement needs to realize that both sides of the current struggle, both men and women, will benefit by equality of opportunity. Contrary to feminist theory, men's roles in society are NOT ideal, and men do NOT hold all power in our society. Men have more economic power than women, but they pay a price for this, the price of constantly working, of seeing their children growing up as strangers, of never being allowed to show emotion, of dying by the millions in wars to defend the lives of loved ones, and of dying an average of ten years earlier than women because of stress.

Change needs to come from both sexes through cooperation, not through intimidation. The feminist movement needs to stop reacting with fury as men try to identify and change the problems in their lives. Until the feminist movement realizes that everyone suffers under our current sex roles true equality will never be attained. Let's stop the war.

Staff member responds to the abortion issue controversy

TO THE EDITOR:

I must respond to Greg May's discussion in "Coffee with Alice" entitled, "So you think abortion is murder" (March 6 issue), because a few of his statements were either not true or unclear.

He says that the pro-life argument forces pro-choice advocates to face the real violence in abortion, and that our truths are necessary to keep them morally responsible. What is the real violence in abortion, if it's not the fact that a totally innocent, totally helpless, human being is killed?

Also, what does he mean by the term "morally responsible"?

If it means keeping the law of the land, then you can still allow abortion and claim to be morally responsible. If it means keeping God's law, then you cannot claim to be morally responsible, because the Bible says "Thou shalt not kill."

He also says that the pro-life movement must accept that a woman has rights of her own. It has already done this by recognizing that a woman in a crisis pregnancy needs help, not condemnation. The pro-life movement operates crisis pregnancy centers which will do everything possible to help a mother in need to carry her child to full term. Doctor visits, help with housing, and furnishing baby clothes and other items are only a few of the things they do to help. Also, individual pro-lifers have opened their homes to mothers, helped pay their doctor bills, and have given them loving moral support. What does the abortion clinic do to help a mother deal with her crisis pregnancy? It kills her baby and then leaves her to deal with it for the rest of her life! Is this love and compassion for the mother?!

We believe that women and their unborn babies have rights. A woman has the right to not be forced to deal with the emotional trauma of an abortion for the rest of her life, and her unborn baby has the right to live. Women have a right to know the truth about abortion, because they and their unborn babies are the innocent victims of this money-making industry. They have a right to know that someone DOES care about them AND their baby, and they have a right to know WHERE to get help. Women who have already had abortions have a right to know that there IS healing for their damaged emotions. Because God cares and so do we!

I think that God intended a mother's womb to be the safest place in the world for a little baby to be nurtured and protected. The pro-life movement is just trying to keep it that way! Because as Susan LaMaire said in her response on behalf of Bucknellians for Human Life, "All women (even unborn women) have rights."

AIDS makes me uncomfortable, especially the thought that some people think they are safe and do not learn how they can make their lives safer. I hope we can find a way to ease our discomfort in talking about AIDS and work to help with the crisis. Before you put the incident behind you, I ask that you spend a few minutes examining why you felt uncomfortable during my performance in the Refectory on Thursday, March 19th. Are there any other issues/problems that evoke a similar discomfort, or was it merely the "inappropriateness" of the place? Would the information have been acceptable as a lecture? Finally, I would like to thank those members of the Bucknell community who participated in the creation of the outdoor installation by painting a mask or cross, and to all who stopped by the Cave to share their individual thoughts and concerns about AIDS. I feel blessed and honored by the stories you shared with me and hope that you will continue to talk about AIDS with understanding with those close to you and to those in conflict about AIDS.

Branford Marsalis offers Safe Sax at Weis Center tonight

Grammy award-winning saxophonist Branford Marsalis follows brother Wynton's footsteps to the Bucknell campus to perform tonight in the Weis Center.

KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Saxophonist Branford Marsalis will be making a stop at the Weis Center tonight before replacing Doc Severensen as the music director of The Tonight Show later this month when Jay Leno succeeds Johnny Carson as the host.

A Grammy award-winning musician, Marsalis is certainly no stranger to the music world, having released eight Grammy-nominated solo albums. He has performed on numerous jazz and classical recordings with such musical greats as the late Miles Davis, Dizzy Gillespie, Tina Turner, and Teena Marie. He has also performed and recorded with two other famous family members, his father Ellis and his brother Wynton, an internationally known trumpeter.

"The entire Marsalis family seems to have founded a jazz dynasty; Branford's brother Wynton has been to Bucknell twice and has been very well received by large audiences," commented William Boswell, director of cultural events. Boswell added, "Branford has been called 'the most talented Marsalis of them all,' and now we have a chance to decide for ourselves."

Bucknellians who are fans of rock musician Sting may recognize Marsalis, who spent four years tour the Police. In addition, Marsalis saxophonist collaborated with film producer Spike Lee to perform the soundtrack for Lee's Do the Right Thing and Mo' Better Blues . Marsalis also has several acting credits to his name, having had minor roles in the films Bring on the Night, Throw Momma From the Train, and School Daze .

In addition to acting, recording, and performing, Marsalis is the host of a jazz radio program which can be heard locally on WVIA-FM.

Tickets for tonight's concert are $20 ($10 with a Bucknell I.D.) and will be available at the box office prior to the performance.

Near brings her messages of peace and freedom in songs

A political activist who defends such causes as women's equality, dignity for people with AIDS, and human rights in El Salvador, singer/songwriter Holly Near will present the concert "Singing For Our Lives" tomorrow in conjunction with the second annual Women's Leadership Conference, "Inclusion, Empowerment, and Transformation: A Challenge to Traditional Leadership."

Touring the world as an ambassador of peace and hope, Near worked throughout the seventies and eighties for peace and feminism has agreed to perform in war-torn El Salvador, she has worked with Central and South American artists, using music to promote social change and solidarity.

This year, Near has appeared in the feature film Dog Fight with River Phoenix and on the television show L.A. Law. Radio show shakes up campus

BY BRIAN KING

"Talk hard!" Movie fans might recognize this quotation from Christian Slater's movie Pump Up the Volume. The movie and its accompanying message about free speech and the power of radio as an effective media form set the tone for Bucknell's own radio talk show.

The show, which broadcasts Sunday evenings 8-10 p.m. on WVBU FM 90.5, is hosted by Rob Schroeder '92 and Matt Wood '92. They adapted the idea from a similar show at Bates College, and hope to continue and strengthen that model by introducing open-air discussion, mixed with live interviews of campus personalities and professionals. A recent Sunday show featured an interview with the executive director of the environmental group Public Interest Research Group (PIRG) to discuss the dynamic environmental ideas that the group has proposed. In the future other interviews of interest to the Bucknell community will be provided. Schroeder mentioned his interest in seeing a political science professor discuss the presidential campaign.

Besides interviews, the duo is hoping for live discussion from Bucknell students. Topics have ranged from the trivial (salad dressing) to the very important (environment, politics). Schroeder and Wood look to The Bucknellian and other publications to find issues that confront the typical student. They then bring those issues on the show and invite discussion. Schroeder's main goal is to, "start dialogue at Bucknell (because we) don't hear it enough." Wood stated that although there are a good number of interest groups at Bucknell, often students feel intimidated in attending or speaking their minds. He feels the 'anonymity' of the show will produce a form necessary for discussion.

The duo is very excited with the prospects of their show. Unfortunately the lifespan of this is only to the end of this semester because both DJ's will be graduating. Both Schroeder and Wood hope to see the idea continue as they feel it is a vital component in college life.

Ensembles premiere spring concert in Weis

BY CHRIS BIRD

The Bucknell University Symphonic Band and Wind Ensemble are scheduled to perform their annual spring concert in the Weis Center this Sunday. Both of the ensembles will be conducted by Professor William Kenny. The concert will begin at 2:30 p.m., is free of charge, and will be open to the public.

The 20-piece wind ensemble will open the performance with the upbeat Folk Dances by Dmitri Shostakovich and continue with the Gothic Suite by Peter Phillips. A wind sextet will then play Parthia II by David Moritz Michael and the ensemble will complete their portion of the concert with Gordon Jacob's More Old Wine in New Bottles.

The program continues with the 60-piece symphonic band, which will play some familiar as well unfamiliar tunes. The band will open its program with The Hounds of Spring, a concert overture for wind written by Alfred Reed, and will follow with Charles A. Wiley's arrangement of the Old Scottish Melody, also known as the traditional New Year's Eve tune Auld Lang Syne. Next on the program is Canzona by Peter Mennin, and the Symphonic Band will end the performance with Thomas Knox's American Pageant, a patriotic medley that has been played at every Presidential inauguration since Richard Nixon.

"Our program has a lot of variety," said Kenny. "Both of the ensembles have had to overcome the week away from the music during Spring Break, but the students returned sounding really good. I'm very happy with the way the groups have come together."

The Symphonic Band will continue to remain busy after the spring concert. The group will prepare for the campus-wide PRISM concert, which will take place on Saturday, April 25 as a part of the Spring Weekend activities. The band then plans to take a mini-tour of New York City during the first weekend of May.

If you have some instrumental experience and would like to join any of the ensembles for the 1992-1993 season, contact Kenny at X1357.

Pro Baseball Preview: American League East

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

I can smell it. It's the freshly mowed grass, the peanuts and Cracker Jack, the brand new leather. Yes, it's time for baseball, my favorite sport.

So you say you've lost faith in the game. You can't stand to watch any sport where a guy like Felix Fermin makes $950,000 per year. You can't watch this game because you're a senior, you haven't found a job yet that doesn't involve thawing out the fries, you've learned that Scott Garrelts makes $2.4 million bucks a year, and you've never even heard of Scott Garrelts. Here's some advice: just ignore the salaries when you watch a game. It's just that simple. I do it, and I've found that I love baseball more now than ever.

So now that we've gotten through this week's therapy session (the bill is on its way), let's look at how the American League East stacks up this year, in order of predicted finish.

In the American League East, the Toronto Blue Jays have the best talent by far, but you can still look for a tight race in this division. The Jays are picked as division champs by almost every writer in North America, but they may be a bit overrated. Their top pitcher over the last decade, Dave Steib, is coming off back surgery. His new replacement is World Series hero Jack Morris. But many people forget that Morris is 38 and just two years removed from back-to-back disaster seasons. Dave Winfield, the new designated hitter that is supposed to put them over the top, is even older and has been plagued by injuries this spring. Closer Tom Henke had off-season surgery for the second straight year. That said, this team is still awesome. Any lineup that boasts Roberto Alomar, Joe Carter, Kelly Gruber, and Devon White will put runs on the board. All you need to say about the pitching staff is that David Wells, who was unhittable for about six weeks last year, is the sixth best starter on the staff. Even if Henke can't come back to his old self, Duane Ward and his 20-plus saves are there just in case.

What team has the best chance to be the Atlanta Braves of 1992? It's the Baltimore Orioles, and I'm not just saying that because I'm a die-hard O's fan. The pitching staff, now anchored by veteran Rick Sutcliffe, has been awesome this spring. Mike Mussina, last year's top draft pick, just gave up his first two runs of the spring the other day. Mussina had the lowest ERA among American League starters in the month of September last year, all while the Orioles were long since out of the division race. Now that Ben McDonald is not expected to be the ace of the staff, he should do well - assuming he stays injury-free for the first time in his pro career. Jose Mesa and Storm Davis have also been terrific this spring, and with Gregg Olson anchoring a solid bullpen, the Orioles should have their best staff since 1984. As for the lineup, Cal Ripken is still ripping the cover off the ball, and slugger Glenn Davis is healthy and happy, now that he's been reunited with his best childhood friend, Storm Davis. Mike Devereaux hit 19 homers as the leadoff hitter last year, and he should improve on that now that he's been moved to the number five slot in favor of Rookie of the Year candidate Luis Mercedes. Second year men Chris Hoiles and Leo Gomez proved last year that they can hit for power, and DH's Randy Milligan and Sam Horn can also hit the ball a long way. Playing in the beautiful new Oriole Park at Camden Yards in front of sell-out crowds every night can only help the upstart O's make a run for the title.

The Boston Red Sox have Roger Clemens, which means they should win at least every fifth day. Now that Frank Viola is around to help out, and with the still-powerful lineup, the Bosox, should be able to finish third. There are a lot of questions that need answering in Beantown, however. Can Mike Greenwell and Ellis Burks ignore the trade rumors and finally live up to their potential? Can new manager Butch Hobson continue the tradition of making a fair staff out of other team's rejects and career losers, like Joe Morgan did with guys like Greg Harris, Joe Hesketh, and Dana Kiecker? How fat will Mo Vaughn get?

The Detroit Tigers aren't a very good team, but they have two things going for them that should at least make them mediocre. They have a line-up full of guys that cat hit the ball out of the ballpark, and Sparky Anderson is still around. If this was a beer softball league, Detroit would win the division by thirty games, but in the show they throw breaking balls, which means the Tigers will lead the league in strikeouts again. The pitching staff is awful, again. The anchors of the starting staff all-Geriatric members Frank Tanana, Bill Gullickson, and Walt Terrell. Their defense is just as bad, and to make matters worse they picked up Mark Carreon, arguably the worst outfielder in the history of baseball.

One of these days the Milwaukee Brewers are not going to be decimated by injuries and will be able to put their best starting lineup on the field. When that day comes, we'll find out just how mediocre this team is. This point is proven by the fact that they're excited about the acquisition of Bruce Ruffin, the epitome of mediocrity over the past five years. If top starters Bill Wegman and Chris Bosio are so good, why are they involved in a different trade rumor every week? Getting constant whiner Gary Sheffield out of town will help, and the recently-signed Kevin Seitzer will help, and rookie Doug Henry could step up and be a top closer, but when it comes right down to it, this club is average in every way.

This will be another rebuilding year for the New York Yankees, but it might be the last. Free agent signee Danny Tartabull is a significant addition to the Yankee lineup, especially now that Don Mattingly's hair is no longer a problem. Mel Hall and Matt Nokes each had breakthrough seasons in 1991, proving that they can hit all kinds of pitching. Assuming Kevin Maas is over his sophomore jinx, and with youngsters Roberto Kelly and Pat Kelly returning, this team could score a lot of runs. The Yankee bullpen was terrific last season, with Steve Howe and John Habyan emerging as two of the league's premiere middle relievers. The starting staff is still a question mark. Jeff Johnson and Scott Kamienicki may not be over their shellshock from a year ago, which came as a result of being rushed to the majors. Brien Taylor is supposed to be the next Sandy Koufax, but he's only 17 years old, and the organization will be careful not to rush him as well.

The Cleveland Indians have improved a little bit, which means that they may only lose 100 games this year. Albert Belle and rookie Reggie Jefferson are two of the few legitimate hitters on this team. Youngsters Carlos Baerga, Sandy Alomar, and Kenny Lofton may open some eyes this year, but as soon as the conversation turns to the pitching staff, all eyes shut again. The fact that Charles Nagy is the Opening Day starter attests that. Newcomers Jack Armstrong and Scott Scudder have shown signs that they may be good some day, but the frame of mind that goes with playing in Cleveland, before 20% capacity in Municipal Stadium, does not really help people, especially youngsters, reach their potential.

This is the first of a four-part series. Next week's installment will preview the American League West.

Softball splits twinbill with Shippensburg

Kelly Corr '95 earns Patriot League Player of the Week honors; Bison (7–6) host doubleheader against Delaware tomorrow

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell softball team has seen plenty of action since the week before Spring Break. The Bison competed in 13 contests during the month of March, including six games while on their Spring Trip to Myrtle Beach, South Carolina. Thus far, the squad has amassed a 7-6 record against non-league teams and has yet to meet a Patriot League opponent.

The softball team is coming off of an outstanding 1991 season, during which it surpassed the Bucknell win record with a 28-12-1 mark. The 1991 Bison also played to the Championship game in the Patriot League tournament, where they dropped a 6-5 extra-inning heartbreaker to Army. For the 1992 season, the Bison return two of five Bucknell players who earned All-Patriot League honors last year.

Lisa Fink '93, a tri-captain on this season's women's basketball team, and Heather Hoehn '94 were chosen for the 1991 All-League team for their performances in the outfield and at first base respectively. Last season, Fink set a new school record for hits in a season, with 49, while leading her squad offensively with a .353 batting average. Hoehn was second for the Bison in defensive stats last year with 196 putouts and a .963 fielding percentage.

Although the Bison will surely miss the pitching talent of a graduated Sharon Nichols, who holds all of Bucknell's pitching records, head coach Terrie Grieb has confidence in the two rookie pitchers, Allison Love '95 and Heidi Dawson '95, who have taken Nichols's place.

Rookie Allison Love '95 shown here pitching in a game earlier this season.

During the pre-season months, Grieb said, "Allison is a tough defensive player and an offensive weapon as well. Even though she is just a freshman, I feel comfortable putting her on the mound." The head coach also said of Dawson, "Heidi has a lot of confidence in herself, and that makes me confident in her."

Thus far, the two freshman have played well for the Bison. Dawson has started in five games and holds a 4-1 record, allowing only 11 earned runs and 12 base-on-balls. Love had the starting spot for seven games and has pitched to a 3-4 record, allowing 16 earned runs and throwing an impressive 23 strike outs.

Prior to leaving for Myrtle Beach, Bucknell had accumulated a 2-3 record, splitting a double-header with St. Joseph's, dropping two to LaSalle, and routing St. Bonaventure, 10-4. Down South, the team picked up four victories in a row, creating a five-game winning streak, before losing its last two games against softball powerhouses University of North Carolina-Wilmington and Coastal Carolina College.

In the midst of their winning streak, the Bison played a tough Westminster College team. Behind strong pitching on both sides, the teams battled to a 2-2 tie after the regulation seven innings. The eighth inning saw Bucknell and Westminster score one more each, leading up to the exciting final inning. In the ninth, Dawson and her opposing pitcher, both of whom pitched the entire game, began to tire. During that inning of play, Bucknell scored three runs to Westminster's two, ending the contest with a hard-fought 6-5 victory.

Leading the Bison offensively against Westminster were Fink and Kelly Corr '95, who were each two-for-four on the day. Fink added an RBI, while defensively Corr had five putouts at her shortstop position.

For the season, Corr tops the Bison offensive list, with a .425 batting average. In 13 games, the Bucknell newcomer has 17 hits, nine RBI, a double, a triple, and two home runs. She is the only Bucknell player to hit a home run yet this season. For her Spring Trip performances, the rookie was named Patriot League Player of the Week by the league office. Corr is among the league leaders in three offensive categories. She is fourth in both batting average and runs batted in and is second in home runs. The shortstop has also amassed impres-

Men's lacrosse team starts season slowly

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The men's lacrosse team is in desperate need of a victory. How badly? Well, suffice it to say that the Bison have had about as much success on the lacrosse field of late, as Mike Tyson has had in the courtroom.

Over the last three games, Bucknell's opponents scored a total of 47 goals while the Blue and Orange netted only 17. Following the most recent defeat, a 18-8 loss to Delaware on Wednesday, head coach Sid Jamieson expressed to his team that "the fun of the game is not just playing, but also winning, and we're just not having that much fun right now."

In Bucknell's defense, it should be noted that its last three opponents, Delaware, Army, and Princeton were ranked 17th, 14th, and third in the nation, respectively, at the time of each game.

Fans who attended Wednesday's game received a glimpse of the potential this relatively young and inexperienced team possesses. The Bison jumped out to an early 4-2 lead, which even featured a goal by sophomore netminder, Colin Barker. Not since 1990, when former Bucknell goalie Ken Mangano '90 scored against Hofstra, has a Bison player tallied a goal from that position.

It took little time, however, for the Bluehens to peck away at the Bison lead. "We played real well for one quarter, and then came apart for about 10 to 12 minutes, and it cost us about five goals," explained Jamieson. Twenty minutes into the game, with the score 6-4 in favor of Delaware, Jamieson made the fairly unusual decision to pull Barker, in favor of backup goaltender Matt Wojnovich '94. Jamieson admitted that Wojnovich's outstanding 21 save performance in last season's one goal loss to Delaware influenced his decision to make the early change. "I didn't make the change because Colin was playing poorly, but rather I wanted to generate a little spark on the defensive end of the field," said

Crew enjoys successful break in Augusta, GA

BY EDWARD WILLIAMS

The Men's and Women's Crews ended their spring break with a day of racing at the Augusta Invitational on March 28. The day was successful for Bucknell, as it managed to place two boats in the finals.

The Women's Varsity eight qualified for finals with an easy victory over Vanderbilt University along with the disqualification of Duke University. In the final, the University of Charleston and Williams College provided tough competition. The Women's boat (Melanie Muehe '94, Jen Criss '94, Gretchen Maton '92, Kathy Kolasheski '92, Kristin Gundersen '92, Megan Buehler '94, Tina Pinto '94, Shannon Owens '92, and coxswain Kim Tinstman '95) took third. They were 57.8 seconds behind Williams and 36.3 seconds from Charleston.

Women's Coach Anne Shapiro was pleased with the performance of her boats, and she said, "Everybody worked hard all week and it showed on race day."

The races have shown the women what needs to be done to ensure a successful spring season. "It was a good start to the season," according to Kolasheski. Gundersen also stated that the races "gave us confidence because of the competition and showed us what needs to be done by Dad Vails."

The Men's Varsity Lightweight eight also qualified for finals with victories over Jacksonville University and Furman College. The Lightweights (Tyson Rosser '94, Brent Chandaria '93, Jim Behnke '93, Edward Williams '93, Chris Norrie '92, Sevan Simonian '94, Derek Updegraff '93, Norm Bartlett '93, and coxswain Jacquelyn Shriver '93) proceeded to the finals against Harvard University, Dartmouth College, and Princeton University, all of which are members of the Eastern Sprints league. In the final Bucknell placed fourth—1:02.5 behind Harvard, 1:14.5 from Dartmouth, and 1:31.2 after Princeton.

Despite their finish, the rowers were pleased with their performance. Rosser stated that it was "definitely a fun day to go out and row as well as we did. Not only did we prove to ourselves our ability, we proved to others the same."

Head Coach John Skotedis was also pleased with the showing of the Lightweights. "They gave an exceptionally strong performance against a strong Jacksonville program. The finish in the finals against Harvard, Dartmouth, and Princeton is encouraging for the spring," he said.

The Men's Varsity Heavyweight eight, although they did not qualify for finals, also had a strong performance on Saturday. The Heavies raced against the University of North Carolina, the University of Central Florida, and Williams College. They placed third in their heat, roughly one and a half boat lengths from the winner, Williams. Skotedis was "encouraged with their performance given the level and excellence of the Williams program."

Bucknell's novices also had a good day. The Women's Novice eight placed third in their heat behind Dartmouth and Stetson University. The Men's Novice Heavy four placed second behind the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga.

The Men's Novice Light four placed second behind the Savannah College of Art and Design. The Men's Novice Lightweight eight had a strong showing but was disqualified. Men's Novice coach Jimmy King was "pleased" with the performance of his crews.

The races on Saturday provided an encouraging start to the season for the Men's and Women's Crews. As Gundersen said, "The races showed how much the training in Georgia helped. Both teams rowed well; more fine tuning will make all boats row better."

Baseball team falls to snow, Lock Haven

Bison (5–5) remained in Lewisburg over break only to have several games cancelled

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It was a pretty boring spring break for the Bucknell varsity groundskeepers...uh, baseball team. Thanks to the lovely Spring weather the Susquehanna valley has been experiencing for the past few weeks, the players spent more time shoveling snow off the field than playing games. And now, on the eve of the Patriot League opener, it is questionable whether the Bison will be prepared.

After a 7-3 loss at LaSalle on Mar. 25, a doubleheader sweep of Wilkes on Monday (6-3, 9-7), and a 7-5 loss yesterday to Lock Haven, the squad has played just ten games, with only five coming against quality opponents. While the team has had more opportunity to practice inside, the players simply haven't had enough at-bats or thrown enough innings to be confident going into the intraconference schedule, which begins with a home twin bill with Holy Cross tomorrow at noon.

> "It has been a frustrating spring"
> — Gene Depew
> Head Baseball Coach

Through yesterday's game, no Bison hitter has had more than 38 at-bats, and no pitcher has thrown more than 17 innings or appeared in more than three games. "It has been a frustrating spring," said manager Gene Depew. "Our games have been stretched out, with so much time between games, so we don't have much of a rhythm yet."

The pitching staff has had its ups and downs in the early season. Jack Kazanjian '93 (2-1, 2.12 ERA) has been the best hurler on a staff that has a lofty 5.23 ERA. Kurt Waldner '93 (2-1, 5.29) and Denis Maguire '93 (1-1, 7.71), the two other main starters, have struggled thus far, but they should improve as the weather gets warmer. Kyle Morris '95 gave Depew three solid innings as a starter in yesterday's affair, but middle relievers Dave Scranton '95 and E.J. Tague '95 faltered. Matt Sniegocki '93 opened some eyes by tossing a scoreless inning and a third in his debut as a closer.

Perhaps more than any other aspect of the game, the team's defense has been hurt by the lack of outdoor experience this season. The fielding, something that can't really be practiced in the fieldhouse, has been erratic at best this spring. Through ten games, the Bison have committed 18 errors, including three more yesterday. As a result, the pitching staff has given up 14 unearned runs. It is tough to win consistently when you give your opponent an average of 1.4 free runs per game.

Fortunately, the rest of the Patriot League has had similar problems. Fordham, a traditional power, leads the league with 12 games played, while Holy Cross has only played six.

Ironically, the reason Depew decided against taking the Bison to Florida for spring break was so that the team could play more games. In Florida, the team would have to waste days traveling, and with the schools there in classes, there could be no weekday doubleheaders.

Depew gambled that the weather in this area would be decent, and he lost. In fact, he lost 14 games due to Mother Nature. Some of the teams the Bison missed out on playing include C.W. Post, Scranton, SUNY-Binghampton, and William Paterson—not necessarily cupcakes, but certainly not the type of competition that would be available in the South. A trip to Florida—even a short three or four day journey—would be valuable because the team would have the opportunity to play some of the best squads in the country, who have been playing since January in the warm tropical breezes.

Jamieson. Unfortunately for the Bison, things only continued to get worse from that point on.

Defensive midfielder and team captain, Mike Conway '92, turned in what seemingly has become routine for him—another excellent performance. In addition to picking the pockets of opposing midfielders for nearly the entire 60 minutes of the game, Conway scooped up a groundball on a face-off and dodged several Delaware defensemen en route to an unassisted goal.

The fact that there were very few other bright spots for the Bison prompted Jamieson to make several personnel changes in preparation for the team's upcoming games at Holy Cross on Saturday and at Marist on Sunday. In hopes of boosting what has been a relatively stagnant offense, midfielders Justin Zackey '94 and Chris Wyszynski '95 will assume positions on the starting attack unit. Playmaker Doug DePietro will retain his position on first attack. To help fill the void at midfield, defensive midfielder Greg Brown '92 will be returning to the offensive position he played previously in his college career.

The Bison will find themselves in an unfamiliar position this weekend—they will be the favorite to win both games. Jamieson very diplomatically stated that "the matchups should give us an advantage against both Holy Cross and Marist," but the fact of the matter is that the Bison should get a chance to score a lot of goals, get a couple of wins, and have some fun again.

While many on campus were jamming the trunks of their cars with sleeping bags, Doritos, and suitcases in preparation for the southward drive down I-95 to one of many North American paradises such as Myrtle Beach, Daytona, or Key West, members of the lacrosse team got to enjoy little more than a long weekend of relaxation before it was time to return to the practice field. On Saturday, Mar. 28 the Cadets of Army invaded the meagerly populated Bucknell campus and trounced the Bison by a score of 13-4.

Since all team members are service academy athletes, the Cadets were physically dominating and in "superior condition," remarked Jamieson. Although the defense turned in a fairly strong overall performance, the offensive output was seriously deficient. The Bison managed to get off a total of only 25 shots in comparison to Army's 45.

Prior to spring break, Bucknell had the distinct pleasure of facing Princeton, the third-ranked team in the nation which had just come off a heartbreaking one-goal loss to Johns Hopkins in its first game of the season. Naturally, the Tigers were eager to vent a little of their frustration, and were not feeling particularly charitable towards the over-matched Bison.

After a grim first half which saw Princeton jump out to an 11-0 lead, Bucknell showed tremendous character in the third quarter, lighting up the scoreboard with five goals. The final score may have read 16-5 in favor of the Tigers, but Jamieson does not feel that accurately reflects what he described as a "good solid effort."

sive defensive stats to help anchor the Bucknell infield, which leads the Patriot League in fielding percentage with a .942 average.

The Bucknell squad returned to Lewisburg last week to take on Shippensburg in a double-header at home. After being shutout in the first game 5-0, the Bison stormed back to take a decisive 8-4 victory in the following competition.

Bucknell enjoyed an all-around strong offensive performance in its second game. Co-captain Jen Yuengling '93 led the squad, going three-for-four at the plate with two RBI. Carol Gesler '93 had an outstanding offensive game, batting two-for-three and adding four RBI. Corr followed suit with a two-for-three game as well. Rounding out the Bucknell offensive fire was Devaney Kerr '94, who was a perfect two-for-two at the plate. Dawson also picked up her fourth win against Shippensburg.

The Bison are scheduled to take on Delaware tomorrow at 1 p.m. and Patriot League foe Holy Cross on Sunday at 1 p.m. at the Mod fields.

Kelly Corr '95

Softball rookie Kelly Corr '95 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of March 28-April 3.

Corr was honored as Patriot League Player of the Week for her impressive play over the spring break period. The freshman played a key role in Bucknell's 4-2 record in Myrtle Beach, SC, which included a 6-5 extra-inning victory over Westminster.

On the season, Corr is the number one offensive player on the Bison squad. She boasts a .425 batting average after 13 games. The shortstop has 17 hits, including a double and a triple, nine RBI and two home runs. Thus far, Corr is the only Bucknell player to hit a home run this season. Among the Patriot League, she is second in home runs and fourth in both batting average and runs batted in. Corr's defense is not to be undervalued, however. Her credible defensive stats have also helped Bucknell in leading the Patriot League in fielding percentage at .942.

Golf downs Brown in North Carolina

Puttin' Bison go south for Navy Invitational and to practice in Midpines, NC

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The only foursome most people are focused on this week is playing basketball in Minnesota, not golf in Central Pennsylvania. However, the golf season has begun.

Colin Bridgewater — The Bucknellian
Doug Dollenberg '94 hits the ball down the fairway last season.

Typical northeastern March weather has restricted Coach Tommy Thompson's team to driving ranges and hitting into practice nets. However, the young team (eight freshmen and three sophomores on a team of 14) fled south for spring break to the theoretically warmer climates of Maryland and North Carolina.

Even though he did not think his team was quite ready for such stiff tournament competition, Coach Thompson stopped in Annapolis, MD for the annual Navy Invitational. Several factors contributed to the high numbers on the scorecards: cold weather, inexperience, and only a little outside preparation.

"We weren't ready, but we needed to get our minds focused on tournament competition rather than driving ranges," commented Thompson.

Doug Dollenberg '94 managed to overcome such hindrances on his way to a two-day total of 161. Unfortunately for the Bison, everyone else's opening round results looked more like A+ test scores. Consequently, the team took a collective "mulligan" on their first day of competition and looked to regroup for the second round.

Regroup they did. With the exception of Mike Hartman '95, everyone chipped strokes off of his previous score. Don Hansen '94 and David Fries '93 each tallied 86's. Dollenberg led the way with his 80. The overall score of 348 (each team counts only its top four scores) was more competitive with the other teams, all of whom were returning from their spring breaks rather than just beginning them.

Once they reached Dean Smith's Tar Heel State, their scores improved. Brown University fell victim to the Puttin' Bison in the season's lone dual match in which five scores were now counted, 434-439. Paul Gregory '95 joined Dollenberg to medal with an 86. Hansen, Chris Curti '94, and Fries each finished within two strokes of their teammates.

"We always start slowly," stated Thompson. "Your short game takes time to mature and become consistent. Once that happens, then you can begin to shave strokes off your score."

With the Patriot League season less than two weeks away, Coach Thompson is going to enter his young team in as many tournaments as possible so that he can determine who he is going to play. The two service academies will utilize their polished bunker and water skills to secure top honors. Any six campus hackers could give Fordham and Holy Cross good runs for their money. But, the real race will be for the middle four positions. Lehigh, Bucknell, Colgate, and Lafayette are interchangeable at this point.

The team will compete in a quad match this weekend at the North Hampton Country Club. Host Lafayette also invited Swarthmore and Rider. However, if this week's snow continues, greenskeeper Karl Spackler will have his work cut out for him.

The women play a Final Four too

6 a.m. Wake up call
6:30 Breakfast
7:30 Leave hotel
8:15 Warm-up
9:25 National Anthem
9:30 Tip-off

This schedule is similar to that which the Southwest Missouri and the Western Kentucky women's basketball teams will have to follow tomorrow morning as they prepare to battle for a spot in the NCAA women's championship game. As anyone who has participated in an athletic event knows, these are not exactly ideal conditions under which to compete—especially not for something as important as the chance for a national title.

Yet that is the price that women's collegiate basketball has chosen to pay for television exposure on CBS prior to the men's Final Four telecast. Because the women's Final Four is being held on the West Coast, those two teams playing in the early semi-final game will be forced to accommodate the Eastern Standard Time viewing audience by playing a full three hours earlier than normal.

The NCAA Final Four coaches believe that television coverage is extremely important for the advancement of the sport on the women's level, and they are willing to make sacrifices for such an outcome. In addition to the early morning woes that Southwest Missouri and Western Kentucky will face tomorrow, another major change has been instituted for at least the next seven years of the CBS contract.

N·C·A·A WOMEN'S FINAL FOUR LOS ANGELES 1·9·9·2

The women are forced to play the semi-final and final games on back-to-back days to accomodate television scheduling. Many coaches feel that this situation increases the chance of poor play due to fatigue. Women's coaches are also concerned about the treatment to which the sport and its impressive athletes have been subjected by the media industry.

"I felt that ESPN showing the Midwest regional game at 3 a.m. was a real slap in the face," remarked Stanford coach Tara VanDerveer to the Associated Press, whose team has earned a spot in this year's Final Four. "I like the challenge to get more exposure, but it's frustrating to see it go the other way."

Since 1984, women's collegiate basketball has gradually received more public support as tournament-time rolls around. As of Thursday, more than 10,000 tickets had been sold for this year's event, which will take place in a 15,800-seat sports arena in Los Angeles. However, the above average ticket sales do not necessarily indicate a large television audience. According to the Associated Press, Western Kentucky's coach Paul Sanderford still believes that, "Because of the stage women's basketball is at, we need CBS and national TV. It's part of the growing process."

Generally, women athletes do not receive the recognition that they so desperately deserve. In most cases, these women participate in athletics for the sheer love of competition and the personal satisfaction that they may get out of their chosen sport. Let's face it, not many women can make a career out of playing a sport as their male counterparts can. Yet women athletes remain dedicated, tough, and talented.

The NCAA tournament teams deserve national recognition, coverage, and the support of the public. Their tempo and their skills are extremely impressive and merit attention. The semi-finals will be aired Saturday at 12:30 p.m. on CBS and the finals will be televised the following day. Attention all basketball fans: Try it, you might like it!

man and British dual citizenship, so he is somewhat familiar with the culture. "I have a lot of relatives over there, and I speak the language, so I'll have no problem fitting in," said King.

More importantly, King has qualified to participate as a German national. Since each team in the league is only permitted to have two foreign players on its roster, the fact that he is not considered a foreigner will help his job security.

King will become the thirteenth player to sign a pro contract after playing for head coach Charlie Woollum. "All of the European teams are looking for skilled players 6'6" and taller," said Woollum. "[The United States] has a great deal of talented big men that they lack in Europe."

> Head Men's Basketball Coach

The German scouts could not help but be impressed with King's performance on the court this season. The 6'6" forward led the Patriot League in scoring (20.3 ppg) and field goal percentage (.625), and he led the team in free-throw shooting (.840) and rebounding (7.6 rpg). King proved to be an iron man this season, averaging 37.8 minutes per game, including 15 games in which he played all 40 minutes. He also became the first player in league history to win Player of the Week honors for four consecutive weeks. The climax of the regular season for King was his 39 point effort in Bucknell's overtime win at Lafayette on Feb.1. In a game in which most of his teammates were having off nights, King took the game into his own hands and almost single-handedly won a game in which the Bison faced double-digit deficits.

During the Patriot League Tournament, King went over the 1,000 point mark for his career—a remarkable feat considering that he only had eight points entering his junior year.

Prior to his junior year, King was considered, at best, a candidate for a starting position, but no one could have predicted the year he would have. The 165-pounder had built himself up to 190 pounds, and not only won a starting spot, but also earned second-team All-Patriot League honors, as he started all 31 games, averaged 12.6 points per game and set a Bucknell record with a field-goal percentage of .670. He also led the Bison in rebounding (7.7 per game), and was fourth in the league in free throw shooting (.776).

Matt Clark '93, a teammate of King's and a reserve on this year's squad, said, "Pat's overall skills for a player his size are well suited for the European style of play."

A top performer in the classroom as well, King was named a Second Team Academic All-America. He sports a 3.2 GPA as a German/international relations double major with a minor in Spanish.

The TTL Bamberg team will begin its season in September, with the month of November devoted to touring Europe and the United States. Perhaps King's Court will road trip to New Mexico, UTEP, Houston, or LSU, where King will be playing in exhibition games this fall.

Other ex-Bison to play in Europe include Jaye Andrews, Bob Barry, Bo Heiden, Steve Leshinski, Deb Okorodudu, Mike Page, Ed and Steve Sigl, David Shehadi, John Watson, and Greg Leggett.

Equestrian team places second in final show

BY JENNIFER WALSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In its final show of the year, held this past Sunday at the University of Pittsburgh, the equestrian team pooled its efforts for a second-place finish overall, with archrival Penn State taking top honors for the first time this season.

Wilson College, an all-female school specializing in horses, finished three points behind Bucknell at the Pitt show, but ensured its place as regional champions of the 1991-92 season and will go on to compete for the intercollegiate national championship as a team.

Turning in especially strong performances for Bucknell were riders Cathy Retallack '93, Becky Christie '92, Jeanine Romanelli '93, and Beverly Shaw '92, all of whom captured at least one blue ribbon in their various classes. Christie also went on to compete for high-point rider of the day after taking first place in both her novice flat and fence classes. The ride-off consisted of a very difficult test whereby each rider had to perform a posting trot, figure-eight at the canter demonstrating change of lead, hand gallop and halt.

Although the team did not ride as well at this meet as in events past, the team members were pleased with the outcome. According to Captain Jo Meszoly '94, Bucknell was at a slight disadvantage after having missed a week of practice due to spring break while other schools were still in session.

A solid finish in its last show was an appropriate end to a season in which the team only once finishing lower than second place out of 12 teams.

"I thought the horses at Pitt were good—we only had two really bad draws. I was pleased with how we did. We're definitely one of the smaller teams, but we've been very competitive at every show," commented Meszoly. "Our goal for next year is to get organized early so we can make nationals as a team."

Retallack, team president, agreed. "I think the season went well. Everyone has improved and we've really pulled together as a team," she said.

Now that the regular season is over, riders who were able to accumulate a certain number of points in their class level will go on to compete this weekend at regionals. Those individuals from Bucknell who qualified for regionals are Kelly Kordish '92, Jocelyn Perot '94, Brenda Rose '94, Beverly Shaw '92, Sharon Nesbitt '94, Amy Clare '92, Jeanine Romanelli '93, and Katie Kowalski '93. The top three riders of each region will then go on to compete at zones the following day, with each zone being made up of three regions.

The top two riders from each zone will then go on to compete in nationals at Morhead State University, Kentucky on May 2 and 3.

Kordish finished as the winner of the Caccione Cup, an award for the top open rider of the region, and will therefore automatically go to nationals in that division to compete both on the flat and over the fences. Other riders who will be competing on the flat and over fences are Romanelli, Rose and Perot.

Cycling gets into gear over break

Team competed at Bloomsburg, Carnegie–Mellon, Penn State, Columbia, Lehigh

BY CHRIS NEUMANN AND ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The collegiate cycling season officially opened over spring break, and the Bucknell cyclists produced mixed results, winning at Bloomsburg and placing second at Carnegie-Mellon, but running into bad luck elsewhere.

At Penn State on March 21, the Category C riders rode 20 one-mile laps, and despite some team tactical errors, Jim Ruiz '95 managed to place 11th. In the 35-mile A race, Lee Lefkowitz '93 had some mechanical difficulties after a near-crash, and Chris Neumann '95 dropped back to help his teammate rejoin the field. After this chase effort, the two still held on for 13th and 15th.

After a strategy session that night, luck changed the following day at Bloomsburg. The races were shortened as a snowstorm approached, and in the C race, Peter Conn '95 and Oliver Hasse '93 worked together to place 8th and 10th respectively. The snow started to stick to the pavement by the start of the 20-lap A race.

Two laps into the race, Neumann rode away from the field in a four man breakaway group, which included a former professional and an Olympic hopeful. Three laps later, a mechanical difficulty put Neumann 15 seconds down on the lead riders. For the remainder of the race, Neumann battled time and the elements to catch the lead riders, one by one.

With two laps to go, he was again in the lead along with a Cornell rider. They sprinted it out for the win, and at the finish line, Neumann came across with hands raised in victory as the Cornell rider took second. Minutes later, the field came in, and Lefkowitz placed 10th, with Tim Peterson '93 following in 13th.

At the following Saturday's race at Columbia University, wind gusts up to 60 mph made it difficult for the riders to even stay upright. The Bison battled riders from all over the East, and Neumann was again in a position to place in the top five when a Penn State rider lost control of his bicycle and crashed into Neumann, taking both riders out of the race.

At Lehigh the next day the tough pace and blocking tactics of the large teams from Cornell and Penn State controlled the race, pushing the struggling Bison to the back of the pack.

Ruiz, however, entered a C category race at Carnegie-Mellon University, and found success. Early on, a CMU rider broke away from the field and took the lead. Ruiz led several chase efforts, and was eventually successful in breaking away. He and two other riders chased for five miles, until Ruiz realized powered away on a solo effort.

He could not catch the eventual winner and had to settle for second place, coming in over a minute ahead of the rest of the field. With this strong effort, Ruiz stands in second place in the M.A.T. race series.

The Cycling Bison hope for a strong showing at UMass and West Point.

Sophomore rush creates 25% decrease in Greek funding

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

News Feature
Second of a series

As the realities associated with sophomore rush rapidly approach both the Greek and non-Greek students of Bucknell, it is becoming apparent that the transition into the new system will be accompanied by several unavoidable hardships. One of the most pressing issues facing the Greeks involves lost revenues due to the absence of sophomores in the chapters.

> Funding cuts brought about by sophomore rush "will decrease our capability for a lot of programming."
> —Eva Szreniawski '93
> Panhellenic Council President

Essentially, each fraternity and sorority will be losing twenty-five percent of last year's revenue, which is, according to Panhellenic Council President Eva Szreniawski '93, a "considerable amount of money." For some smaller Greek letter organizations, it could mean financial disaster.

It may be too soon to estimate just how detrimental such a loss might be to each chapter, though Szreniawski acknowledges that financially it benefits no one, least of all Panhel.

Under normal conditions, the council would receive dues from each chapter, as well as a considerable sum of money for rush registration. Under sophomore rush, the chapter dues will be smaller, and the rush registration money will not appear until next year. As a result, Panhel is already facing the burden of functioning with less money.

Szreniawski says that she is uncertain about where, specifically, these budget cuts would occur, though she expects the financial limitations will affect the number of conferences the group attends.

As the main governing body of the sororities, this type of cutback would be unfortunate. "The conferences are very educational in that the officers attend them as soon as they get into office," said Szreniawski. In other words, they are, as it happens, a training period for the new officers, and a time for them to work together as a group and become acquainted with one another.

Eva Szreniawski '93, Panhellenic Council president, admits sophomore rush will bring financial hardships, but is confident they will be "overcome."

She also noted that the council would cut the number of programs that it normally does, saying, "It will decrease our capability for a lot of programming, and to co-sponsor a lot of programs."

Pete Brady '93, the Interfraternity Council president, echoed Szreniawski's comments, stating that the two groups' hands are tied. He expressed hope that in light of the fact that both groups are to receive less money from rush, they will be rewarded with more money from Bucknell Student Government (BSG).

In fact, when asked if the both councils were at the mercy of BSG, Szreniawski paused briefly before saying yes. Brady expressed confidence, however, that BSG would be sympathetic to their pleas given the changing atmosphere surrounding the Greek system.

Brady figures that any financial problems the fraternities will encounter will center around the fixed bills to maintain the house, such as heating bills. Whereas a house of seventy brothers may divide the cost among themselves this year, this number could be less than fifty brothers sharing the same costs next year. Likewise, the chapters must make cutbacks similar to those of Panhel and IFC, and Brady said this could lead to less social activities.

While he did note that chapters are not permitted to allocate chapter money for alcohol, he said that the budget cuts would simply result in less money for entertainment at the registered parties. These projections are, however, merely speculative, as each house will ultimately decide on its own where the cuts will occur.

Another concern of both presidents was that Greek Week activities would be scaled down in an effort to save money. This would deal a horrible blow to the Greek system, as this is the main time-period set aside for philanthropic fundraising.

Last year, the Greeks raised over $3,000 for local charities, though they have come under fire in the past for failing to do enough for the community. Will these same people stand for a cutback in philanthropy next year due to a lack of money? It seems doubtful.

Szreniawski noted that the University has undertaken some compensatory measures to contend with the money that would have been generated by sophomore rush for both Panhel and IFC.

When asked if this money was equal to, or greater than, the amount that they normally re-

First female chaplain named

Honors graduate from Vassar to bring "youth and energy"

BY THERESA KANE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Once on the stage and now in the pulpit, Rev. Alison Boden joins Bucknell as the first female chaplain in the history of the University.

Formerly a professional actress, Boden decided to enter the ministry after volunteer experience in a pediatric AIDS ward in Harlem Hospital caused her to reconsider what was "fundamentally important" to her.

Boden is ordained in the United Church of Christ and is currently assistant Protestant chaplain at Union College in Schenectady, New York. She graduated with honors from Vassar College.

Jim Hammerlee will step down as interim university chaplain and begin his early retirement this June. Boden's duties will begin officially on July 1.

According to Hammerlee, Boden "ranked highly not only with the search committee but also with the additional evaluation team of students and faculty."

Boden said that she looks forward to "making the chapel a part of university life and a place where students will be compelled to go."

She stated that she sees "a real rift" in the Protestant community at Bucknell and hopes to bring together what she now calls "a divided community." She said she is also interested in organizing inter-faith and ecumenical services with the Jewish and Roman Catholic communities.

When asked how it feels to be the first woman to be the first woman chaplain at Bucknell, she said that "women are such a small percent of the ministry of any denomination that we all feel like we are the first."

William Becker, chair and professor of religion, she said that Boden, who will be thirty years old this summer, will bring "youth and energy" to the chaplaincy and will be "quite a dynamic and energetic chaplain who will be trying to make contacts with student groups and get involved in joint programming."

For example, earlier this year at Union College, Boden organized a panel to discuss the film Thelma and Louise. Students and faculty discussed the religious and spiritual dimensions of the social problems presented in the movie. Boden said that she would like to do this type of programming at Bucknell.

Boden has already begun sensitizing herself to facing the Bucknell community. She said that she has been reading back issues of The Bucknellian in an effort to get to know the campus community.

Diverse group rallies in D.C. for pro-choice

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A large contingent of Bucknell students left the conservative hills of Bucknell to join in one of the largest-ever pro-choice rallies last Sunday, April 5, in Washington, D.C.

The students travelled by bus and car to participate in the "March for Women's Lives," which attracted over a half-million advocates of freedom of choice in the abortion battle, including an estimated crowd from Bucknell exceeding 100 people.

Amanda Swarr '95 arranged the bus trip to Washington as a part of her efforts to revive the Pro-Choice Action League on campus.

Swarr described the crowd of well over half a million people as "overwhelming."

Jen Karpiel '92 joined the many students and area residents who journeyed by car. "The turnout was fantastic," said Karpiel. "I think Pennsylvania was particularly well represented, and recent injustice in the courts provoked a strong turnout."

Vanessa Jones '95, another participant in the march, said that "every kind of person was there." Despite the different groups and interests represented, Swarr said that "everyone had the common bond of supporting a woman's right to reproductive freedom."

Women and men from all over the country travelled to D.C. in support of abortion rights. Karpiel emphasized the variety of participants, noting "there were men, women, families, and several generations of people all supporting one cause."

Sexual assault at Bucknell: the plight of the victim

Editor's note: This article is the first in a series examining incidents of rape and sexual assault on campus. Several victims have come forward to tell their stories in an effort to educate the campus about problems that exist and alternatives which are available for all parties involved. Although the names have been changed, details of the incidents appear exactly as told by the victims.

Returning from Spring Break, a group of freshman friends got together for the evening. Karen was especially glad to see her best friend Mark. They lay on her bed for hours talking just like they had many times before. Karen fell asleep and awoke to find Mark on top of her making sexual advances. Shocked and confused she tried to push him away but could not. After a few minutes she was able to roll over, throwing him off of her. They both fell back to sleep, and he left early the next morning. What should she do?

"I was in shock when I woke up," said Karen. "I couldn't believe it happened. I tried to pretend it didn't happen." This is not an unusual reaction, according to Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center. "One of the common responses to this type of trauma is to be in a state of shock or disbelief especially in an acquaintance situation. Women don't want to believe someone they know is capable of hurting them in this way."

Unsure of what to do, Karen did nothing. At eight o'clock the next evening she told a friend, but still could not decide what to do. As the days passed, she couldn't concentrate and would cry when alone, always wanting to be with other people. After a week and a half, she confronted Mark about the incident. He admitted that he had a problem, and assured her that he would go to Psychological Services to get help. She felt obligated to continue the friendship because he said he was trying to get help.

Karen thought about pressing charges, but said "because we were close friends, I felt I couldn't get him in trouble." She was also overwhelmed by her options. "There were several numbers...I didn't know which one to call." Unable to make a decision, Karen went to Psychological Services and received counseling and support. She continued her contact with Mark, and finally felt she could trust him again. He assured her "it would never happen again" and that he was "better."

> New policy aims for sensitivity.

A few months later, Mark assaulted another woman on campus and went on to rape a third woman. The rape victim filed a formal complaint within the University.

Under the University's new Sexual Assault Policy, students may submit a written formal report of assault incidents to the Judicial Administrator for Sexual Assault (JASA). The JASA then calls a meeting of the Hearing Board on Sexual Assault, composed of two faculty members, two students, and one administrator, all selected by the Committee on Student Conduct.

Sally Nyquist, chair and associate professor of biology and the current JASA, stresses the adjudication procedures emphasize due process and protection of rights. "We work hard to carefully respect the rights of the individuals involved. Our goal is to establish an environment in which the truth can come out, one which is supportive of both the aggrieved party and the respondent," she said.

If the JASA has determined that there was "physical contact or ceive from rush, she stated simply, "It's something."

The financial burdens imposed on the Greeks by sophomore rush are just another roadblock for the group to step around, or trip over.

The period of waiting before the actual implementation occurs is proving to be the most difficult, as each chapter develops makeshift solutions to large-scale problems.

As Szreniawski stated, "Financially, [sophomore rush] is a minor setback, but it is nothing we can't overcome." Only time will tell.

RALLY From page 1

Democratic Presidential candidates Bill Clinton and Edmund G. Brown Jr., as well as former candidate Paul Tsongas, were among the participants. Swarr stated that "it was a nice feeling to have a sense of support among the people there."

The march was particularly timely, as many abortion rights supporters are concerned that Roe v. Wade could be overturned or severely restricted in the near future. The Supreme Court will begin to hear arguments later this month on a Pennsylvania law which would restrict access to abortions with a 24-hour waiting period and a spousal-notification requirement.

If the Supreme Court declares, in its April ruling, that abortion is not a fundamental right, Congress will have the power to enact laws which would legalize abortions.

"If we can't change their minds about protecting abortion rights," declared one rally advertisement, "we can vote to change their faces in November."

CORRECTIONS

In last week's "Street Beat" Jackie Shriver's quote was incorrect. It should have read: "Student's are forced to take courses outside their department that they don't want to take to satisfy requirements, like the writing requirement. Not all departments offer W-2 courses.

Last week's article on the multicultural course proposal by the Bucknell Students Government incorrectly reported that a motion concerning such a requirement had been passed. The motion was tabled, not passed.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

WHY YOU SHOULD START PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT WITH YOUR EYES CLOSED.

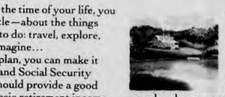
For retirement to be the time of your life, you have to dream a little—about the things you've always wanted to do: travel, explore, start a business. Just imagine...

With a dream and a plan, you can make it happen. Your pension and Social Security should provide a good basic retirement income, but what about all those extras that make your dreams possible? You'll probably need some additional savings.

THE DREAM IS YOUR OWN. WE CAN HELP YOU WITH THE PLAN.

TIAA-CREF Supplemental Retirement Annuities (SRAs), tax-deferred annuities for people like you in education and research, are a good way to save for retirement and save on taxes now. SRAs are easy—you make contributions through your institution before your taxes are calculated, so you pay less tax now.

You pay no tax on your SRA contributions and earnings until you receive them as income. And saving regularly means your contributions and their earnings can add up quickly.



What else makes SRAs so special? A broad range of allocation choices, from the safety of TIAA to the investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity; no sales charges; a variety of ways to receive income, including annuities, payments over a fixed period, or cash. You may also be able to borrow against your SRA accumulation before you retire.*

All this, plus the top investment management that has helped make TIAA-CREF the largest retirement system in the country.

So start dreaming and planning for the time of your life. Because the sooner you start your SRA, the greater your savings and your retirement will be.

President For a Day is no cakewalk

Allison Englehardt wasn't sure what was in store for her on Monday when her name was announced as the winner of the senior-week raffle to be President For a Day. She spent most of yesterday following President Sojka's schedule, which he termed as 'unusually light.'

Top left: Thursday morning's schedule began with a 6:30 a.m. workout with Mike Turpack, at The Athletic Department on Market Street. By 7:30, President Englehardt and Mr. Sojka were headed back to the President's house for breakfast before going into the office at 8:15 a.m.

Top right: After receiving an update on Saturday's Admissions Day from Judith Compton-Ellis, assistant director of admissions, and posing for a photo shoot, the morning was almost half-over. Englehardt and Sojka then had a meeting with a small group of administrators, including Sharon Poff (pictured), director of public relations and publications, about a lecture-series idea.

Bottom right: After yet another meeting, this time with some faculty members, Englehardt and Sojka had a chance to relax over lunch in the President's dining room in the Langone Center.

Left: Englehardt completed her tenure as President For a Day when she attended the President's student-leader reception last evening and chatted with some of the trustees who are on campus this weekend for the Trustee Access Day. University examines judicial system, favors 'multi-centered' approach

BY CATHY DARRUP AND TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Calling for a "decentralized" judicial system, a task force comprised of faculty, students, and staff is analyzing the philosophy behind the current disciplinary system.

Barbara Shailor, acting vice president for student services, appointed the task force in response to the report submitted in January by the External Review Committee, which bit visciously into the current system, stating that, "the adjudication process excludes peers, is surprisingly secret, is severely overburdened and therefore very slow, invokes a process that is vague, unclear, and muddled, is thought to be applied unequally, and rarely, if ever, invokes consequential penalties."

Second in a series

Although no formal recommendations have yet been presented, the committee seems likely to advocate three major issues: (1) decentralization of the judicial system, (2) a high ratio of students to professional staff on preceding judicial boards, and (3) a high degree of input from the entire student body.

To have a "decentralized or 'multi-centered' approach to the judicial process would be advantageous to the campus community," stated Jack Pyper, associate dean of arts and sciences and co-chair of the task force. "It would have more of the campus involved, but all the jurisdictions would be 'in tune' [coordinated] with each other in their punishments or actions they're taking."

Dan Gilbert, assistant professor of management, agreed, saying that a decentralized system would take into consideration the different contexts of crimes and would raise the appropriate concerns of the groups involved. Another important advantage to a decentralized system is that students would have an opportunity to be more involved in the judicial actions taken against their peers, he said.

"The adjudication process excludes peers, is surprisingly secret, is severely muddled, is thought to be applied unequally, and rarely, if ever, invokes consequential penalties."
—External review committee

According to John Dunlop, dean of students, the review of the judicial system has long been needed. The current system, heavily criticized by the External Review Committee in its report of Student Services, depends almost entirely on Dunlop to make disciplinary decisions. "I have become the judicial system," Dunlop said.

"The outside reviewers weren't very eloquent, but what they said is that any system that relies on one individual has flaws. And I believe that," Dunlop continued.

Because the Committee on Student Conduct—designed to review disciplinary cases—rarely meets, the burden of deciding nearly all judicial issues has come to rest on Dunlop. Only recently, Gerald Commerford, assistant dean of housing, lifted some of this burden when he began reviewing the cases of first-time alcohol offenders. Dunlop said that he favors a switch to a decentralized system.

"I have a mental picture of what might be workable," said Dunlop, suggesting that minor offenses be considered by residence hall staffs and that only major offenses be considered by a central committee.

All three elements of the University which were represented on the committee—students, faculty, and administration—agreed that universal representation at this stage has been essential. But the trend of discussions seems to indicate that the group favors a high ratio of students to faculty serving on Bucknell's judicial board.

According to Sandra Green '93, committee member, one of the problems of the previous judicial system was that students were not treated as adults, "except when we got in trouble. We want to move away from that."

Students were not treated as adults, "except when we got in trouble. We want to move away from that."
—Sandra Green '93

Having a majority of students on the judicial board could possibly resolve Green's worry, but Kathryn Gallo '92, committee member, voiced a concern that the board may be "too BSG [Bucknell Student Government] based." She feels that more random student involvement would be beneficial in that it would provide a different perspective and insights to solve the problems under consideration.

In response to the concern for greater student involvement, Shailor asked BSG to recommend the composition of the task force at the next level of action. This new task force would be responsible to "pick up where the philosophical review [task force] left off" and would deal with the actual structuring of the judicial board. On Sunday, Apr. 5, the BSG passed a motion proposing its recommendation. The motion reflects an expressed need for continuity on the committees and recommends that some members of the Philosophical committee should also serve on the Structural committee.

With the current system, students can opt either to have their cases heard by the dean or by the Committee on Student Conduct, comprised, in part, of students. As Dunlop noted, students generally choose to "go to the dean, not to the committee. People fear the committee more than they fear me. I hear that the student members are tougher."

The discussions of the committee, though not yet final, suggest that students will no longer be given the option which the current system allows.

Education is the one crucial element that is missing in the present judicial system, according to BSG

A decentralized judicial system will take into consideration different contexts and crimes in ways the current system cannot, according to Dan Gilbert, assistant professor of management.

President Mike Thomas '94. "A student needs to be educated about the violation he has committed," Thomas said, "and not just be forced to pay a fine."

The committee seems to agree. "The committee is not in favor of fines," said Pyper, who believes that community service and other methods would be more appropriate.

Thomas believes that if a student is assigned a certain number of community service hours, he will be forced to sacrifice time—something the student is usually not willing to give up. "It is a punishment he will 'feel' more than the few seconds it takes to write a check."

Education is a crucial and essential goal of a judicial system, and it is one element that this Judicial Review Board hopes to implement into the system. "We are looking for educational sanctions to tie closer into the violation," Kari Kuehl, associate director for developmental programs, said. Educating the student—through a community service program or peer counseling, for example—will make more of an impact on the student and will serve him and the University more effectively, she said.

threat of physical contact without consent which alone or accompanied by speech or gestures focuses on a sexual outcome," a specially trained investigator is appointed by the JASA to accumulate all pertinent data as well as interview persons associated with the incident or with either party. The investigator then presents his findings to the board, at which time both parties are represented by an advisor from within the University community.

"Everyone involved knows what a painful process this is for both parties," notes Nyquist. "This is a hearing, but there is no harsh cross-examination. All questions are submitted to the chair, and read if appropriate." Members of the board as well as the investigator go through many hours of psychological and legal training.

Since the approval and implementation of the policy last fall, the board has heard two cases, one of which was Mark's.

When she learned that a formal complaint had been filed, Karen decided to testify against Mark at the hearing. Subsequent to her decision he came to speak with her. "He tried to manipulate and scare me into not testifying," said Karen. She recalls him saying, "anything that happens to me is your fault. They have no case against me." Although she was frightened, Karen testified along with the other two women, and Mark has since been expelled from the University.

"The consequences can be grave," said Nyquist. "We follow guidelines from the student handbook, and the sanctions range from education and counseling to permanent expulsion from the University."

"The University handled the hearing process well," said Karen. "Men and women should know that there is a process they can go through if there is an assault."

Nyquist says she feels that the new policy "works well." "We get extensive feedback from the parties' advisors," and she describes the board as "introspective."

Karen is the innocent victim of sexual harassment. The ordeal has had a profound and lasting effect which she will never forget. According to Arlyne Hoyt, director of Psychological Services, "sexual assault is a trauma that can raise emotions which are devastating."

"Since the assault, I have had a hard time trusting people, and I'm very insecure," said Karen.

Experts on campus agree that increased education and heightened awareness can help to prevent future incidents like Karen's.

"There definitely does need to be greater awareness and education," said Nyquist. "It's amazing some of the misconceptions and ideas about conduct that exist."

"A great deal is happening on campus that is not recognized as sexual assault because of our socialization," said Hoyt.

Next issue: What other options are available for victims and perpetrators? What support systems exist on campus? What is the relationship between the University adjudication process and criminal proceedings? Another victim tells her story and how she dealt with being the victim of sexual assault.

Amherst hires 1st female physics prof

Jian Ma will become the first female professor to join the physics department's staff. Ma, a post-doctorate research associate at the University of Pennsylvania, was chosen from 813 applicants by the seven voting members of the department.

Ma's hiring coincides with Amherst's publicized desire to diversify the science faculty, beginning with the physics department. Amherst physics Professor Dudley Towne said more women and minorities were sought for the position but the committee of seven chose those who would best serve the department and university. Towne also commented that Ma was an "engaging lecturer" and that her qualifications showed her "awareness of theory and the broader implications of her research."

Three students assaulted at F&M

Three male students were attacked by three local men the week of March 9 at Franklin and Marshall College.

Three sophomores were on their way back from a fraternity party at 3:45 a.m. They reached a gate, a grey Chevette pulled up beside them, and three men yelled at them. The men, who appeared to be in their early 20's according to the students, asked the sophomores where they could find a party.

The students replied that all the parties for the evening were over. Then the men jumped out of the car and began attacking the students.

Two of the three students were injured. As a result of this incident, F&M will be heightening its security patrols between midnight and 3 a.m. Also, safety will be emphasized with the installation of a new telephone system this summer with more call boxes installed around and off campus.

Brown speaks to Colorado College

Democratic presidential candidate Jerry Brown spoke at Colorado College the week of February 23.

Speaking less than two weeks before that state's March 3 primary, Brown challenged what he called the "corrupt political system." Four hundred people attended the event which was arranged by the Political Union and the political science department at Colorado College.

Brown advocated cutting defense spending by up to 50 percent over the next five years. Another Brown idea is to implement a nationalized health plan like that used in Canada, and imposing a flat 13% tax rate instead of the present tax system. When asked about his choice of Jesse Jackson as a running mate, Brown said he wanted a vice president who could organize and inspire. On the abortion issue, Brown responded that the government should stay out of the issue.

Tufts considers banning ROTC

Tufts University President Jean Mayer said March 25, that there is little chance that the Board of Trustees will vote to ban ROTC scholarships because the Defense Department contributes approximately $800,000 in grant to the University.

The Senate voted 12-11 March 8 to recommend to the Trustees to ban ROTC scholarships by the year 1998 if the DOD did not reverse its policy of banning homosexuals from military service. According to Mayer, the Senate vote was not objective and will not have much impact upon the actions of the Trustees.

Mayer also said that the Senate was very partial in its vote and that there is absolutely no way to replace the $800,000 that the Defense Department gives to Tufts. Besides, Mayer feels the usefulness of the ROTC training program is undisputed.

Robert Andrew Parker's work featured in Center Gallery

BY BETH B. MORILLA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The autobiographical photographs chronicling the experiences of soldier, jazz musician, naturalist and American realist artist Robert Andrew Parker have been praised since the 1950's. Parker's self-titled collection, which includes a wide range of photograph, from his experiences aas a soldier in WWII to his expeditions in the Himalayas, will be on display in Center Gallery from April 11 to June 7. xperiences in the Himalayas.

The eight week exhibit also consists of portraits, military subjects, and landscapes captured by Parker's vivid, radiant style that ranks him as one of the strongest artists of contemporary American realism. Robert Metzger, director of the Center Gallery, describes Parker's artwork as being "more than any of his contemporaries." He believes that the paintings "speak to the artist's life, to what it means to be an American artist in the second half of the 20th century. . . . Parker's vital expressionistic inclinations have produced an amazing body of mainstream paintings. Parker's shimmering, dazzling style is instantly recognizable in oil, watercolor, etching or drawing."

The featured collection includes works shared by actor Edward Herrmann, a 1965 Bucknell graduate with an honorary doctorate earned in 1983. Herrmann, whose own achievements include being an Emmy nominee and Tony Award winner, will host a lecture on Parker's works Saturday, April 11 at 4:30 p.m. in the Gallery Theatre. Following the talk an opening reception for the exhibit will be held.

The "Robert Andrew Parker" exhibit is jointly supported by a grant from Mr and Mrs. Morris Andrews Long, Mr and Mrs. Robert Weis, the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts, and the Bucknell Association for the Arts.

The Center Gallery, located on the third floor of the Langone Center, is open to the public Monday through Friday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. and on Saturday and Sunday from 1 to 4 p.m. There is no charge for admission.

Marsalis delights audience

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Concert Review

Last Friday evening, saxophonist Branford Marsalis, following in his brother Wynton's footsteps, performed his first Bucknell concert for a near-capacity crowd at the Weis Center. Joining Marsalis in his ensemble were bassist Robert Hurst and drummer Jeff "Tain" Watts.

Throughout the 90-minute program, which included works by Duke Ellington and Robert Hurst, the 32-year -old musician proved himself to be charismatic as well as talented. Between sets, which often ran into one another, Marsalis bantered with the audience as well as with Hurst and Watts. The saxophonist dedicated his final number, Ellington's "Mood Indigo," to many people, including Robert Hurst, Sr. Marsalis' dedication and sidebars earned the musician several laughs from the audience.

The highlight of the evening was the incredible performance of Marsalis. A musician who began playing rather late in life for a professional (he only took up the saxophone at age 15), Marsalis impressed the crowd with performances on both the tenor and soprano saxophones. An animated player who engages physically in his performances, tapping his foot and strolling about the stage, Marsalis shared the spotlight with Hurst and Watts, who each performed several solos and were equally impressive.

Following the concert, Marsalis met with audience members, signing autographs for many fans who waited to congratulate him on his excellent performance.

Poets support Black Arts Festival

BY MEGAN BLAMBLE

As a vital component of the current Black Arts Festival, "Aspects of Art," three gifted poets will share selected pieces from their published works in the Bison on April 15 at 7 p.m. Wadud Ahmad, Major Jackson, and Ali Barr, current students at Temple University, are all devoted to the African-American community and offer their creative talents as the voice of the contemporary African culture.

Described as a "visionary poet, lecturer of love, and promoter of peace," Major Jackson has many commendable achievements under his belt. A respected local poet, humanitarian, and youth activist, Jackson has made many efforts to instigate black progression, such as his service as President of N.A.A.C.P. (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) Progressive Chapter and Treasurer of the African-American Student Union at Temple. He is also the co-author of Back to Afrika With a White Woman and a member of the National Black Authors Tour.

Wadud Ahmad was inspired to take up the pen due to his intensive study of the African struggle and recognition of the frustrating predicament minorities must bear in this country. He offers such advice as, "May the ink of these words write a message within your hearts of change."

Other upcoming events of the Black Arts Festival include a thought provoking and powerful drama Black Man, Black Woman to be performed by the Adelphia Repertory Theatre of Philadelphia as well as a performance by jazz flutist Galen Abdur-Razzaq on April 23 in the Bison.

Nicolas Collins, member of "After Haydn," rehearses on a trombone of his own design, invented by hooking the instrument to a digital signal processor by means of retractable leashes and computer cables.

After Haydn ends Gallery Series with innovative style

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For those music-lovers searching for a sound which hasn't hit the Lewisburg air waves, how about a performance of trombone-propelled electronics and a mutantrumpet? Those very instrument are the creations of Nicolas Collins and Ben Neill, who will be presenting the final concert of the Gallery Series., entitled After Haydn on Tuesday night at 8 p.m. in the Langone Center Gallery.

Both Collins and Neill employ the use of unusual instruments in their performances. Collins is a trombonist whose instrument is of his own invention. His trombone is an old one that is joined by retractable leashes and computer cables to a table filled with electronic devices. A speaker takes the place of the trombone's mouthpiece, and the entire instrument is wined to a digital signal processor. Collins refers to this set-up as "trombone-propelled electronics."

Neill, a trumpeter, performs on the mutantrumpet. This instrument, which was invented by Neill, is a combination of two trumpets with a slide, which permits the instrument to have greater range and flexibility than those of a regular trumpet. Neill works with the synthesizer and the mutantrumpet to devise a new form of music that stems from avant-garde, rock, minimalist, country, and Baroque styles.

Both musicians have active careers composing and recording both the solo and ensemble levels. Collins studied composition at Wesleyan University, and Neill, who continues to study and work with minimalist composers, is a graduate of the Manhattan School of Music.

The Gallery Series, directed by William Duckworth, chair of the music department, is a series of performances that focuses on innovative and unusual types of music. The Bucknell Department of Music and Meet the Composer have both provided grants to help fund the concerts of the Gallery Series. The concert will be free of charge.

Deciding where to live: on or off campus?

How to find a house off-campus

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last spring, when I was a sophomore, my friends and I started to search for a house for our junior year. Everything we found was blocks from campus and was built in a way that you had to go through two bedrooms to get to the bathroom. We decided then to start looking right away for our senior year. Even last spring, some of the most desirable houses were already rented.

The search for an apartment in Lewisburg is not impossible, by any means, but it is trying to find a quality and reasonably priced place to call your own. And perhaps even more difficult than finding a likable place is locating who owns it or rents it.

Many apartments in town are owned by locals, but according to Martha Barrick of Caldwell Banker, "Most are owned by absentee landlords." For these apartments, one must go to a relator. Unfortunately, the houses in town don't post stickers which indicate which is rented by which agency. If you are inside an apartment and like it, it's best just to ask its student tenant who the landlord is. Really, its the only way to find out. If you're open to suggestions, then head into town or out to Route 15 to consult with the rental departments of local real estate agencies.

According to Helen Prah, of Classic Realty, a two bedroom apartment will rent for "$495 to $600," depending upon its quality. Utilities such as water, electricity, oil for heat, sewage, lawncare, and snow removal are not typically included. Twelve-month leases are also almost unavoidable. The price range does not vary according to area—Second Street costs just as much as St. Catherine Street.

Because many landlords are from out-of-state, their records needs to be checked carefully. Will the real estate agency he or she deals through take care of any maintenance problems that you might encounter? Or will you be left on your own to deal with an overflowing toilet and frozen pipes? The students that presently live in the apartment can give you the most accurate picture. Neglectful landlords do exist; one student house on Seventh Street just recently got condemned because of structural damage and its inhabitants asked to leave.

The students who presently live in your apartment are also useful for utility bill estimates, and are often a source for furniture. Most apartments do not come furnished.

Read your leasing contract carefully and most of all, don't put down a security deposit unless you're pretty positive that you'll receive permission to live off-campus. It would be rather expensive to have pay for two residences.

Pleasures, problems of renting

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For those of you who are bemoaning the fact that you have to live on campus again next year and won't have the opportunity to sit on your front porch and drink beer or turn on the cable T.V. while cooking dinner, cheer up...you're not missing as much as you think you are, especially if you have a "slumlord."

When you have a slumlord, mildew smells, decaying walls, and household pests are about as common as a rainy day in Lewisburg. My roommates and I have a particularly interesting situation because our slumlord (who we have yet to meet) sends his elderly father over as a handyman. Since there is but one outlet in each room of the house full of women (many, many electrical appliances), my good ol' handyman is a familiar sight.

As to the general crookedness of my house on Sixth Street, along with many others, the locals all claim that it goes back to the "Great Flood of '72." So although it upset the natural balance of the house to the point that it looks on the verge of toppling over, I keep hearing that it should stay in one piece. It's okay so far!

To accompany the lovely crookedness of my Sixth Street home, there are the sidewalks, which, I must say, do wonders for it. I say "accompany" because, if you stand on the crooked sidewalk, the house looks normal.

Off campus, as well as on campus, household pests are a concern. In fact, my house had a pest of its own: a rat my roommates and I later named "Mooch." We came home to chewed up rice and pasta bits strewn all over the floor of the kitchen. Unfortunately there is an abundance of cracks in old houses such as mine which serves as an adequate challenge to any rat. To top off the pest experience, we soon found that his favorite "nesting" spot was amongst the pots and pans in the bottom of our oven!

In addition to household pests, there is also the household pet factor. This is because, even if you do not plan on having a pet, they make themselves at home in your pad anyway. Random dogs and cats have no qualms whatsoever about checking out the houses downtown. In the warm weather this scenario is especially common and I recommend shots for those of you who are allergic to animals.

I really should not complain so much about living off-campus for personally, I love it. So, to confirm all the rumors about what fun it is to have your own place with a permanent keg in the kitchen, one definite plus in living downtown is its proximity to Market Street. Whether you've got to stop at Rea & Derrick during the afternoon or walk home from the bar(s) at night, your residence is practically next door.

And as I walk around the streets surrounding my home, I always feel like I'm going to run into Mr. Rogers. The locals are genuinely nice. I can even leave my car doors unlocked and not worry about a thing. (Maybe not anymore!)

Living off-campus is an excellent transition from dorm life to real life. First, you learn to manage your own funds. The cost of living off-campus is about comparable to that of dorm room plus cafeteria food, so it doesn't leave you broke. Although the bills appear threatening initially; it's not so bad when you split them with roommates. Second, living off-campus allows you to separate academics from the rest of your life. When you're suffering from Bucknellitis, off-campus is safe territory to escape.

Some may disagree with these pleasures and perils of living off-campus. For those of you who haven't gotten the chance to experience it for yourself, you'll just have to apply to find out.

The pros & cons of each residence hall

Should you choose a single in Hunt, Swartz, Kress, or Trax? Or a Gateway or a Mod?

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What room will you choose with your lucky or not-so-lucky lottery draw? Due to the changes in the Greek system, room selection is more confusing than ever. Juniors will be especially plagued with housing dilemas.

Who can live where?

Hunt Hall, typically a sophomore women's residence hall, will exclusively house junior and senior women come this fall, due to Panhellenic rules essentially stating that rushees may not make contact with sorority sisters outside of the rush parties. Living together on the same hall would pose a problem.

Because of this, junior women, if the motion is passed by BSG, will be allowed to block-book only in Hunt Hall. If this does not fill the rooms, then junior sorority sisters and those junior women with the worst lottery draws will be called upon to live there.

According to Assistant Dean for Housing, Gerald Commerford, this means that singles in Swartz, Kress, and Trax Halls, normally chosen by junior women, will now be more readily available to female sophomores. This "trickle-down" housing theory will also apply to male sophomores.

Gateways should still be senior lottery draws and Mods, juniors and sophomores picks. Roberts will basically remain a junior and senior lottery pick.

Advantages and disadvantages of each residence hall

Gateways: Kalman-Poshner, Malesardi, Roser, Silbermann, and Vidinghoff Halls

All Gateways have four single bedrooms, a kitchen/living room, a bathroom, air-conditioning, and cable. Kalman-Posner houses the Gateway laundry room however and Roser, is equipped with a computer room. Malesardi is closest to the parking lot, for those of you who are lazier than others, and Kalman-Posner and Silbermann back up to the Sunflower Childcare Center where children are dropped off to play and scream in the early a.m.

Two-hundred fifty-two students will get to live in Gateways. They will cost $2485 to live in during the 1992-93 school year.

Will anymore of the much sought-after Gateways ever be built?

Bucknell West or "the Mods"

No, they won't blow over. According to Commerford, "They are very stable." They were first built in 1972. The newest ones, #'s 1-8, 17, 18, 27 and 35 all have air-conditioning. There are 35 mods and all have two double bedrooms, a bath, and a kitchen/living room. Located along with them, across the highway from campus, are laundry and computer facilities. Some might consider the mods far from campus, especially on a rainy or snowy day when its tempting not to make the hike to campus. For the most part though, students like the extra freedom that being across Route 15 provides and being so close to the practice fields. Barbecues in their big "backdows. Swartz singles are equipped with two desks and closets, both which are immobile. Kress and Trax also possess "armoire-type" closets, while Hunt has deep, in-the-wall type closets. Swartz has air-conditioning, the other three dorms do not. Kress and Trax both also possess heating problems. One side of the building is usually rather cold, while the other side is such a sauna that windows have to be opened in the middle of winter to stay cool. As Kelly Shepard '93 of Kress says, "They're trying to create a tropical rain forest up here." In both dorms, it is the side facing onto the quad that is the overheated one. Water problems are also a problem in these two older dorms, with spurts of scalding hot and freezing cold water not being uncommon. Trax is on the University's priority [illegible] renovated this summer.

Swartz

Swartz has them; Roberts, Kress, and Trax do not. Men and women can not share Gateways or Mods.

Now all you have to do is come to a consensus among your friends about where to live!

Waiting for law school acceptance

BY WAYNE FERBERT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

We all do it in some form or another everyday. We all stress about something that we're hoping for. The risk of utter disappointment is far outweighed by the possible payoff. Around this time of year, the "it" is the long walk to the student mailbox to hear from prospective law schools.

Acceptance season is upon us and the "did you get in" flu has arrived. For those of you not acquainted with the "did you get in" flu, it is a lot like the "did you find a job yet" syndrome accompanied by the application shivers and the LSAT jitters. I am sure that you probably remember the acceptance letter season in high school as you waited to hear from your school of preference (Bucknell, of course). We all hoped for the big thick enveloped acceptance letter. So if you are a Bucknell senior waiting to hear from law school, you would probably think you struck it rich and got into Harvard if you got one of those pink "package too large to fit in your box" cards. But we all know that this is a myth, and it is not the size of your envelope but what is inside that counts!

This year's game of law school roulette has been extended thanks to problems with the new LSAT format and a malignant economy. Law schools are increasing their holding pools and examining applications more carefully to be certain that they will be able to fill their classes come the Fall of 1992. Most schools set internal deadlines of Ap. 1 for completing the application review process, but many have set new deadlines as late as May or June for notifying prospective students.

The economy, in general, has caused an increase in applicants for law school. As is usually the case, a person's inability to land a job will sometimes manifest itself in attending graduate school and acquiring an advanced degree. Some of the applicants are hedging their bets by seeking gainful employment and acceptance into law school at the same time with a clear intention to accept the job offer over the grueling hours offered by law school. Of course law schools are already as overcrowded as some jails (sort of a poetic justice) so opportunities are dwindling. These factors place law schools in a proverbial pickle jar. On the one hand, the applicant pool is larger, so the schools would appear to have more leeway in selectivity. Some of the applicants will choose not to attend because they were just using law school as a possible backup to a job. Even more of the applicants cannot afford law school because of the economy. So the law schools must play the part of an actuary and figure out how many students to accept to be sure to fill their Jurisprudence class come this Fall. Of course asking a lawyer to do an actuarial analysis is like asking an International Relations major to compute a differential equation — as in, it won't be happening anytime soon! So the process has been severely lengthened as the law schools attempt to reduce their risk accepting students the same way the applicants reduce risk by applying to nine or so law schools.

Law school is still quite a popular choice for Bucknell seniors. The most popular schools are in the Boston and Washington area and include schools such as Boston University, Harvard, George Washington, American, and Georgetown. Pittsburgh and Villanova are two popular Pennsylvania choices for graduating Bucknell seniors. These schools have prestigious reputations and the application process is often long, tedious, and highly competitive. The current group of law school applicants is the first to take the newly revised LSAT and some schools are not happy with the new format. Applying to law school is an expensive task itself at roughly $45 per application. But since the application process has been delayed for such a long period of time, one would naturally think that he/she was at least getting his/her money's worth out of the application fee.

Another student snaps under the strain of waiting for law school acceptances.

The waiting involved in the law school process can be a nerve-racking experience until you get that first acceptance letter in that really big envelope. Once you get over that first hump, the rest is downhill. Who can really feel sorry for you though? The payoff for a lawyer can be considerable. This litigation crazy world keeps screaming for law services despite the fact that there are almost five times as many lawyers now as there were twenty years ago. At least most law school applicants don't have to interview with yet another company along with 500 other applicants for one position. And after all, if one doesn't get into the school of choice, there is always the University of Jamaica at Montego Bay.

What the Health Is Going On?

Which sunglasses will protect your eyes?

By Joyce Dollinger and Lisa Lipari

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Are Ray-bans, one of the most popular brands of sunglasses on campus, effective protection for your eyes?

Although sunglasses have always been popular for their fashion value, protecting the eyes from UV rays are "the biggest concern today," according to Jackie Goff, an optician at Betz Optical near Evangelical Hospital. UVA rays differ from UVB rays because of wavelength and intensity. By not wearing appropriate sunglasses when there is strong sunlight or extreme glare, the damage one can do to eyes is the same as wearing no sunglasses at all. Vicky Kerstetter, from The Lewisburg Optical Shop on 35 N 3rd, feels "premature cataracts are linked to UV light" also. So, grab some shades when heading for the sun.

Wearers of contact lenses, especially ones of soft lens, should be especially concerned about wearing sunglasses. Soft lenses are hydrophilic, which means they allow water to permeate the lens. Water increases the magnitude of the sun's rays, thus increasing a person's chance of damaging the eyes.

A person must be careful when purchasing sunglasses. "The quality of the lenses [of street vendor sunglasses or the ones sold in beach stores are] not up to par with the ones in optical shops. Sometimes the cheap sunglasses make the eyesight distorted," said Jackie Goff.

To check the distortion of the sunglasses, hold the lenses up to light, preferably a fluorescent bulb and move them back and forth, up and down. Distortion in the light is bad for eyes. Although "there is no way for the consumer to test the sunglasses for UV ray protection, unless you have a UV meter," said Goff, "there should be a sticker on the front of the lens to let the buyer know if the lenses protect eyes from the UV rays." Kerstetter believes "there are very, very few sunglasses today that have no UV protection." She added, "we fill more prescription sunglasses than regular ones because many people can buy expensive and good quality sunglasses in their nearest pharmacy." They might not be fashionable, but they are just as protective.

When looking for sunglasses, tint is also important. "Mirror is especially good for winter sports. They eliminate all glare from the snow and comfort-wise they are terrific," said Kerstetter. It protects 100% against UVA rays. Kerstetter thinks "gray is the best because it leaves things true to their real color," and it protects the wearer 99-100% from UVA rays. Brown and green tints tend to give things a different color. The brown lens creates a red or pink tint and protects 98%. A person sees a grassy or blue tint through the green and it only protects the wearer 96-97%. Finally, the blue tinted or cosmetically tinted sunglasses are not as protective as other tints.

However, tint is not the only thing to look for when purchasing sunglasses. There are many different types of lenses, as well, each having its own benefits. Photochromatic lenses are a type of prescription lenses that darken when worn outside. They are available in both glass and plastic, and vary in speed of change, darkened color, temperature sensitivity, fatigue, and price. The glass lenses darken faster, turn grey or brown (instead of blue or bluish-purple), and are less sensitive to temperature (which means that the color of the plastic lenses varies according to temperature). Also, plastic lenses darken less and less as they are exposed to UV light for long periods of time, which may at times prove inconvenient. They also cost more than the glass lenses.

According to Corning Glassworks, the manufacturer of these photochromatic lenses, all four of their lenses "provide a high degree of ultraviolet ray blockage. They absorb 100% of UVB and at least 93% (up to 98% in the full sunglass tint) of UVA. Kerstetter said that "polarized lenses are wonderful. They eliminate heat waves from the road and glare from the snow and water." These sunglasses range from $60 to $100 without a prescription.

Another type of "specialty lenses" are Sportlife lenses. Designed for skiers, sailers, and people who enjoy the outdoors and wear glasses, these lenses have a special coating which increases visual acuity, reduces glare, and reduces reflections from behind. The lenses eliminate 100% UV light, 80% infra-red light, and 90% distracting blue light. The three lenses are called "Snowscreen," "Seascreen," and "Landscreen" and provide the wearer with versatility and comfort.

Each eyewear company markets its own style of frames and lenses, providing consumers with a vast array of glasses from which to choose. Ellesse sunwear by Marchon has the I-FX™ lens that has 100% UV and infrared protection. The lens is also made of polycarbonate material which is "scratch resistant and virtually unbreakable." The same material is used to make windshields for jet fighters. Up to 60 times more impact resistant than glass lenses, and 10 times more resistant than plastic lenses, they also have "SlipStop™ nose pads or temple tips providing a secure fit for active people," according to Marchon Eyewear.

Other popular types of eyewear are Rebo lenses, which are dark lenses with different mirrors (red, blue, silver) in the front, and reflect glare and Polaroid lenses which protect eyes by filtering out the glare. They come in gray or brown and are good for water. Vasily Gurerich of Glasses and Glamour in New York City thinks they are "the best on the market." In addition, Vuarnets are known to be unbreakable. Bausch and Lomb, Ferengetti, Bollé, Ray-Bans and Oakley are also popular brands on the market.

Shape and size of lens depend on personal preference. However, Vicky Kerstetter feels that in sports one must be careful and consider using polycarbonate lenses that do not shatter, rather than glass or plastic that would. As far as fashion is concerned, college students seem to like the tortoise-shell frame, metal or plastic, with gray 3 tint (the darkest available).

As the sunglass industry expands, it should become easier and easier to find a likable style that thoroughly protects the eyes. If you're confused, check with your local optometrist.

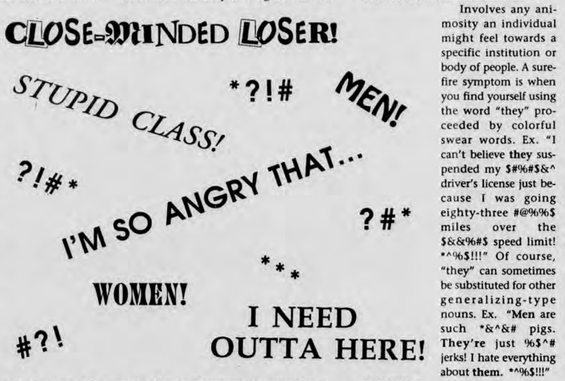
Funny thing about anger...

A lot of people are angry these days, and frankly I'm pretty damn pissed about it. Maybe it's this recession thing, maybe it's this environment thing, or maybe it's that time of the month. But the fact remains that animosity is "in," vexation is vogue, and temper tantrums are trendy. Take this hip new band, Nirvana, for example. They accurately echo the unadulterated hostility and discontent of our nation in their angry anthem, "Smells Like Teen Spirit," when they sing...

"Hello, hello, hello,hello, hello...hello."

Well, maybe it's not the words themselves, but the way they're expressed. Why can't the boys in the band just lighten up? If I were getting paid millions of dollars to stop bathing for extended periods of time and scream melodically into a microphone I would be absolutely ecstatic. My spunkiness, pluckiness, and general enthusiasm would rival that of Scott Hamilton, Mary Lou Retton, Dolly Parton...and all those other celebrities who believe that if they can just be spunky, plucky, and enthusiastic enough, no one will realize they are really dried up has-beens.



But instead, members of Nirvana run around looking constipated and bellowing things like, "I'm so darn full of unadulterated hostility and discontent that I just feel like running over a spunky, plucky person with my squadron of BMW's." And, of course, no one can get close enough to stop the indignant musicians because it has been an awful long time sinse they last bathed. Perhaps someone could drop a subtle hygienic hint their way. Something to the effect of, "Hey Nirvana, we know you're absolutely brimming with gallons of unadulterated hostility and discontent, but trust us, you smell a lot stronger than teen spirit."

Even Jerry Brown and Bill Clinton are cashing in on the vitriol. Just recently, the two Democratic hopefuls had an "informal" debate where they sat together at a small, "informal" table and "informally" acted like any minute they were going to get up and pound the "informal" crap out of each other (in a very informal manner, of course), hence providing the Democratic party with a much needed sense of unity which has been sadly missing for the last two or three millenniums. At one point in the argument, Clinton exclaimed he was absolutely irate because Brown had called him a "slimy cockroach." Of course Brown denied this claim with the brilliant retort, "I did not call you a slimy cockroach you greasy insect." After which the discussion digressed slightly,

"Did not."

"Did to."

"Did not, not, not."

"Did to, to, to."

But this article is not just about anger, but rather about the simple cure for anger. A panacea which involves taking a deep, easy breath, gently sitting down, quitely contemplating the source of your wrath, and then beating the hell out of someone much smaller than you. No, just kidding. After you discover the reason for your anger, you should consider possible solutions.

But in case you are absolutely catatonic with bitterness, I've provided a handy "Anger-Chart" to help you with the process. You can use it to identify your specific annovance and also learn the possible solutions. Enjoy!

ANGER IDENTIFICATION CHART

INSTITUTION-ORIENTED ANGER

Involves any animosity an individual might feel towards a specific institution or body of people. A surefire symptom is when you find yourself using the word "they" proceeded by colorful swear words. Ex. "I can't believe they suspended my $#%#$&^ driver's license just because I was going eighty-three #@%%$ miles over the $&&%#$ speed limit! %$!!!" Of course, "they" can sometimes be substituted for other generalizing-type nouns. Ex. "Men are such *&^&# pigs. They're just %$^# jerks! I hate everything about them. **%$!!!"

SOLUTION

A simple examination reveals that this type of frustration often involves an immature and often narcissistic persecution complex, a mind-frame which can easily be assuaged by realizing the simple truth. Namely, that everyone in this world except you is really a bunch of evil sadistic androids designed specifically to torment and harass you throughout all of your existence. There, don't you feel better? If not, be careful, because Institution-Oriented Anger can easily develop into...

Sexual assault: it can happen to anyone

SEXUAL ASSAULT? "IT NEVER HAPPENS HERE... it could never happen to me... I could never be capable of doing anything like that..."

Sexual assault and sexual harassment do occur on the Bucknell campus, with a regularity which would surprise many members of the University community. Bucknell has been addressing the problem with the creation of a new system to deal with these charges. All Bucknell students should make themselves aware of the new procedures.

The creation of the Hearing Board for Sexual Assault demonstrates Bucknell's commitment to address these issues in a serious manner. Great effort was made to handle the special problems and emotions of sexual assault victims, and the system gives a fair hearing to both the victim and the accused while trying to lessen the level of confrontation. The Women's Resource Center is also instrumental in providing support and counseling to victims, as is Psychological Services. Most importantly for the victim, each of these avenues is confidential.

While the names of victims should remain confidential, some consideration should be given to releasing the names of students found guilty through the Hearing Board for Sexual Assault. As with any crime, women should have this information so that they can protect themselves.

Education, however, is the key to preventing sexual assault, and that education is twofold. First, everyone, male and female, must be aware of what actions constitute sexual harassment and sexual assault. The lines are often blurred, especially on a college campus where men and women often closely interact with one another. Sensitivity to these issues can prevent much confusion and encourage discussion before problems develop.

The latter responsibility for education lies with the University. Bucknell has created a new system to deal with charges of sexual assault, but not enough students are aware of its creation. An informal survey found that not all freshman resident assistants know how the system works. The University must make sure this information is passed on to all Resident Assistants and Junior Fellows, the first people to whom victims usually turn. We commend the office of Residential Life for their freshman programming which addresses these issues, but these efforts should be increased. Students must be made aware of all options open to them if they become victims, and it is impossible for the University to overstress the importance of this issue.

BUCKNELL STUDENTS OFTEN FEEL THAT THE BUBBLE isolates them from the problems of the "real world," but they are sadly mistaken. Bucknell has recognized that sexual assault is a serious problem on campus.

They have worked meticulously to create a judicial system which is fair and considerate to both the victim and the accused, and they have tried to educate the campus. These education efforts must continue and expand. Students must also educate themselves to the many counseling and adjudication options outlined in the Guide for Bucknell Students who have been Sexually Assaulted, distributed to all students last semester.

Sexual assault is a pervasive problem on all college campuses, including Bucknell's. The bottom line is that it can happen to you, so it is important to consider the options now.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Student says Clinton hurts Democratic Party

TO THE EDITOR:

During the past few weeks presidential candidate Jerry Brown has been showing America why he is a better candidate than Governor Bill Clinton. He has used the methods all politicians must use today—praising and defending his own policies and character while attacking his opponent's. Mr. Brown has made it clear that his major focus is working against the corrupt and ineffective national political establishment—a system typified by both Mr. Clinton and President Bush.

This message has naturally greatly upset the establishment of Mr. Brown's own Democratic party. Totally unwarranted criticism of Jerry Brown was thrown last week by two members of the Democratic establishment: former-President Jimmy Carter and party president Ron Brown. Both criticized Jerry Brown, saying he is running a negative, damaging campaign. Mr. Carter was so bold as to endorse Mr. Clinton for the party nomination.

These party "leaders" seem to have forgotten that they don't run the show. A political party must be led from the bottom up, with the will of the people in control of their leaders. (This is why politicians are often called "public servants.") When the party leaders ignore the many opinions of their party, voter anger only grows stronger.

Jerry Brown leads a campaign against the establishment and for the people. In a New York television commercial he urged viewers: "On Tuesday, don't vote for me, vote for yourselves." (New York Times, April 4) Therefore he is trying not to tear apart the party but to unify the people of the party in their common goal of defeating Mr. Bush.

Therefore, by exploiting the abortion issue for political profits, Mr. Clinton has greatly injured his party by further alienating pro-life Democrats.

On the other hand, Mr. Clinton last Friday (April 3) took a significant step in weakening the Democratic party. In a radio commercial run on ten New York radio stations that Friday afternoon, Mr. Clinton challenged Mr. Brown on an extremely divisive and emotional issue in America, abortion.

Mr. Brown has shown that he is pro-choice yet understands the violence of abortions and the viewpoints of pro-life voters. His work with Mother Teresa in India illustrates his devotion to the improvement of human lives. He would unquestionably support those initiatives which, in my view, both pro-life and pro-choice groups support as long-term solutions to the abortion problem: effective sex education, the end of homelessness and hunger, peaceful solutions to international conflicts, etc.

Mr. Clinton has simply found the shrewdest policies and means with which to attack his opponents. He does not support the sweeping, anti-establishment push towards social justice that Mr. Brown so clearly does.

Therefore, by exploiting the abortion issue for political profits, Mr. Clinton has greatly injured his party by fur-

'Men should have no reason to fear feminism'

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing in response to Kirk Sayre's letter of April 3 in which he called for an end to a "Battle of the Sexes" supposedly being waged by the feminist movement. Mr. Sayre, along with several other male contributors to the Bucknellian, have voiced shortsighted responses to feminism recently which ought not to go unchallenged. I do not claim to speak for women with this letter, but rather to offer a male feminist response to other men who have come out with anti-feminist stances.

Feminism presents a challenge to men to become more fully human and sensitive to the plights of all. Men can either accept this difficult challenge as strong adults or whine about it like children.

The problem is initially one of definition. To a reader of feminist theory, it is obvious that the theory that Mr. Sayre cites is not accurately feminist. Feminist theory characterizes our society in terms of a system of patriarchy that validates male roles while invalidating those of women. The problem is this social system, not the influence of inherently oppressive individual men. Everyone is socialized by the system and everyone, both men and women, who work within it are guilty of perpetuating it. But women are by far the hardest hit, so they tend to be the most vocal about changing it. In this sense, there is no "war" set up between the genders. Neither gender is superior by nature—morally, intellectually or otherwise. Feminists call for both genders to work for the dissolution of an oppressive system. If this happens, all will benefit as Mr. Sayre accurately suggests. (Anyone wishing to investigate feminism further should read one or more books by authors such as Nancy Chodorow, Dorothy Dinnerstein, Robin Morgan, Adrienne Rich, Rosemary Radford Ruether, Barbara Smith, Carol Gilligan, etc. to name but a few.)

The feminist anger to which Mr. Sayre reacts does indeed exist—and rightly so. But it is a productive anger, not hate; and it is aimed at social injustice and an oppressive class of men, not men individually. However, if individual men take the offensive and consciously perpetuate the oppressive system, they will be justifiably singled out and confronted. If a man is truly trying to change and work for the affirmation of a woman's voice, he should have no reason to fear feminism.

The defensive reaction that many men have to feminism should also be explored in more depth because I think it points to a fear of being dethroned as the source of ultimate meaning in American society. The fact that Mr. Wardell, for instance, feels threatened by feminism points to a shortcoming in his own development rather than a shortcoming of feminism. Feminism presents a challenge to men to become more fully human and sensitive to the plights of all. Men can either accept this difficult challenge as strong adults or whine about it like children.

All in all, it is about time we, as men, stop invading the space of women and undermining their fight for an equal voice. Women must be allowed to speak for themselves. Men, by virtue of their maleness, can never know what it is to be a woman and should not claim to as various male writers have done recently in this publication. It is irresponsible, even childlike, to grope for such authority. We have to let go of our hegemony and play a mature, affirmative part in this troubled society if anything is to improve.

Female student is proud to be an angry feminist

TO THE EDITOR:

I am furious! And that shouldn't be threatening to anyone. In fact, it should be uplifting. As a feminist, contrary to popular belief, I'm not furious at specific men, rather the patriarchal system under which I live.

Wouldn't you be outraged if you had to walk around campus at night scared of being attacked? I AM FURIOUS! My freedoms as a human being (life, liberty, pursuit of happiness) are curtailed every day!

Wouldn't you be ANGRY if you were raped at age 15? Aren't you ENRAGED at the fact that 1 in 3 women will face abuse of some sort in her life? That you as a female college graduate will make as much as a male high school drop-out upon graduation? I AM FURIOUS!

That anger, however, only turns into vital energy. An energy that works to change things. As Kirk Sayre points out in his letter, change can only work to benefit everyone, including men who feel the pressures, for example, of being sole breadwinners. My ANGER will work to help you, Kirk, because I recognize, as a woman, that we're all in this together. We ALL benefit from a safer campus. You WILL appreciate it if you fall in love with a woman who was raped in her younger years and received help from a Woman's Center.

I am proud to admit that I am an angry feminist. I do not take the status quo as an answer. I work to change the injustices I see around me. And I will not be daunted by the men who tell me my anger will only make things worse. You will be grateful, Kirk, that your daughter will go to college and get a job. The ONLY reason she can do so is because ANGRY FEMINISTS worked to change things years ago.

OPINIONS

Mandatory Multicultural Blues

Q: Does Bucknell need a mandatory multicultural course?

A: No. Teaching Americans how to be multicultural would be like teaching Eskimos (sorry, I mean Inuits) how to make snowballs. They already know how. And so do we. Let me explain.

Confessions of an Immigrant

I immigrated to the United States midway through the second wave of American immigration—the Pacific wave. As a Pacific islander, I wanted the same as my fellow immigrants: a crib, a dad, a mom, some lunch, etc. (or at least I wanted the same as my fellow one-year-old immigrants). Looking back across two decades, I see my parents' migration as the smartest thing they ever did.

America the Multicultural

America is like no other country in the world. America is more than a country: she is full of Americans, and we are unique and unprecedented. Humorist P.J. O'Rourke observes: "We are, after all, a country full of people who came to America to get away from foreigners." We came here because we believed that, given half a chance, we could do it better than everyone else. We founded our country to show the rest of the world that we're number one.

We started as John Winthrop's "city upon a hill [with] the eyes of the people upon us." We were a missionary country, committed to our principles and eager to show the world. After two hundred years, we're still king of the hill, but the hill has grown into a mountain.

We have history on our side: two centuries of proof that democracy, liberty and individual rights are not only the most moral means of government, but also the most popular. (Look around the world: can you name one head of state who still believes communism is the wave of the future?)

To be fair, we had some help. Our laws and government come from England. We kicked out the English with help from the French. We built our universities (at least the good ones) on the German model. We organized crime even more efficiently than the Italians. We brought all of Europe, that crazy old war-prone, disease-ridden, and thoroughly bigoted old continent, with us. We put Europe through the strainer, skimmed the best off the top, and improved on the original recipe. By that century's standards, we were pretty darn multicultural.

Today we are still multicultural. We're the most multicultural country on Earth. "No other nation has accepted so many from so many different places and done it so well." That's approximately what Margaret Thatcher said about us. Since 1960, about 80 percent of people immigrating to America come from everywhere but Europe. We come from everywhere, and therefore we are everyone. And we intermarry.

We don't need mandatory multicultural courses in college; look at your own family tree. By birth you are probably more multicultural than any third-worlder you might care to consider. Even if by birth you are ethnically homogeneous, you live in America—home of the most multicultural and most popular culture in the world.

I've had a good time here. It's been a long ride up. Since I arrived, our economy has grown by more than a third (I'll be generous and share with you the credit for that one). It's likely to grow further, faster. Ben Wattenberg, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, knows why:

"We are the first universal nation. 'First' as in the first one, 'first' as in 'number one.' And 'universal' within our borders and globally

"We are a large nation, and growing. We have the world's highest standard of living, and diminishing poverty

"We have the best universities, and the best researchers. We are the largest exporters, the largest importers, and yet we are the most economically independent major nation. We are the strongest military power

"Around the world, people tap their feet to American music, watch American movies and television, follow American fashions, are en-

Women reaffirm themselves

BY FEMINIST COLLECTIVE

Last weekend's Women's Leadership Conference and the NOW sponsored March on Washington for women's rights affirmed the women and men from Bucknell who participated and linked us to the history and future of the struggle for justice in the United States. That weekend, perhaps more than any other, inspired a sense of collective unity, hope, energy, and commitment within all of us to continue the efforts begun by those women from diverse backgrounds who first began to articulate a sense of anger at an unfair society.

As women left the lectures given by Angela Bowen, Robin Morgan, and Blandina Cardenas Ramirez we all smiled and shared an elated joy at what we had just experienced. They provided us with a sense of community and shared anger. These were powerful women acknowledging that all of us are part of a larger movement which is reaching global proportions. As we organize, often in isolation at Bucknell, we can lose sight of the fact that we are connected to women and men throughout the world who are also fighting to transform the structures of our societies. The women of the first and second waves of the feminist and womanist movement in the United States also reminded the young women in the "third wave" that we are a part of their history. Our community extends back into our past, out to a global sisterhood, and beyond to a future of hope.

We are entering an era in which marginalized men and women shall begin to create their own structures, forms of leadership, and values.

Women spent the weekend discussing feminism, power-within, transforming actions, inclusion, lesbianism, organizing, empowerment, multiculturalism, and revolutionizing - as if their would be few other ways in which to confront the massive amount of oppression and environmental degradation facing the world today. Of course, we will fight. We learned that we owe it to those who struggled before us and those who shall follow.

While attending their lectures we also found ourselves in an environment which was not hostile and threatening but rather one which celebrated our politics, our anger, and our womanhood - something which, as a group, we do not experience within patriarchal institutions. People who are marginalized are, by definition, perpetually on the outside of society. Blandina described this phenomenon on Sunday as the loneliness of being an activist. We are often excluded from society because of our refusal to join in racist jokes, share in the domination of women, or participate in any other capacity as upholders of patriarchy.

Yet, during both Women's Leadership Conference and the March in Washington, we experienced being in an environment we created for ourselves. We joined with others who came to listen. We came together from different backgrounds and experiences and struggle using different methods, but we shared a common vision of justice. In such a space, "synergy" is created, the aggregate energy of the whole group upon which each member draws greater empowerment than as an individual acting in isolation. This was the synergy we felt as we came together this weekend to transform our models of leadership and affirm our experiences.

During the March in Washington, NOW estimated that one million people reclaimed our space in Washington, the center of patriarchal power and decision-making. We asked why were a few homogeneous individuals in the capital dictating decisions which dramatically affected all aspects of the lives of the extremely diverse million people

Term limits versus freedom of choice

BY ERIC LYON

After scandals in the House Post Office, the House "Bank," and a exposure of the long list of Congressional perks, voters are furious with Congress. In a radio address this week, the ever opportunistic President Bush has seized this chance to turn "scandal" into "reform." Once again Bush called for term limits for Senators and Congresspersons.

For several years, conservatives have actively supported term limits in an effort to bolster Republican representation on Capital Hill. Conservatives won't tell you they are frustrated by a Democratic majority in the House for 55 of the last 59 years. Rather they say Congress, as an institution, is ineffective because members are constantly running for re-election instead of performing their legislative duties.

If only these representatives knew their tenure would be brief, many in the GOP tell us, members of Congress would put aside special interest and pork-barrel politics and get on with the business of solving some of America's problems.

On the surface, the term limit proposal appears to be a good solution to a serious problem. Incumbents enjoy a variety of advantages which yield a staggering 95 percent re-election rate. But the proper solution to establish equitable Congressional elections is not term limits but reform in franking, PAC money, media privileges, and other mechanisms that perpetuate incumbency.

Term limit supporters fail to emphasize how limits would reduce choices for the American electorate. No legislator is indispensable, but if you believe your representative is doing a good job, you should have the option of retaining him or her.

Term limits are a bold confession by voters that they are not qualified to pick their representatives. More precisely, term-limit proponents believe voters are not educated enough to replace a poor legislator.

Perhaps they are right. Michael Kinsley aptly points out in this week's New Republic, "You've got to wonder about the American electorate...what serious citizen tolerates a $400 billion deficit but draws the line at a $400 rubber check?"

Yet, being apathetic and uninformed should not strip citizens of the right to vote as they please. If you don't like our current representation and chose not to educate yourself on the candidates and issues, simply vote against all incumbents. However, by supporting term limits one deprives a politically aware voter of the right to vote for what they believe to be a good legislator.

A particularly nasty repercussion of term limits that seldom enters the mind of an angry voter is how this enactment would affect the power structure in Congress. With a constant change in Congresspersons the power of Capital Hill staff would skyrocket. In the end, the unelected minions of staffers would enjoy more control on the Hill than the already considerable power they currently wield.

One could argue that a term-limits referendum is a fully democratic and constitutional privilege, congruent with the American tradition of democracy. But this logic amounts to a tyranny of the majority, a majority that is voting not with thoughtful reflection, but out of spite for the status quo on Capitol Hill.

We already have the means to throw the bums out; we simply need to exercise that right at the voting booth.

Should the national debt be increased to escape the recession?

The Road to the White House

BY JOHN SHIRE

Last week The Washington Post printed an opinions piece by the well respected columnist Hobart Rowen, with a quite different approach to national finance. Mr. Rowen informed his readers of new thinking toward an immediate boost in public spending on human and physical resources, although it advocates an increase in the budget deficit over the next several years.

Sixty prominent economists, including MIT's Robert Solow, Yale's James Tobin and four other Nobel Prize winners will be promoting a "non-political economic growth package that openly accepts a temporary rise in the deficit" They firmly believe that their plan will boost the prospects for interest rate reduction by The Federal Reserve Board, provide tax credits for business investment in new plants and equipment, and assist state and local governments for education and infrastructure.

The rationale for increasing the deficit is that it will generate faster economic growth through savings which will free capital for human and physical resource investment such as schools, education, training and projects like roads, airports and bridges. In later years, there will be sharp reductions in the federal budget. Mr. Rowen believes that "Neither Bush nor the Democrats have had the political courage to make this distinction because it requires acceptance—in the short run—of more, not less, Treasury borrowing. And in the long run, it means higher taxes." Further, he believes that unless some political leader begins to level with the American people on the poor prospects ahead, economic disaster may be unavoidable.

My intuition tells me that one cannot propose to help the nation by increasing taxes and increasing the national deficit.

Benjamin Friedman, a Harvard economist, cites one danger: Any increases in spending this year could still be in effect in 1995—and not needed at that time. I reject this thought. I believe that there are plenty of dangers that could support an argument against the plan. May I at this time ask you to pause and think about these proposals? Mr. Rowen is suggesting that there are no other real alternatives to a larger deficit in the next few years. He states, "Deficits are bad when the economy is prospering; they are tolerable when the private economy needs support from the public sector, as it does now"; however, I cannot accept increasing the national deficit as the only means of lifting the nation out of recession. We, as tax paying citizens, do not have to believe these economic theorists who believe that their word is the gospel. Our President is not listening to them. Neither are the Democratic candidates and for good reason. It seems to me, in my limited knowledge of politics and economics, that there are plenty of other alternatives to lifting the nation from recession without having to dig a deeper pit in the national deficit, especially if it means a steady increase in taxes over the next several years.

Many people criticize the presidential candidates for not proposing economic plans that everyone will benefit from. As demonstrated, it is no easy task. It is especially not easy when they have absurd proposals to choose from such as the one advocated by Mr. Rowen. My experience in this field is no match for that of Mr. Rowen's, but my intuition tells me that one cannot propose to help the nation by increasing taxes and increasing the national deficit. Would it not be wiser to reduce foreign aid and use those allocated funds to increase national economic programs? Columnists such as Mr. Rowen can be very convincing in their prose, but we should not have to accept their theory without question. Thought of these powerful issues can inspire us to pursue dreams, goals, and hopefully a brighter future. Let's not ignore the complexity of the problems and blame presidential candidates for not acting on economic failure, but rather consider them now so that in our day we will be better equipped to handle them.

thralled by American culture, speak American, emulate American economic and political ideas. All this influence is increasing exponentially as the American-driven communications grid spreads everywhere."

We came to America from out of the renegade churches of Holland, out of the prisons of England, out of the slave ships from Sierra Leone, out of the concentration camps of Nazi Germany, out of the slums of Saigon, Seoul, and Singapore, out of the killing fields of south-east Asia, out of the looneybins of Cuba, and most recently out from under the iron curtain of communist Europe. We were the dregs of the world: their unsuccessful, their unwanted, their unwelcome. But from our humble beginnings, we have built the most moral, the most popular, the most multicultural, and the most powerful country in the entire history of Earth.

We are multicultural, and we know it. We are the largest, most ambitious multicultural experiment in the world. We don't need a multicultural course. And most of all, we don't need mandatory multicultural courses shoved down our throats.

marching outside their offices? We challenged the racist patriarchy which made decisions without considering our best interests.

We felt the march to be a natural expression of the empowerment and energy we derived from the conference. We declared our bodies and our right to the power of decision-making as our own. The march shall be remembered as the largest civil rights demonstration in our present history. It is perhaps a reflection of how angry we are, how diverse we are, and how driven we are. We are entering an era in which marginalized men and women shall begin to create their own structures, forms of leadership, and values. We - women, people of color, lesbians and gay men, working class people - will demand to be given the rights which we should not have to ask for.

Kappa Alpha Psi brothers apologize for step show problems

TO THE EDITOR:

We the Brothers of the Xi Kappa Chapter of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc., would like to send our sincerest apologies for the problems which occurred at our step show on April 4th in Davis Gym. I am referring to the non-appearance of two of the groups who were supposed to perform in the competition.

The show was advertised to feature four groups, two sororities, Zeta Phi Beta and Sigma Gamma Rho, and two fraternities, Phi Beta Sigma and ourselves. On Thursday, April 2nd, the Sisters of Zeta Phi Beta informed us that they would be unable to participate after having told us that they would compete at the beginning of March. On Saturday, the day of the show, the Brothers of Phi Beta Sigma did not show up. We would like everyone to know that we are deeply sorry for these occurrences yet they were situations which were beyond our control. We were just as disappointed and upset as those in attendance when the other group either cancelled or didn't show up. At the time that this letter was written, Wednesday, April 8th, the Brothers of Phi Beta Sigma had still not notified us as to their reason(s) for not coming.

We can understand the reason why some of the people in attendance requested that some of their money be returned yet we cannot fulfill this request. First we would like everyone to realize that the money spent for tickets goes to two places. First, it went back into the production of the show. Although we were co-sponsored by several generous organizations, we nonetheless had bills to pay which included the DJ, the prize money, the trophies, food for the reception and many other things. Secondly, the proceeds which remained after such costs were covered were donated to various charities. This event every year affords us the opportunity to donate substantial amounts to our philanthropies such as N.A.A.C.P., The United Negro College Fund (U.N.C.F.), Africare and the Kappa Alpha Psi Foundation.

We hope that everyone can understand and respect our reasons for not being able to return portions of ticket sales to those in attendance. We appreciate the tremendous support that we received from the Bucknell community and we hope that we will again be able to see it next year. We hopè that these occurrences have not damped our reputation or created animosity towards us. If it has, we once again hope that you accept our sincerest apologies.

ther alienating pro-life Democrats. Typical of this block of voters is a traditional, Catholic, working-class voter who supports the Democrats' ideals of union rights, environmental protection, and social justice, yet agrees with her church's leaders in opposing abortion. In my view, these voters have contributed to the mass of Reagan (and now Bush) Democrats who have half-heartedly voted for the Republican party because of its pro-life platform.

Mr. Brown has made an attempt to understand both sides of the issue. But Mr. Clinton has taken the position currently seen as politically advantageous (pro-choice) and alienated the other camp of voters by deeming them "anti-choice," to which pro-lifers understandably take great insult. Who is now tearing apart his own party?

At this critical point, I challenge both the Republican and Democratic parties to simultaneously drop pro-life and pro-choice stances from their platforms. I realize this proposition is totally impractical. I don't know how it can be implemented. But as long as politics and party platforms determine candidates' positions on abortion issues, Americans are hindered from knowing the facts concerning abortion and resolving this divisive debate.

I also challenge Pennsylvanian voters to "vote for yourselves" in voting for Jerry Brown on Ap. 28.

Women can easily speak for themselves

TO THE EDITOR:

Although it is our hope that most of the Bucknell community has read the articles that this petition concerns, we realize that this might not be the case. The petition is an indirect response to a number of articles in The Bucknellian, The University Messenger, and The Sentinel in which men are writing for and about women in a degrading and extremely negative manner. One of these articles entitled the Women's Resource Center as the Women's Resource Plantation. This article also accused Janice Butler of imposing "her vitriolic mind control" on the women who look to her for support. Other articles mocked feminists, calling them "femi-nazis," and accused the victim in the Kennedy-Smith trial of giving up her 'power' when she left the bar drunk. Yet, another disturbing and frightening article dismissed the issue of sexual harassment, because from his perspective "it's hard to imagine unwanted physical attention or unwelcome sexual advances." For those who missed these articles, there are copies of them in the Women's Resource Center. This petition was written to let the campus community know that these articles do not reflect valid or widespread opinions. These signatures represent both men and women's support of every woman's ability to speak for herself.

Student angered that another piece of statue has been stolen

TO THE EDITOR:

I will be graduating this May. My four years at Bucknell can be explained as a search for self. I have played field hockey. I have worked in the theatre. I have been a member of a sorority. I have participated in ROTC. And I have become a peace activist. Through all of this, I have never regretted my decision to be here. The lessons I am learning and the changes I am going through are an integral part of my story of my journey.

One of the greatest gifts I have gotten from my life here is an appreciation for the Earth and other sentient beings. I was never as aware as I am now of the interconnectedness of life. For me, the arrival of the "Seven Generations" sculpture was a blessing, a way of thanking the people who have helped me grow — and it is a gift to all the others who are searching for an understanding of this world. It is a symbolic ethic toemind us of the role we play on Earth.

When the first piece was stolen, I was extremely angry and upset. . Now, another piece has been taken. When Professor Tucker told me about getting the sculpture, I doubted that it belonged on our campus. I didn't feel it would get the respect it deserved. I am sorry to have been proven right.

That sculpture is much more than a new toy for the campus. For many people, it has deep, personal meaning. I am incredibly disappointed with its treatment by the students. Please, for once, go beyond the surface, and see the power in this sculpture. Please, return the piece so that the value of life and the message of the Iroquois Nation will continue.

WVBU Spring Marathon begins today

Sixty-hour broadcast to raise funds for antenna repairs and improved signal

BY BRIAN KING

What marks spring at Bucknell? Is it the rebirth and growth of the ancient and beautiful trees around campus? Is it the triumphant singing of the birds floating along the flowing winds? Is it the fantastic jumping and swaying of the frisbees on the freshman quad as the Mudsharks prepare for practice? Although the calendar claimed that winter made its exit a few weeks ago, WVBU's Annual Spring Marathon is a certain sign that the season is upon us.

This weekend, April 10-12, Bucknell's own radio station, WVBU FM 90.5 in Lewisburg, will be attempting another Spring Marathon. The Marathon is a very important occassion for the DJ's and fans of the station to raise money and have fun at the same time. WVBU will put out 61 hours of continous music and commentary (plus a few surprises).

Colin Bridgewater– The Bucknellian

Lisa Bell '94 and Sean Grass '93 are two of the members of the WVBU FM 90.5 staff that will be there to help kick off the station's Spring Marathon in an effort to help raise money for the group.

Spring Marathon is an annual event which raises valuable funds for activities which exceed the station's budget. Last year the station used the Marathon to replace some of the classic rock albums on vinyl with CD's. Through support from the listening audience they were able to raise $320 and improve on the already impressive CD collection at the station. The Marathon receives its lifeblood from campus organizations, who can sponsor an hour on the air for $20. Marathon organizers also receive support from businesses in Lewisburg.

The goal for the Marathon this year is to improve the damaged antenna. Fans of WVBU might remember its rating as the number-one small college radio station in 1977, but due to problems (such as the antenna) WVBU has trouble reaching beyond this campus. Program director and veteran DJ Lisa Bell '94 remembers how last year the station "hit rock bottom." She attributes the recent upswing to a number of reasons.

The insurge of first year DJ's last year and this year has given the station some renewed support. Bell also noted that Colin Bridgewater '92, former station manager, and Craig Bitter '92, former music director, improved staff organization and enthusiasm.

The fixed antenna will put WVBU at top efficiency of 560 watts and will improve the signal to reach surroundings towns of Danville, Milton, and Mifflinburg.

Hill conducts orchestra through spring concert

BY CHRIS BIRD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell University Orchestra, conducted by Jackson Hill, professor of music and associate dean of faculty of the college of arts and sciences,will present its annual spring concert on Wednesday. The performance will be held at 8:00 P.M. in the Weis Center. Seating is free and will be unreserved.

The 45-member ensemble will begin the evening with the Overture to Oedipus Tyrannus by John Knowles Paine. Paine, for whom the music building at Harvard is dedicated, is considered to be the first person to be named professor of music at an American university. He composed the piece in order to accompany a presentation of Sophocles' tragedy Oedipus Rex at Harvard's Saunders Theater in 1881.

The concert will continue with the debut of Fourth Elegy for Strings, composed by Hill in 1989. Next on the program is the Otto Nicolai's Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor, based on the Shakespearean comedy. The orchestra will conclude the performance with Dvorak's Symphony No. 6, in D Major, Opus 60, No. 1. Dvorak broke musical ground by making the scherzo movement an upbeat folk dance known as a "furiant."

Hill has been a member of the Bucknell music faculty since 1968. In 1969, he took over the orchestra and remained the director until he became the chair of the Department of Music in 1980, a position he held for 10 years. Hill has been leading the orchestra this semester while Christopher Para, assistant professor of music and Bucknell University Orchestra director, is on a one-semester Junior Faculty leave in London.

When asked to comment about the selections for the performance, Hill responded, "All of the works have a powerful emotional component to them. The pieces give the program an unusual level of intensity. The Overture to Oedipus Tyrannus is an emotionally charged piece done in a late 19th-century Wagnerian style. The piece is very unique in that there was not much American music being written at this time, let alone a work this powerful."

"The music that I chose this semester was very demanding and the musicians had to put in a great deal of hard work," said Hill. "However, the concert is coming together nicely."

Dr. Hill has greatly enjoyed his opportunity to return to his roots as a conductor. "I may regret giving up conducting, but I just don't have the time with my duties as associate dean."

The next and final performance for the orchestra will be the PRISM concert, a musical event to include all of the choral and vocal ensembles on campus that will take place as part of the Spring Weekend festivities. The Bucknell University Orchestra is considered to be the first coeducational college orchestra in America and was founded in 1889. If you have some instrumental experience and would like to join the orchestra for the 1992-1993 season, please contact Christopher Para at the department of music during late August after his return from London.

REACTIONARY ANGER

It's the logical result when two or more people who suffer from Institution-Oriented Anger get together to commiserate. However, the indignation only increases, causing the group to think up violent-sounding acronyms such as D.E.S.T.R.O.Y.S.!!! (Delicious, Edible, Salad-Toppings, against Run-On or Yammering Sentences!!!) and to organize symposiums where all the Reactionary-Anger-Sufferers get together, holding hands, and singing Whitney Houston songs, placidly discussing the %&^# jerks who don't suffer from the particular reaction which is being symposy-ized and who deliberately go out of their way to mock the group's efforts by poking fun at their particular endeavor and creating needless, run-on yammering sentences when there absolutely, positively is no necessary need for a run-on yammering sentence and it is only there because people are so *&^&# ignorant!

SOLUTION

A. Write a presumptuous and bitter "Letter to the Editor" of The Bucknellian. We have to print it. Usually under some grand headline like, "Indignant Crouton Condemns Columnist For Unnecessary Yammering Sentences."

B. Go out and stomp some greasy cockroaches. Pretend they're Bill Clinton.

C. Move on to develop...

REVOLUTIONARY ANGER

One of the easiest forms of anger to identify. Do you find yourself getting arrested often? Are you suddenly taking great interest during chemistry lectures about unstable gasses? Are people named "Bob Johnson" or "Jim Smith" who wear dark sunglasses and regulation firearms, having lengthy conversations with your neighbors. Do you sometimes wear a ski-mask in warm whether? If so, you probably suffer from Revolutionary Anger: a predicament from which there is no known cure, but usually ends fairly quickly when "Bob" or "Jim" ship you off to a small, bright room underneath the Pentagon, while Amnesty International writes thousands of polite letters on your behalf. All of which make "Bob" and "Jim" laugh hysterically for a few moments, before they return to assisting you in your "shock therapy."

PMS ANGER

Affects a small percentage of women for a few brief minutes every month. During this time, things that might not ordinarily bother them become incredibly annoying. They might say something like, "Could you please not breathe so loud you %&^* jerk!" At this point a perceptive male would immediately hold his breath until he turned blue or get the hell out of the room. A non-perceptive male would say something like, "Whut aw you on da rag or something?" At which point the PMS Anger sufferer would indignantly respond, "You men are such %&^* jerks! Do you think every time we get annoyed or upset it's because we have our period! Why don't you just get lost, buster. Or better yet, go find Nirvana and tell them you are spunky and plucky!!!"

???

SUBLIMINAL ANGER

The anger YOU may feel when certain writers WILL use blatantly obvious subliminal messages, THINKing that it makes THEir Incredibly Stupid COLUMN seem InScrutably BRILLIANT.

SOLUTION

Make a statement. Stop reading the article before it ends.

GEORGE BUSH HAS GOT TO GO · TO EARTH SUMMIT '92 ·

Global warming. Destruction of the rain forests. Toxic waste. These aren't the legacies we wanted from the "environmental" President. Urge George Bush to attend the U.N. Earth Summit in Brazil in June. Right now, the United States is the only major industrial power refusing to do its part. Ask the President to stop America's role as leading producer of greenhouse gases. Tell him to support the global treaty for reducing carbon dioxide emissions, ban the exportation of toxic waste, and save the world's rain forests. The President is the only person who can effectively lead the struggle for our planet's future.

Injuries are no match for Keppler & Co.

Athletic trainers remain behind the scenes as they work around the clock to help student–athletes keep in shape and rehabilitate

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Mark Keppler always wanted to be an athlete, to score the winning touchdown, to make the unbelievable play that would help his team to victory. That dream may not have come true, but while at Bucknell, he has probably set more records and won more games than any athlete in the school's history.

Describing himself as the frustrated athlete, Keppler tells a story of an athletic career that was cut short by injury, giving rise to a new career route based in the physical therapy industry. Currently Bucknell's Head Athletic Trainer, he is one of the region's most respected and honored people in the field and now heads a staff that consists of three professionals, a graduate assistant, an intern, and a group of nearly 20 specially-trained student assistants.

Working with Keppler are Associate Athletic Trainer, Barry McGlumphy, and Assistant Athletic Trainer Julie Augustine. Together the three are required to attend to the medical needs of nearly 750 Bison athletes competing in Bucknell's 26 varsity sports. At least one of the three is in attendence at all of the varsity games, while a trainer or student assistant is present at most practices. Bucknell's flagship sports, football and men's and women's basketball, require and receive even more coverage. In addition to this, the training staff must attend to nearly 27 injuries and 63 treatments daily; a total of 7,073 injuries and 16,602 treatments over the 264 athletic days last year alone.

It is fair to say that the staff is undermanned and requires both more recognition and aid from the administration. Commented McGlumphy, "The university just doesn't realize the full scope of what the trainers accomplish. If they did, we could get more resources and people on the staff." A 1987 graduate of Lock Haven University, McGlumphy continued, "Most Division I athletic programs have between five and eight professionals on the staff, but that will come with education. It's our responsibility to make the administration understand."

McGlumphy confided that he had his career plans set before he entered college, causing him to chose Lock Haven, a school renowned for excellence in the athletic training field. He went on to become a graduate assistant at the University of Arizona, where he also took classes and eventually earned his master's degree in exercise and sport science/athletic training. At Bucknell, McGlumphy's primary responsibility is working as the Head Football Trainer but he explained that over the winter and spring seasons he helps out by picking up any slack in the other sports. Eventually he plans to work on earning a doctorate degree so that he can pursue another of his passions, teaching, while continuing in the training field.

Augustine, the newest addition to the staff, is nearing the end of her second year as the school's Assistant Athletic Trainer after serving as the graduate assistant at Bucknell in 1989-90. She also graduated from Lock Haven University, in 1989, with a degree in health services, becoming involved with the Bucknell program during her senior year in college.

Upon leaving high school, Augustine knew she wanted to enter some health related field but she was not planning on going to medical school. At Lock Haven, she was one of a small percentage of students to be allowed into the school's training program that included a senior exchange program with Bucknell. Although she had severe doubts after the first week, Augustine's fit with the Bucknell program soon became apparent and she was offered the Graduate Assistant position and, a year later, a full-time spot. She plans on staying at Bucknell to finish her master's degree in biology, but would not mind moving into McGlumphy's position if he moved on to teaching. If offered this position, Augustine would become one of very few female Head Football Trainers in the country. Eventually she is looking to become a head trainer at a Division I school where she hopes to teach as well as become more involved with national trainers associations.

Prior to his arrival at Bucknell five years ago, Mark Keppler had been the head trainer at Carnegie-Mellon University in Pittsburgh for 11 years, where he is credited with developing an outstanding strength and flexibility program that helped that school to dominate its conference competition. During his stay at Carnegie-Mellon, Keppler, a Florida State University graduate, also served as a physical education instructor, while he worked on a master of science degree in exercise physiology at the University of Pittsburgh; he received that degree in 1987.

A member of the National and Eastern Athletic Trainers Association, Keppler has used his time at Carnegie-Mellon and Bucknell to become more involved with the politics of his profession. He has been elected President of the Pennsylvania Athletic Trainers' Society and currently serves on the Athletic Trainers Advisory Committee of the Pennsylvania State Board of Physical Therapy. Recently, he was awarded the P.A.T.S.'s Distinguished Merit Award for outstanding contributions to his profession.

His record in the political and administrative aspects of the industry is outstanding, but helping the young men and women who compete at Bucknell is where Keppler, and his staff, excel. After a recent conference victory over the United States Naval Academy, Head Men's Basketball Coach Charlie Woollum praised the play of his players, but when it came time to acknowledge the real heroes of the game, Woollum called Keppler the night's Most Valuable Player.

Recently, Assistant Coach Carl Danzig reflected on the events of that week. "Billy [team captain Bill Courtney '92] had hurt his knee and Mike [forward Mike Bright '93] was still having trouble with his back and we probably would have lost without them. But Mark got them back to nearly full strength and they were both able to play almost the entire game. It was through his efforts that we were able to win that night. He does a great job with all of our guys and we all know that we can trust him."

While the fall is usually the busiest season, most spring sports also hold fall practice sessions. Regardless of season, the training staff is required to put in long days. They are usually on campus from 9 a.m. until 8 p.m. or later if there are night games. Despite this dedication, the entire staff is having trouble getting the recognition and reward that it deserves. Because it constitutes a service of the Athletic Department, administratively, the trainers are classified under Athletic Director Rick Hartzel, while medically, the group comes under Preston Hoyle, the Director of Student Medical Services.

By being forced to answer to two supervisors, the department has trouble differentiating its roles. Keppler commented, "We would like to try to be just under one head, the medical service. Now we are associated with coaches and their assistants, when in fact we are medical practitioners."

Adds senior student assistant Kristine Elliott '92, "It is obviously not fair, the treatment that they receive. It wasn't well known, but Julie [Augustine] was paid less and received less benefits than any of the assistant coaches."

Despite any injustices that they may see, Bucknell's trainers continue to complete their jobs in an extremely professional manner. A self-titled jack-of-all-trades, Keppler numbers the group's duties across a wide range of activities including prevention and treatment. Specifically, he explains, prevention can include walking across a field to check for holes that may hamper athlete's play, to watching a runner and checking for signs of any future trouble, a science known as gait analysis. If a player is injured, a trainer is required to evaluate the situation and determine if treatment is needed, or in extreme cases, referral to outside specialists.

Keppler continues, "We are like physical therapist, but an athletic trainer is much more specifically trained and can prevent injuries before they occur. A good analogy is the gas station attendant versus the pit crew. Their jobs are similar but the pit crew is more specialized."

Some university training staffs may have more resources and personnel, but they would be hard-pressed to match the dedication and results put forth by Bucknell's athletic training department.

Comebacks spark baseball's 3-3 week

Bison split doubleheader with Penn State; team heads to the Bronx for three with Rams

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It was another "Miracle by the Mods" yesterday afternoon as the Bucknell baseball team scored five runs in the bottom of the sixth inning to defeat Penn State 9-8 in the second game of a doubleheader. Penn State battered the Bison in the opener, 11-2.

equivalent would be playing Prairie View one game and then Miami the next." The Bison appeared undaunted by the immensely talented Tigers, coming out strong and taking the first three shots of the game.

Although Bucknell did fall behind 3-0 early, the team fought back to bring the first quarter score to 4-2 in favor of Towson. More important than the score was the fact that the Bison realized that Towson was playing the same game they were, and that there was no reason why the game couldn't be competitive.

Despite the fact that many in the crowd did not seem to recognize the magnitude of the Bison effort, the highlight of the game came midway thru the second quarter when Bucknell cut the Towson lead to one at 5-4. Unfortunately for the Bison, they would get no closer as the Tigers got several quick goals before the end of the half.

Bucknell continued to maintain a high level of energy and motivation throughout the second half even though the team was behind by a significant margin. Conway summarized the team's sentiments following the 19-8 loss by saying, "We are happy with the way we played, but obviously not with the results. We hung in there for a while but in the end Towson just had too much."

Several Bison players gave particularly outstanding efforts. If anyone deserves special recognition it is Herrema for his superlative job on face-offs. Although stats aren't kept indicating how many scoring opportunities result from successful face-offs, anyone who watched the game could attest to the number of fast breaks Herrema initiated by winning nearly two-thirds of all his attempts.

Kangas did a commendable job holding John Blatchley—one of the most prolific scorers in college lacrosse—to only one goal and three assists. For most of the game, Conway found himself matched up against Lindsay Dixon, arguably the top midfielder in the country. Conway held his own in the battle, and although Dixon did score twice, he never beat Conway in a one-on-one situation.

Roth rounded out a highly productive week, sticking in three goals off the crease to bring his three game total to 14 goals. Goalie Colin Barker '94 made several spectacular one-on-one saves, but Towson relentlessly shelled him with shots the entire game.

Bucknell headed west to the former gold rush territory yesterday to test its metal against a pair of Colorado teams. The Bison will clash with squads from the University of Denver and the Airforce Academy at Colorado Springs. Conway remarked, "We are looking forward to showing these western teams what East Coast lacrosse is all about." Although nearly the entire Bison team is from the East Coast, defenseman Pat Hatcher '92 hails from the Denver area.

Women's lacrosse off to a slow start

Leslie Why '92 reaches 100 career–point plateau, needs three assists to set BU record

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

To say that the women's lacrosse team had a tough week would be a bit of an understatement. With losses to both Lafayette and Cornell, Bucknell's record fell to 2-5 overall, 1-1 in the Patriot League.

Coach Jen Averill's squad travelled to Easton, PA on Saturday, April 4 in hopes of bouncing back from an 11-4 loss to Towson State on April 2. The 11th-ranked Leopards, however, had other plans for the Bison.

Over-matched by an extremely talented Lafayette team, Bucknell quickly fell behind and would stay there throughout the game. Dorie Lynn Ellwood '92, Tricia Way '93 and Jen Kangas '95 each contributed goals in the 14-3 losing effort. Despite being shelled with shots the entire game, goalie Kahra Foster '92 turned away 14 Leopard shots on goal.

Things would not get much easier for the Bison as they had to travel to New York to take on Ivy League powerhouse Cornell in a tough non-conference game. Clearly a little road weary, Bucknell came out slow in the first half. A fired-up Big Red team dominated the Bison defense early on, peppering Foster with a barrage of shots while racking up 10 goals before the intermission.

Although the offense was only able to add two more goals in the second half, the defense played with a bit more intensity, allowing only four Cornell goals. Foster once again anchored the Bison defensive effort, recording 11 saves in the teams 14-4 loss.

Offensively, Ellwood once again netted one, as did teammates Lisa Young '95, Alison Arth '93, and Susan Owens '95.

A number of the Bison stickhandlers are fast approaching career milestones. Leslie Why '92 has already surpassed the 100-point plateau for her career, and she needs only three more assists to make her Bucknell's career assist leader with 40. Ellwood also ranks right up there with the school's best playmakers of all-time as she is currently third on the career list with 30 assists.

The Bison will be looking to bring the current losing streak to an end tomorrow at home against Patriot League foe Lehigh.

to take place. Instead, coxswain Nicky Wong '94 rowed. Despite the circumstances, the novice "B" team performed well, finishing three-quarters of a length of open water from George Washington.

In the varsity men's race, both George Washington's and George Mason's heavyweights took off in a class by themselves. Roughly three lengths of open water separated them from the third place finisher, Bucknell's varsity lightweight eight. The lightweights managed to beat West Virginia's heavies by open water. With the aid of a strong sprint, West Virginia beat the fifth-place boat—Bucknell's varsity heavyweight eight—by three seats.

The lightweights performed well, considering that they had a tough week of practices due to the changing of rowers in the boat. The boat that raced on Sunday had only one day of practice together with its new six man, Mark Pyle '95. However, head coach John Skotedis still expressed disappointment because the rowers in both boats seemed to "have lost rhythm and swing and given in to the conditions."

According to coach Anne Shapiro, the women's crews were "up against some tough competition." The varsity women faced not only two traditionally strong programs in George Mason's varsity crew and George Washington's junior varsity crew, but also West Virginia's varsity team. Mason won the race by open water over GWU. Bucknell managed to put in a strong showing by finishing within one length of open water from GWU. The Bison rowers had an apparently easy time with West Virginia, beating them by two lengths of open water. Coxswain Erin Burns '93 remarked that "the conditions prevented our boat from swinging out together and maintaining the rating we needed to be competitive."

The novice women's boat of Jen Elder '95, Julie Ritner '94, Katie Rausch '94, Katy Miller '95, Tara Custer '95, Robin Black '95, Christena Johnston '94, Mieke Zylstra '94, and coxswain Sara Noble '95 also raced the Mason and Washington powerhouses. GWU walked away with an easy victory, described by one spectator as being "many, many lengths of open water." George Mason finished second, two lengths ahead of Bucknell. According to the same spectator, the novice women beat West Virginia by "many, many lengths of open water" as well.

Overall, the day proved to be a tough one for Bucknell and Wall commented that, "The only good part of the race was the course itself."

Golf drives to perfect 4–0

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Even though the scores are still higher than the temperatures, coach Tommy Thompson and his golf team have seen tremendous improvement in both.

Doug Dollenberg '94 paced the squad to a 406 and convincing victories over host Lafayette (425), Rider (430), and Swarthmore (462) at the North Hampton Country Club. Paul Gregory '95 and Chris Curti '94 also continued the impressive youth movement, chipping in for scores of 81 and 80, respectively, to go along with Dollenberg's medal winning 77. Drew Smith '95 and Mike Hartman '95 rounded out the Bison scoring with 84s.

"Anytime you can beat a league opponent by 19 strokes after they finished ahead of us in an early season tournament, you have to be happy. I'm pleased with the progress that we made this past week," said Thompson. "Our scores are improving and should continue to do so."

With less than two weeks to prepare for the Patriot League Championships at West Point, the Puttin' Bison with their perfect 4-0 record will be busy. Thompson will bring four freshman with him to today's Elizabethtown Invitational at Hershey. "The more tournament experience the younger players get, the better," commented Thompson.

Early next week, the team will travel to Amish country to tee off against Franklin and Marshall and Ursinus. Finally, one last tournament before "the tournament" will be held Thursday in Lock Haven.

"It's important for us to get under the 400 mark as a team because that means all five of our scorers are averaging better than 80," summed up Thompson. "As soon as we do that we'll be ready to challenge teams at the Patriot League Tournament." In these matches, each team enters seven golfers, but only counts its top five performances.

Athlete of the Week

Kevin Roth '92

Bucknell men's lacrosse player Kevin Roth '92 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of Apr. 4-10.

Roth, owner of two varsity letters thus far, led the lacrosse team in last week's 2-1 effort. The attackman scored 14 goals in the three games, marking his 21st goal on the season. With that number, Roth leads not only the Bison but also the Patriot League in goals. Although Roth has yet to tally an assist, the number of goals he has amassed is enough to make him the team leader and fourth in the league in overall scoring as well.

With six goals, Roth played an integral role in last week's trouncing of Marist, a game which ended with the highest Bucknell goal total since 1983.

Following his performance in two of last week's games, Roth became only the second lacrosse player in Bucknell history to tally five or more goals in three or more games.

Cycling team rides flat in Massachusetts

BY CHRIS NEUMANN AND ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Cycling Bison were at it again at UMass this weekend for the biggest race of the season so far. This was the first of four stage races in a row. A stage race is a series of three races over one weekend.

Saturday's race was a 9-lap, 65-mile road race for the category A men. The race started slowly, since the riders had to conserve their energy for the long miles ahead. There were attacks from Penn State, Cornell and Harvard, but the pack caught on the hill in each case.

Over the course of the race, the tough pace whittled the 100-man field down to 30. At four laps to go, attacks were made on the hill by some of the stronger riders. Two laps later, a nine-man breakaway went off the front of the pack, but there were no Bucknell riders in a position to go with it.

Chris Neumann '95 and a member of the Army team headed up the chase effort. The breakaway was caught with five miles to go. The pack rested until the final climb, which sported the finish line at the top. Although he was tired after the chase effort, Neumann still managed to hang on for an eighth-place finish.

The following day, in the 12-mile team time trial, a race against the clock, the underpowered, three-man Bison squad sorely missed Lee Lefkowitz '93. The cyclers were devastated by the much stronger seven-man teams from other schools.

This weekend the Bison will be sending a seven-man squad to West Point for competition.

Pro Baseball Preview II : AL West

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Talk about tough assignments! This week I have to try to predict for you the final standings in the American League West—by far the best division in baseball. Last year the California Angels finished with a .500 record, good enough for last place in the division. That was the best record of any last place team in the history of the game. Last year most experts picked the Minnesota Twins to finish last, and if I remember correctly, they did a little better than that. By the way, did you know that 11 of the 14 American League teams finished at or above the .500 mark last year? Take that, National League fans! Anyway, let's try to figure who's going to win this division.

The Chicago White Sox jumped from 67 wins in 1989 to 90 in 1990. Last year they slipped back to 87, probably because the competition was so much better. This year the Chisox could be the best team in baseball. Frank "The Big Hurt" Thomas and Robin Ventura are two of the best young players in the game. There is a great mix of veterans as well, with Carlton Fisk (although he started the season on the disabled list), Tim Raines, George Bell, and Ozzie Guillen. The bullpen is awesome with fireballer Scott Radinsky and Donn Pall setting up Bobby Thigpen (87 saves in the last two years). The Sox defense is spectacular—centerfielder Lance Johnson, catcher Ron Karkovice, and shortstop Guillen are among the best in baseball at their positions. The only suspect position is the starting pitching. Other than Jack McDowell and Charlie Hough, who is old enough to have a spot in the Museum of Natural History, the Chicago rotation is relying solely on youngsters with potential. Free agent signee Kirk McCaskill has not yet lived up to expectations, nor have Alex Fernandez and Wilson Alvarez. Another kid, Ramon Garcia, may be able to help this season as well.

Most people think the Minnesota Twins will not repeat this year because they lost Jack Morris. This is only partly true. All great teams have role players who can come off the bench and produce—just as the Twins had last year. But due to the loss of reserves Al Newman, Junior Ortiz, and Paul Sorrento, the bench is not as strong. The Twins would love to have Sorrento, who was traded to Cleveland, back to play first base because Kent Hrbek started the year on the DL. Luis Quinones is the new utility infielder, and he will have to share time at third base with Scott Leius, with Mike Pagliarulo out with a perforated eardrum. The other major change is rookie Pedro Munoz replacing the departed Dan Gladden in leftfield. John Smiley, acquired in a trade with Pittsburgh, won 20 games last year and should ease the burden of losing Morris. Other than that, Minnesota is pretty much the same group. Scoring runs has never been a problem for them, with Kirby Puckett leading the offense. The bullpen is not very deep, but closer Rick Aguilera and Carl Willis are outstanding. The starting rotation of Smiley, Scott Erickson, Kevin Tapani, and Bill Krueger is above average, especially when you consider the run support the offense will give them.

There are more questions about the Oakland Athletics roster this year than in a round of Jeopardy. The A's suffered many injuries last year, which ruined their chances to win their fourth straight division title. Can Oakland get back to the top in 1992? I think they can if all of their unknowns work out positively. First of all, Tony LaRussa is the best manager in baseball. When you consider that they lost the entire left side of the infield (Walt Weiss and Carney Lansford) and their three best middle relievers (Rick Honeycutt, Todd Burns, and Gene Nelson) to major injuries, in addition to nagging pains to Rickey Henderson and Dave Stewart, it is amazing that LaRussa could still get 84 wins out of this club. I look for a healthy Oakland ballclub to rebound. Stewart and Bob Welch had poor years last year, but they are still good pitchers. Those two, along with 17-game winner Mike Moore and youngster Joe Slusarski, make an average starting staff that becomes above average when the offense is clicking. And what an offense it is. Jose Canseco, Rickey and Dave Henderson, Harold Baines, Mark McGwire (who is even stronger this year and has stopped listening to the hitting instructors, as he did early in his career—I look for him to have a monster year), and Terry Steinbach make up the heart of one of the most potent lineups in baseball.

The Texas Rangers are another of the A.L. West teams who will score runs by the truckload. Their pitching, however, is what will keep them in the middle of the pack this year—especially now that Nolan Ryan is already hurt. Youngsters Bobby Witt and Scott Chiamparino have had injury problems, not that they have lived up to their potential anyway. Kevin Brown is probably the best starter on this weak staff. Closer Jeff Russell is not among the league's best, and the rest of the pen is pretty awful. But boy can they hit. The Ranger lineup boasts former and future all-stars Ruben Sierra, Julio Franco, Rafael Palmeiro, Juan Gonzalez, Kevin Reimer, Brian Downing, Ivan Rodriguez, and Dean Palmer. It is crucial for Texas to get off to a fast start this year. If not, this injury-prone team could melt in Arlington's August heat.

The good news for Seattle Mariners fans is that they picked up slugger Kevin Mitchell in a trade with San Francisco. In the diminiutive Kingdome, a healthy Mitchell may approach 50 homers. The bad news is that they gave up way too much talent to get him. Seattle traded away Dave Burba, one of their best pitching prospects, and relievers Mike Jackson and Bill Swift, both of whom are coming off their best seasons. The Mariners also lost pitcher Bill Krueger, who surprised everybody by winning 11 games last year. This leaves them with many holes in their pitching staff. Erik Hansen, who was hurt most of last year, is the best starter, and Rich DeLucia should be ready to contribute. The Mariners may be forced to rush their 1989 top draft pick Roger Salkeld to the majors. The addition of Mitchell upgrades their offense from decent to good. Ken Griffey, Jr., Jay Buhner, Edgar Martinez, Harold Reynolds, and rookie Tino Martinez are the biggest threats.

The California Angels are once again relying solely on their pitching to attempt to get out of the cellar in 1992. The three lefthanders—Jim Abbott, Mark Langston, and Chuck Finley—are the three best southpaws in baseball. In fact the Angels have the best pitching staff in baseball. The three lefties combined to win 55 games last season, and the two top relievers—Bryan Harvey and Mark Eichhorn—had a combined ERA well below two. The problem with the Angels is that their lineup is filled with over-the-hill former stars, such as Lance Parrish, Gary Gaetti, Von Hayes, and Hubie Brooks, and young guys who don't have a whole lot of potential. Lee Stevens will try to replace Wally Joyner at first base. He is a great big guy with an awful swing who may hit a few homers. Gary Disarcina will start the season at shortstop, but he hasn't shown he can hit yet. Joe Rose will play second since Luis Sojo is hurt, which means one below-average player will replace another. Luis Polonia is a young small guy with great talent and poor fundamentals, while his outfieldmate Junior Felix is a young small guy with good fundamentals and not much talent. That type of poor chemistry seems to sum up this team.

The Kansas City Royals had a very active off-season, and now that the season has started you could probably second-guess every move they made. Let's start with the biggest trade of the winter. The Royals traded two of their most popular players, Bret Saberhagen and Bill Pecota, for three of the biggest crybabies, not to mention overrated players, in baseball—Kevin McReynolds, Gregg Jefferies, and Keith Miller. Then they traded Kirk Gibson, one of the hardest working players in the game, to the Pirates for Neal Heaton. Then they traded Storm Davis, a valuable pitcher who can either start or pitch out of the bullpen, to Baltimore for Bob Melvin, who was the fourth catcher in line to make the club. Then they traded Todd Benzinger, a switch hitter who can play several positions, to the Dodgers for a pinch-hitter, Chris Gwynn. They did sign free agent Wally Joyner, but they lost Danny Tartabull and Kurt Stillwell to free agency, and they flat-out released Kevin Seitzer. Do the Royals really think they improved themselves this year?

This is the second of a four-part series. Next week's installment will preview the National League East.

Double-standard often unfair

"I can't believe the teacher is letting Joe Quarterback make up tomorrow's quiz when he gets back from the team's trip. It's just not fair."

For everyone who has uttered similar comments about the "special treatment" that athletes get, your eyes should have been opened to the down side of being a celebrity when tennis legend Arthur Ashe revealed that he had the AIDS virus. Only Ashe, his family, and his closest friends had known about his condition since 1988, but Ashe was forced to come forward this past Wednesday because USA TODAY had made inquiries.

I don't blame USA TODAY because any newspaper would have made the inquiry given some reason to do so. The problem comes when someone has to disclose his private life to the mass media. For example, baseball star Wade Boggs' affair with Margo Adams did not have any noticeable effect on his or the team's play, yet it was front page news for weeks. There's no story if Wade Boggs is an average steelworker.

While athletes may catch a break on a speeding ticket or get extensions on papers, they are forced to live their lives under an unmerciful media microscope. If three people are arrested for a robbery and one of them is the leading scorer on the basketball team, the papers will blare his name across the headlines and the other two names won't be mentioned until later in the body of the article. Conversely, if none of the three criminals are celebrities the headlines would read "Three Arrested for Robbery." The double-standard doesn't always help the athlete.

Ashe now feels that "people will look at him differently." He said he didn't go public with the news five years ago because it "would have permanently and—my wife and I believe—unnecessarily infringed our family right to privacy." How can anybody disagree with him?

CBS and ESPN executives both agree that news such as this "needs to be examined on a case-by-case basis" to determine what type of coverage it is to receive. Ted Shaker, CBS Sports executive, referring to the privacy issue, told USA TODAY that: "There's almost an obsessive desire to know more and more. I'm not sure this information serves the public."

So, those of you who are jealous of or upset at the "special privileges" celebrities enjoy, remember that for every make-up quiz there's also the destruction of a human's private life. Arthur Ashe, a great pioneer and ambassador, deserved better.

Softball rolls to seventh straight

Yuengling named Patriot League's Player of the Week; team sweeps Delaware, Holy Cross, Towson State

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Who would have thought that the Bucknell women's softball team could rebound from the loss of a star pitcher and two All-Patriot League players to graduation? Head coach Terrie Grieb, that's who. Grieb's pre-season prediction that: "the loss of those players could be tough....But I am excited about this team because I like the type of softball that we will be playing, and I know that our veterans will step up and take a stronger leadership role" seems to be coming true for the 1992 Bison. The 14-player squad rallied last week to sweep three straight double-headers, creating a seven-game winning streak that has upped its record to 13-6.

Last weekend, Bucknell took on both Delaware and Patriot League foe Holy Cross in two home twinbills. Saturday's competition with Delaware brought the Bison a close 5-4 victory in game one, followed by an easy 8-2 win in the second contest.

In the opening game, Bucknell's Lisa Fink '93 and Delaware's Cheryl Richino pitched to a 4-4 tie through four innings. Fink, who was nursing a blistered throwing hand, was replaced by Allison Love '95 in the fifth. The rookie went on pick up the win by holding her opponents scoreless in the final three innings.

For the win, co-captain Jen Yuengling '93 took the final inning into her own hands. After she hit a single to right, the junior moved into scoring position by stealing second base. Next, Delaware's Debbie Hughes bobbled a Fink ground ball, allowing Yuengling to score the winning run. For the game, the co-captain went three-for-four with a triple and one RBI. Ellen Gabriel '93 was also a multiple hitter for Bucknell, going two-for-three at bat and adding an RBI of her own.

Game two was a story of pitching and hitting for the home team. Heidi Dawson '95 continued in her winning ways with a five-hit seven-inning performance, while her teammates hit an impressive 11 balls into the field.

The Bucknell roster sported three multiple hitters, including: Fink, who was two-for-four with a double and a stolen base; and Heather Hoehn '94 and Carol Gesler '93, who both went two-for-three. Yuengling, Hoehn, and Wendi Fitz '94 each added to their lists of RBI, knocking in three, two, and one respectively. In the second game, Hoehn also led a defensive assault on Delaware, putting 11 out at first base.

Bucknell brought the elation and confidence resulting from Saturday's competition into its Sunday match-up with Holy Cross, which proved to be exciting. For the first five innings of game one, Love seemed to be leading her team to victory. Then, in the top of the sixth, the Bucknell team began to falter, allowing the Crusaders to score three runs to tie the score, 5-5.

Love and her fellow teammates played tough when the game went into extra innings, however. Bucknell eventually scored the winning run in the bottom of the eighth, when Gabriel was hit with a pitch with the bases loaded. Holy Cross pitcher Heather Kersch's mishap drove home Fitz, who had opened the inning with a single, and rendered the final score 6-5 in Bucknell's favor.

Love pitched an excellent game for the Bison, allowing only five hits (to Kersch's 12) and two earned runs while striking out eight. Offensively, Fink took top honors for the game, going three-for-four at the plate. Fink's other offensive accomplishments included two doubles, an RBI, and a steal of home. Once again, Yuengling fared well at bat, hitting three-for-five with one RBI. Fitz (two-for-two) and Jill Spatzer '93 (two-for-four) were also multiple hitters for Bucknell.

In the second contest, Bucknell faced a one-run deficit going into the sixth inning, when Hoehn brought in the tying run off of an RBI single by Spatzer. Fitz followed by knocking a single to score Kelly Corr '95 later in the inning. Those two runs proved to be all that Bucknell would need to take the game, 5-4. Hoehn was Bucknell's offensive star for game two, batting a perfect three-for-three, while Dawson picked up her fifth straight win with her seven-inning pitching effort.

Last Wednesday, Bucknell took on Towson State in Maryland. Game one was a classic pitchers' dual between Towson's Mandy Albrecht and Love. After seven scoreless innings, the two battled it out in extra innings where Love would go on to take a 1-0 victory, giving her a 6-4 record. Yuengling again was on for the Bison at the plate, going two-for-three with a triple.

Dawson took a 5-3 win in the second contest and is now 7-1 on the season. Offensively in that game, Yuengling and Hoehn both went two-for-four, with Hoehn ripping a double and notching three RBI.

For her performance last week, Yuengling was named Patriot League Player of the Week, giving the Bison two consecutive Player-of-the-Week honors. Not only did Yuengling enjoy impressive play during her last three doubleheaders, but she also has not been thrown out in 12 attempts at stolen bases this year. Not surprisingly, Yuengling leads the Patriot League in that category.

The Bucknell co-captain also plays catcher for her squad, an important defensive role, especially considering the addition of two rookie pitchers to the team's lineup.

As of Apr. 5, Bucknell is in either the number one or the number two spot in the Patriot League in nine of 14 categories. In addition to Yuengling's stolen-base prowess, Corr is tops in home runs with two in 16 games; Fink is tied for first in saves with one; and the Bucknell team leads the league in runs scored (5.82) and fielding percentage (.942).

On Apr. 7, the NCAA also released its list of national softball leaders, a list which includes three Bucknellians. Individually, Yuengling is 13th in the nation in stolen bases, while Fink is 20th. Hoehn also made the top 20 in RBI, clinching the number 11 spot. Collectively, Bucknell is currently 16th nationally in batting and eighth in scoring.

The softball team is scheduled to play two important league twin-bills this weekend. The first, on Saturday, is against the 1991 Patriot League Champion, Army. Sunday, the Bison will take on Fordham; both doubleheaders begin at 1 p.m. on the Mod fields.

Kevin Roth '92 named Athlete of the Week; team travels to U. of Denver and Air Force

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN

Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton compared his experience during the New York primary to the Cyclone at Coney Island "with all its ups and downs, twists and turns," but his analogy could also be used to effectively describe the men's lacrosse season thus far.

Coming off a week in which they were crushed in three consecutive games, the Bison looked like the Dennis Rodmans of college lacrosse, rebounding to capture two wins in impressive fashion last weekend. Bucknell had little time to savor the weekend victories over Holy Cross and Marist because on Wednesday the Blue and Orange found themselves on the losing end of a battle with yet another national powerhouse, Towson State. Team captain Mike Conway '92 commented that "it is psychologically tough to prepare for each game when you are going back and forth between great teams and teams which aren't so great."

The weekend started off slow for the Bison as they came out a little flat against the Crusaders of Holy Cross in Worcester. Bucknell, clearly the team with better skills and talent, fell behind 1-0 in the first quarter, and was only up 3-1 at the half. The Bison regrouped during the intermission, and more then tripled their first half offensive output en route to a 13-3 victory.

Kevin Roth '92 led the way for Bucknell, scoring a total of five goals, while fellow attackman Matt Comyns '92 tallied two goals and two assists. The productivity of the attack unit was not to stop there as Doug DePietro '92 (one goal and three assists) and Todd Streelman '93 (two assists) also played significant offensive roles. From the midfield position, Justin Zackey '94 notched two goals and an assist, and Dan Snyder '93 ripped one goal while assisting on another. Midfielders Erik Herrema '93 and Greg Brown '92 each added a goal to the Bison effort.

The defensive unit effectively shut down the Crusader offense, allowing only ten shots on goal all game.

On Sunday, the Bison needed no wake-up call as they traveled to Poughkeepsie, New York to take on a winless Marist squad. The offensive onslaught started early and would not let up for the entire game as Bucknell quickly jumped out to an 11-0 halftime lead. The second half looked quite similar to the first with Bucknell pumping the net with six goals in both the third and fourth quarters. After 60 minutes of play, the Bison had registered a 23-4 win over a humiliated Marist team, while bringing their season record to 3-3.

Just about everyone except the team trainer had a hand in this win, including defenseman Jeff Kangas '94 who scored his first collegiate goal. Once again Roth was the leading goal scorer for the Bison with six, while Zackey added five goals and an assist, and Streelman had two goals and two assists. DePietro was Bucknell's leading playmaker dishing out five assists, and Comyns also had another strong game recording three assists to go along with one goal.

A number of younger players gave a glimpse of what the future holds for Bucknell lacrosse as freshmen Chris DiMenna (three goals), Chris Wyszynski (two goals), and Steven Lewis (one goal and one assist) all played prominent roles in the Bison win.

The beautiful spring weather, which has proved so elusive thus far this year, decided to pay Lewisburg a visit just in time for Bucknell's game against the Tigers of Towson State, truly one of the best teams in the nation. Towson was 5-0 coming into this game, with its last win a dramatic 8-7 victory over Loyola College last Saturday.

According to Conway, "The swing between playing Marist one game and then Towson the next is probably the biggest swing in college lacrosse. I guess the football

Oarspeople sink at George Mason

"Frustrating" is probably the best way to describe the men's and women's crew races at George Mason University last Sunday. The weather was poor, the wind was strong, and the Occoquan proved to all that it is possible to have waves on a reservoir. Not only were the conditions almost unrowable, but, according to novice men's coach Jimmy King, "The officiating was lousy."

The most distressing race of the day came in the men's novice "A" race. The novice boat of Chris Ginieczki '94, John Muhlfeld '95, Matt Kersting '95, John Caldwell '92, Drew Wall '95, Marc Ortland '95, Brad Carlson '95, Carlos Valdes '95, and coxswain Crystal Theesfeld '95 clapped oars with West Virginia University off the start. Within meters the two schools collided again. This time West Virginia's collision with the novice boat forced Bucknell into George Mason University.

The three schools were able to separate, allowing GMU to continue, unhindered, down the course. West Virginia would again lock oars with Bucknell before the novices were able to, according to Wall, "blow West Virginia away." Despite all of the collisions, George Washington University never clashed oars with another crew—thus facilitating an easy victory.

Once the race was over, both the GMU and the Bucknell coxswains protested the race. In a move that went against crew etiquette, the officials called for a re-race but granted GWU the victory. The second race was just between GMU and Bucknell since West Virginia chose not to race again. The novices managed to get a clean start with no collisions the second time around. Bucknell had a six-seat lead shortly before the 1,000 meter mark, when the three-man crabbed.

Theesfeld called for a power ten, allowing the novices to row through GMU without any apparent difficulty, resulting in a half-boat length victory. Theesfeld commented that, despite having to row twice under adverse conditions, the rowers "still rowed as hard in the second race."

Indirectly, the novice "B" boat also suffered from the collisions of the "A" race. After competing in his first race, Wall was supposed to go to the "B" boat to race with them. After the protest, though, the officials scheduled the second novice "A" race to begin immediately after the novice "B" race, making it impossible for the switch

Faculty abolishes Jan Plan effective '93-'94

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In a landmark decision for the future of Bucknell, the faculty passed by overwhelming majority Monday a motion that will eliminate the present January program as of January 1994.

This vote was followed by the defeat of a second motion that would have instituted the newly proposed Winter Study program with its requirement that students participate in a minimum of two January projects during their four years at Bucknell.

The decisions came after nearly one and a half hours of debate which revealed a wide range of opinions concerning the value of a January program.

The motion to eliminate the January program as it has existed since its introduction in 1968 was introduced by Associate Professor of Geography and Committee on Instruction Chair Ben Marsh, who advocated the elimination of the current January program citing low levels of student and faculty participation and commitment as the reasons for such an action.

Marsh presented data which showed the level of student participation to be steady but low at an average of approximately 32% per year. He informed faculty that approximately 15 faculty members produce one half of the registrants for the January program.

He also noted that disgruntled parents continually voice concern about excess free time with which students are faced during this period, that students complain that an end-of-May finals schedule increases the difficulty of competing in the already highly competitive summer job market, and that faculty members generally feel that teaching Jan Plans is not especially rewarding. "It is an instructional program which is no longer giving much instruction," said Marsh.

Vice President for Academic Affairs Larry Shinn echoed Marsh's concerns saying that this past January there were "2,000 families who had students home or partying late at night". Shinn voiced his belief that many parents feel that the January term is wasted and that they would prefer that their children utilize their time in a more productive way.

Shinn suggested to the faculty that the board of Trustees would not approve the continuation of the current Jan Plan program and that the faculty was faced with a situation in which they either had to considerably strengthen the January program or be forced to eliminate it. "This time around the students and parents have to see the difference," said Shinn.

There was, however, considerable support for the continuation of the present Jan plan from several members of the faculty. Associate Professor of Japanese and East Asian Studies, James Pusey, remained unconvinced that the current January plan is not working. He cited as the primary reason for preserving either the present January program or an improved version of the current program, the opportunity it gives both students and faculty "to do things not easily done during the academic year or in the summers." He added that the January program is a boon to faculty research.

Professor of Psychology and Chairman of the January Program Advisory Committee, Roger Tarpy responded to Pusey's comments saying that the proposed Winter Study program is in line with the desire to allow students and faculty to pursue unique or unusual projects during this time. "The new program has a more well-defined way to achieve those goals," defended Tarpy. "Are we going to justify [the current] Jan Plan by the few students who actually benefit from it?"

Professor of English Dennis Baumwoll questioned Marsh's assertion that one third participation in the January program is an insufficient percentage to regard the program as a success, suggesting that perhaps Marsh felt that 50% participation was adequate in light of the Winter Study proposal's requirement that students participate in the program during at least two of their four years.

"My own view is that the January program is extremely valuable," said Baumwoll. "if faculty participation is the issue, it seems naive to think that the one half course credit [that would be awarded to faculty for teaching a Winter Study program] will strike faculty as a reward that will spark excitement."

"It isn't number's, it is commitment," responded Marsh acknowledging that "there [were] a lot of issues tangled together" and that it seemed unfair that the system was set up in such a way that faculty had to choose between motions, possibly eliminating the current January program without knowing whether or not it would be replaced.

In response to Associate Professor of Physics Stephen Becker's comment that it seemed pointless to continue discussing the issue if, as Shinn suggested, the Trustees would not pass a motion for the continuation of the present pro-

Sophomore rush: the future of the Greek system

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

'Will sophomore rush work? This seems to be the million-dollar question lingering on campus, and one that can only be answered next September. Now that rush events have informally commenced, however, many of which were sparsely attended, this question seems both applicable and necessary. Can a system that has already caused housing woes on and off campus, and financial hardships within Greeks organizations, really work?

Ed Dadez, associate dean of residential life, says that it is, indeed, too soon to say. "I don't think that sophomore rush will inhibit people from rushing, but I think it may cause people to decide if they want to accept a bid." This somewhat ambiguous admonition is actually very telling, in that it represents the vast degree of uncertainty surrounding the new system.

Dadez went on to say that under the new system, first year students have, for the most part, decided to live together in theme halls next year, having effectively formed close-knit cliques. "So if they all go through rush, and not all of them get into XYZ fraternity or sorority," Dadez explained, "some people may decide that the niche is more important than what Greek life has to offer."

Kelly Cirka '93, Panhellenic rush officer, agrees with Dadez, saying that the number of women accepting bids may be down considerably. In the past, she stated, the number of women rushing was between 350 and 375. This year, the interest in informal activities has decreased, though she noted that it could simply be because sophomore rush is not something they will be forced to contend with until next year. "It seems that this year the freshmen don't think it's that important," she added. She went on to say that because many of the first year students will know the fraternities and sororities better, they may be reluctant to

Frericks accepts newly-created gay/lesbian/bisexual advisorship

BY MICKI HAMILTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Matthew Frericks has accepted the part-time position as Advisor for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual students.

A reception attended by students and faculty in the Traditional Reading Room of Ellen Betrand Library welcomed Frericks to Bucknell.

The Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual Task Force, co-chaired by Barbara Shailor, acting vice president for student services, and Marilyn Mumford, professor of English, had been searching for someone to fill this position for three months.

Prior to Wednesday, the University did not have a specific administrator who was in charge of making the campus atmosphere more inclusive of gay, lesbian, and bisexual students.

Frericks hopes to change the exclusivity of homosexual students on campus as well as other areas of contention. A 1988 graduate from Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, Frericks said, "The biggest role will be support and advocacy for the gay/lesbian/bisexual students."

The advisor plans to promote awareness through educational programming and to foster a more supportive atmosphere in hopes of making the Bucknell community more tolerant and understanding of homosexual students.

Another goal for Frericks is to "help coordinate different existing groups on campus like FLAG, the men's awareness group, the faculty, etc." so that each group can collectively work towards a common goal. This way each separate group will not be duplicating any work towards creating more tolerance on campus.

Frericks found out about the position from an article in the Daily Item. In the article the Task Force outlined the gay, lesbian, bisexual atmosphere on campus and recommended hiring an advisor for four to five hours a week. In response to the article, Frericks called Shailor and later met with her for an interview.

Frericks was hired to work only four to five hours a week but is willing to put in more time. As of now, Frenick's position is not clearly defined. Liz Shaw '94, treasurer of FLAG, said, "I think this is only a preliminary step towards a full time position."

The new gay/lesbian/bisexual advisor commented that his motivation to accept this position started in college. As a junior at Miami University, he struggled with confronting his sexual orientation and had no one to talk to about it.

Frericks said, "Looking back, remembering how hard that was has been a motivation."

As a result, Frericks wants to make the coming out process easier for other homosexual students. He wants to be a role model for homosexuals and "help them be accepted for who they are."

Newly appointed advisor Matthew Frericks hopes to support and advocate the rights of gays, lesbians, and bisexuals.

Sexual assault at Bucknell: a holistic solution

Editor's note: Several victims have come forward to tell their stories in an effort to educate the campus about problems, alternatives, and services for all parties involved. Although the names have been changed, details of the incidents appear exactly as told by the victims.

Jennifer met Mark in September. Although they were not close friends, he had always seemed like a "nice guy." One evening, as Jennifer and several of her friends were talking, one women in the group said that she had been assaulted by Mark. The women were shocked when they realized that Mark had made unwanted sexual advances toward several of the women in the room.

"I was angry," said Jennifer "I thought I could make a difference, and I wanted to talk to him." Later that evening, after drinking with friends, Jennifer went to Mark's fraternity house. There was a party going on, and Mark had also been drinking. "I asked him if he was really sure that all these women wanted him, or if he was taking advantage of them." It was loud in the house, and Mark told Jennifer they could talk in his room. Because there was a party in the room across the hall and Jennifer's best friend knew where she was, Jennifer felt safe.

Second in a series

Mark began to kiss Jennifer and ignored her reluctance. He continued his sexual advances and raped Jennifer. "He put me in a situation where I couldn't defend myself," said Jennifer "I was so confused and lost." She kicked Mark in the groin and rushed out of the room crying. "I was in disbelief. I felt like I had so much emotion inside, and I couldn't let it out."

Jennifer left the fraternity with her best friend Amy and returned to her residence hall. Amy contacted their R.A. and reported the incident. The R.A. assisted Jennifer in contacting the Women's Resource Center (WRC) and the office of Public Safety. "I don't know where I would be without the support of the Women's Resource Center," said Jennifer.

The WRC is one of several support options available to women and men who have been involved in sexual assault situations. Trained counselors at the WRC provide confidential support for victims of sexual assault and inform them of possible options including medical, assistance, psychological counseling, University disciplinary action, and legal prosecution.

Victims of sexual assault may decide to seek medical attention immediately following the incident for several reasons: treatment of possible injury; prevention of pregnancy and/or sexually transmitted disease; and means of gathering evidence to be used in criminal prosecution. An advocate from the WRC is available to accompany the victim to Evangelical Community Hospital for such an exam.

Even if victims do not choose to have evidence collected at the hospital, the student medical service will also provide treatment of physical injury and tests for pregnancy and sexually transmitted disease.

Counseling is available from both the WRC and Psychological Services, as well as the Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition (SVWIT). All services are confidential, and victims need not disclose their identity to counselors. The counselors help the victims sort through their feelings and decide which course of action is best for them. "The choice is with the individual victim; we will support her in any way we can," said Jan ice Butler, WRC director.

A sexual assault support group has recently been organized by WRC. "Women can come and talk in a safe confidential atmosphere to lend support to each other" said Butler. "It is critical to the recovery process to let survivors empower each other."

Arlene Hoyt, director of Psychological Services said, "we provide everything from immediate support to comfort and options." In addition to aiding victims of sexual assault, Hoyt noted that counselors also "help perpetrators analyze their behavior and understand themselves as well as help perpetrators who feel unjustly accused."

SVWIT is a local sexual assault and domestic violence center with a 24-hour emergency hotline. Services such as one-on-one counseling, support groups, and empowerment groups are also available.

Though these resources do provide valuable support to victims who have undergone sexual assault situations, counselors agree that an increase in programming designed to heighten students' awareness of this issue would be an even greater step towards decreasing the frequency of sexual assaults on campus.

In this light, efforts addressing the problem of sexual assault and harassment on campus are not restricted to post-incident services. Groups such as Feminist Outreach and Men Against Rape seek to advocate communication across gender boudaries in an attempt to prevent such incidents. "We are getting a response from things like the poster campaign," said Bill Farrell '92, of Men Against Rape. John Stith '95, of the same group, notes, "We all have our own reasons for being here [in Men Against Rape], but I think it's fair to say that the group recognizes the magnitude of the problem, and we want to make a difference."

Despite such efforts, the problem remains very real. "I still think about it all the time and it still hurts. It's something I'll never forget," said Jennifer.

accept a bid from one other than their top choice.

While it may be a wide-spread belief on campus that the administration, led by President Gary Sojka, has done a masterful job of putting the final nail in the Greek coffin, Dadez asserts that this could not be further from the truth. "President Sojka and the trustees have said all along that the Trustee Implementation Plan (TIP) recommendations were not developed to cause harm to the Greek system," he said. "So if sophomore rush appears to have caused harm by not providing the number of members necessary to keep the fraternities and sororities viable, I would hope that after sophomore rush we would begin a dialogue to decide if we should go back to second semester freshman rush... And the University is open for that dialogue to occur if, in fact, sophomore rush is harming the system."

Interfraternity Council President, Pete Brady '93, doubts that the intentions of the TIP proposal have proven effective or sound. The first goal of sophomore rush, he said, was to expand on the freshman experience. Brady believes this to be a ridiculous notion, and insists that the majority of the students would agree that their freshman experience was greatly influenced by pledging. The second goal was to try to place more upper-classmen in the houses. This, Brady said, could very easily have been achieved by mandating that 75% of the house be filled by juniors and seniors, while the remainder be filled by sophomores.

Dadez stresses that the issue of filling houses is at the forefront of the potential problems surrounding the survival of the new system. "If this year we have three chapters that legitimately cannot fill their houses because of a lack of numbers," he said, "and if sophomore rush is not providing the necessary numbers, we cannot go into the fall of 1993 with eight or nine houses not filled." Essentially, it seems, next year could prove to be a deciding factor in the future of the Greek system, in that sophomore rush may usher in a new generation of individuals not interested in fraternities and sororities. "The Greeks need to be pushing harder," Dadez claims. In order for sophomore rush to work, he said, the Greek organizations must convince potential rushees to attend upcoming events.

Next September will undoubtedly provide all the answers to the unending lot of loose ends surrounding sophomore rush. Clearly, multiple problems have arisen for both Greeks and non-Greeks, and the system has not yet gotten off the ground. As Dadez stated, the survival of sophomore rush depends solely on numbers, and it is too soon to make predictions of that nature. In the meantime, people wishing to rush next year will simply have to count the days, while the administration and Greek leaders look for tough answers to difficult questions.

Global warming. Destruction of the rain forests. Toxic waste. These aren't the legacies we wanted from the "environmental" President. Urge George Bush to attend the U.N. Ask the President to stop America's role as leading producer of greenhouse gases. Task force examines alcohol policy

Process requires careful integration of Act 31 into philosophy behind regulations

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writers

When President Gary Sojka announced in a Feb. 10 news conference that "alcohol is the drug of choice at college," not a few students snickered at what they considered pretty self-evident. With such an attitude to deal with, the alcohol task force has explored alternate methods of dealing with alcohol problems on campus.

One of the three task forces appointed by Barbara Shailor, acting vice president of student services, in response to the report submitted by the External Review Committee, the alcohol policy task force has begun to review the problems that have crept into the current enforcement procedures and to try to examine problems in a system that is simply not working.

With this task in mind, the committee set to work establishing a number of principles by which it believes the alcohol policy should operate. Gerald Commerford, assistant dean of housing and co-chair of the committee, stressed that the committee has firmly planted in its proceedings a belief that every workable alcohol policy must be centered on "reason, responsibility, and education."

Commerford noted, however, that the capacity for the committee to change the enforcement policy is restricted by Pennsylvania state law, specifically Act 31, which was adopted in May, 1988. Because, according to Commerford, "there was very little we could do with regard to changing the policy itself," the committee has instead focused on ways of making the current policy more equitable.

Although the committee has not yet announced an official proposal, its discussions have mainly focused on two key issues: consistent enforcement and fair sanctions.

The committee has identified an inconsistency in the enforcement of the alcohol policy across the campus, according to Commerford.

Vince DeCerchio, director of public safety, said that often resident assistants deal with policy infractions differently than do students in fraternities. "Fraternity houses are homogeneous environments, and to a certain degree, they have the ability to self-govern," DeCerchio said, adding that this self-governance does not always exist in residence halls.

Mary Schoonover GR, a residence manager in Swartz hall, believes that anyone who has spent any short length of time on campus will soon see that Bucknell faces an alcohol problem. As a member of the committee she has shared in discussions about the current discrepancies in the enforcement of the alcohol policy.

According to DeCerchio, the committee has discussed guidelines for educational enforcement which "may result in giving resident assistants a little more latitude in dealing with alcohol problems."

After discussing enforcement procedures, talk has turned quite naturally to sanctions. Commerford said the committee sees several grave problems with current alcohol sanctions. First, infractions of varying degrees of severity have generally led to one common level of punishment.

Under the new system suggested by the committee, sanctions of varying severity would follow four levels of infractions. According to these classifications, the least serious alcohol infraction would involve an underage student who is present in a room where alcohol is being served. This rule does not apply to fraternity and sorority functions, which are regarded as public events and thus handled differently by the University.

A little more serious would be an infraction in which a student is caught with an open beer in hand, according to the committee.

The third level would regard any student found to be intoxicated.

And the fourth, most serious infraction of University policy would involve a student caught serving alcohol to minors.

Under this new approach, students will receive sanctions proportional to the infractions they commit; the current policy does not allow for this flexibility in sanctioning.

In addition, the committee seems ready to do away with fines. In the past, any one of several offences led to a standard punishment: a $50 fine and a writing requirement.

Commerford said the committee intends to present this new system of sanctioning to the Bucknell Student Government, the Inter-Fraternity Council, the Panhellenic Council and the Committee on Complimentary Activities within the next week.

The alcohol policy task force has also discussed a wristband proposal presented by Pete Brady '93, IFC. According to Brady's proposal, 21-year old students would be required to wear wristbands and only they could be served alcohol beverages at social functions.

Brady recommends his proposal on the basis that a non-segregated "party area" will help increase natural interaction among those legally allowed in the "21 room" and those restricted from it. He suggests that the consumption area be open to everyone. Those students drinking alcoholic beverag-

Greeks form unprecedented multicultural committee

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The campus Greek system and the Multicultural Center have combined efforts in creating Greeks for the Advancement of Multicultural Education, a committee charged with assuring that Bucknell's curriculum sustains a focus on global and multicultural issues, as outlined in the much publicized "Foundations for the Future."

The 22 member committee is comprised of students and staff who represent all campus fraternities and sororities, as well as the Multicultural Center.

According to Alem Asres, director of the Multicultural Center, the objective of the panel is to plan programming that is "conducive for the intellectual growth and development" of all students in order to gain cultural awareness and sensitivity.

Asres sees "great potential" for the committee to link many groups together, pool their resources, and develop programming that will benefit the entire campus. The group plans to sponsor at least two campus-wide programs each semester.

IFC President Pete Brady '93 believes the committee will open up an outlet for the entire campus to become more educated on multi-cultural issues.

"A multicultural education would expand the basis of knowledge and create a climate of intellectual growth on campus," Asres said recently in a speech at Bloomsburg University. "People cannot expect a young person to suddenly accept the value of cultural diversity without first fostering understanding and tolerance."

Asres will offer his knowledge on multicultural issues to the committee in an effort to encourage "understanding and tolerance" through the committee's programming.

Accrding to Eva Szreniawski '93, Panhel President, "the need [for this committee] grew out of the fact that resources could be pooled to provide larger, campus-involved programs" for all students.

A coordination of programs would benefit from the input of all the groups involved. It would also increase the number of participants in each program and demand less financial support of each Greek organization to sponsor the events.

Senior perspectives: The Academic Policy

Editor's note: This article is the first in a series examining senior perspectives concerning pertinent issues on campus. Having four years of experience from the eyes of a student, many seniors offer educated opinions on academic policy, the Jan Plan, and how Bucknell has prepared them for the future.

BY MICHAEL MCLEAN

In response to the ongoing debate concerning the curriculum, seniors have begun voicing their opinions on the direction of Bucknell's academic philosophy.

The need to pre-register or search the course catalogue for popular electives is gone, but faced with the prospect of graduate study or getting a job, students are examining how well their undergraduate experience has equipped them to effectively partake in today's world.

In light of the General Education Committee's (GEC) proposal to expand the current distribution requirements of the university, some seniors have expressed their concern. The proposal is based on what the GEC deems to be a Common Learning Agenda of "six distinctive elements in the mosaic that is a Bucknell education." Further, the GEC wishes to integrate the Common Learning Agenda within a broader context contained in the Foundations for the Future document. The ultimate goal of these proposals is to establish a coherent and diverse curriculum.

The GEC's goal to expand curricular distribution requirements has received mixed views from seniors, depending in part on their particular majors. According to history major Chris Cook '92, "Bucknell's academic philosophy is going in a direction that deviates from the liberal education that I was attracted to as a senior in high school. The philosophy of the curriculum seems to be focusing away from a traditional liberal arts education, while placing an emphasis on technical disciplines such as management and the sciences. It is becoming a technical oriented school that offers liberal arts electives."

Like Cook, music major Jennifer Walsh '92 sees a problem with the directional philosophy of the school. "It seems that more and more money goes into the disciplines that are not necessarily associated with a liberal arts type of education." Walsh also stated that the university "would be misdirected if they added any more requirements because it could potentially limit the electives of a student. Particularly one in a B.S. program where electives are scarce."

> —Chris Cook '92

In opposition to these claims, some seniors see the need to increase the current distribution requirements, especially in light of the GEC's plan to heighten cultural and social awareness through their two "Broadened Perspectives" requirements. Sharon Friedman '92, a double major in psychology and Spanish, feels that she has received a liberal education that has made her socially and culturally aware of the inequities and biases within society. In reference to the proposal of the two "Broadened Perspectives" requirements, Friedman concluded, "I think it should be mandatory that all students take classes that address these issues. There is definitely a lack of awareness at Bucknell despite the other learning that goes on."

In agreement with Friedman's concern, psychology major Karen Cort '92 sees the real problem in the curriculum itself. "The original general curriculum requirements never considered the social and cultural issues. It would be a very good idea to have mandatory courses addressing these issues."

Although there is general agreement with the GEC's "Broadened Perspectives" requirements, many seniors see a problem in the committee's plans to require a freshman Foundation Seminar. Similar to the current Freshman Adviser Seminars, the goal of the Foundation Seminar is to serve as what the proposal calls "a launching point for a student's Bucknell educational experience." Although most seniors acknowledge the merit of this proposal, their complaints draw from their own experience with Freshman Seminars Typifying general criticisms, one senior said, "My Freshman Adviser Seminar was a waste because it did not satisfy a distributional requirement. It counted for nothing other than a credit. The only way they

Rash of vandalism results in multiple criminal charges

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Concerned about a rash of vandalism involving BB guns and fireworks, the University has decided to press charges, both external and internal, against several students following two separate incidents last week.

Eric Steckel '94 and Christopher Mitchell '92 have been charged by the East Buffalo Police Department (EBPD) with criminal mischief and the sale and/or use of air rifles (BB guns), both summary offenses, for an incident which occured behind the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house on Apr. 2.

A second, unrelated incident, has resulted in the filing of charges against Stephen Zoog '94 and Thomas DesChamps '94. Following the Apr. 5 incident, in which Zoog and DesChamps set off bottle rockets in the Langone Center mail room, the two have been charged by EBPD with a fireworks violation, which is an unclassified misdemeanor, and disorderly conduct, a summary offense. Deschamps faces an additional charge of criminal mischief.

According to John Dunlop, dean of students, the University has also decided to charge the four students in the internal judicial system. While refusing to disclose the exact charges being levied against the students, Dunlop said that in cases such as these, students may face the following University charges, which appear in the Student Handbook:

• Group 1, Item 4c: Behavior that deliberately or recklessly endangers the well-being or safety of others or results in bodily injury.

• Group 1, Item 7: Disorderly Conduct.

• Group 2, Item 1: Intentionally or wantonly causing damage to university property.

• Group 4, Item 1: Possession or use of Fireworks or offensive weapons.

In both of the incidents, the students were intoxicated, according to Public Safety reports. But because Mitchell and Steckel are of legal drinking age, no alcohol charges will be filed against them. Dunlop would not comment on whether internal alcohol charges would be filed against DesChamps and Zoog, neither of whom is 21 years old.

East Buffalo Police Chief Barry Hosterman said that because he did not receive the complaint until several days after the incident, no alcohol charges have been filed against DesChamps and Zoog.

According to police reports from the Apr. 2 incident, Mitchell and Steckel, from their car on Farm Lot, shot at and broke two windows in the rear of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house. When they were later apprehended by public safety officers, the two were in possession of air rifles.

In the April 5 incident, a custodian in the Langone Center reported seeing two students shooting firecrackers in the mail room. DesChamps and Zoog were later apprehended when a public safety officer witnessed them shooting bottle rockets over the hood of his vehicle. He apprehended the students near the Music and Arts Building. The officer recovered bottle rockets and a BB gun from the bushes where the two students dropped them.

Shinn reminded faculty that the option to create a similar program in May would still be open to the faculty should the present January program be eliminated.

President Gary Sojka stressed that it would be impossible to guess exactly how the Trustees would react to faculty recommendations concerning the program and emphasized that Trustee response should not be the issue. "We should not decide by what the Trustees will say. We do need to hear from this group," said Sojka.

Yet Sojka did voice his resignations over allowing the current January program to stand in its current form. "If we are saddled with a program that lasts a month in the middle of the academic year and we are finding that it isn't worthy of this faculty and these students, we must look at it," he said. He asked the faculty to ask themselves whether they believed that the current program helped students to be the kinds of learners that they wanted to be and whether it did this for enough of the students for it to be warranted.

In a comment made Tuesday, Marsh reacted to the vote that will eliminate the current January program without replacing it with the proposed Winter Study program by calling the decision was reactive than constructive." "In many ways it was a sad decision," said Marsh. "It was like we had taken an old dog to the vet. It had been something that had been useful, something we loved, but it just didn't seem to work anymore."

The faculty now faces the decision of how to restructure the calendar to close the gap created by the elimination of the January Program. The two possible adjustments are to move to a traditional calendar in which the second semester would begin toward the middle of January allowing students to finish for the summer several weeks earlier than the current schedule permits, or to move the "January" program to May. The faculty will decide on this scheduling issue during the faculty meeting to be held the first Monday of May.

should make a mandatory freshman seminar is if the student can use the credit to satisfy a distributional requirement." Under the proposal, the Foundation Seminar will place an additional requirement on students.

Despite credit and distributional requirement criticisms, many seniors felt that mandating freshmen to take a Foundation Seminar would be favorable because it would ease the transition of the student from high school to college life.

Anthony Graziano, a senior English major, recalls his Freshman Adviser Seminar: "It was a good class because you were able to establish a close, working relationship with your adviser. As the semester went on, you and your adviser became more aware of your academic abilities and potentials. The professor of a freshman seminar should definitely serve as a student's adviser."

In assessing the student body, the GEC reported that most faculty members saw Bucknell students as lacking in a wide range of basic skills. One of these criticisms pointed out a general lack in writing skills. When questioned in light of this assessment, senior students were mixed in their responses. However, the general consensus of seniors interviewed said that the GEC's claim was dependent upon a student's major or general field of study.

Asked if she felt that Bucknell students were deficient in writing skills, chemistry major Karen Stagliano '92, was somewhat uncertain. "I don't think we are deficient in general. Every person has their own personal strengths and weaknesses. It's a hard question to answer since it is uncertain who we are compared to."

Brad Mellinger '92, an economics major, feels that most students are fairly proficient writers. "The writing requirement is good because it forces all students to write. Some students are better writers than others because their particular major requires them to write more often. Given the nature of Bucknell's curriculum, there is no other real way to structure a writing requirement."

Many seniors believe that the GEC's claim of students lacking in basic skills, whether in writing or other areas, reflects a certain amount of failure on the part of Bucknell's faculty. The majority of students interviewed testified that at least at one time or another, their writing was graded with bias. Other students felt that they had to not only change their writing style to fit a particular instructor's tastes, but that they also had to write with content that adhered to, and reflected, their instructor's beliefs.

Some seniors believe that the GEC's efforts to make Bucknell students more culturally and globally aware would fall short of its goals because it fails to address the language issue. Many seniors agreed that if any new requirements were to be added to the curriculum, they should be based around the study of a language. Dottie Wingrove '92, a management major who was abroad in France, remarked, "American students are at a big disadvantage compared to students of other countries. When abroad, foreign students can speak our language and are in touch with American culture. Bucknell should encourage its students to value, as well as take, a foreign language."

Next Issue: Why weren't student concerns considered in the decision to abolish the Jan Plan? Seniors voice opinions on the Jan Plan decision process.

Freind blasts 'looney liberals'

At a speech at Villanova University on "political correctness" on April 9, Republican Senate candidate Steve Freind blasted two-term incumbent Arlen Specter for being an ally of the anti-free speech movement on college campuses.

Commenting on the "Political Correctness" movement on American campuses Freind said, "It's the 1990's version of McCarthyism. Political correctness flies in the face of intellectual freedom and free speech straight out of an Orwell book."

"The same bunch of looney left-wing liberals who want to suppress freedom of speech... have created a mood of intolerance in this country. If you dare to disagree with their liberal point of view you are immediately branded with their vogue name of the month, be it anti-semetic, homophobic or racist."

Skidmore restricts off-campus rights

Upperclassmen at Skidmore are outraged that their applications to live off-campus have been rejected by the Director of Residential Life, Donald Hastings, who mandated that all 1,699 spaces on campus be filled, allowing only 400 students to live off-campus.

Residential Life said that the college needs room and board money to pay expenses, since Admissions expects a smaller freshman class next year.

"We are a residential college. Living on campus is complimentary to the academic lives of the students," said Hastings.

Hazing violations suspend Greeks

Colgate has suspended the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority for two semesters starting in the fall of 1992, after preliminary investigations revealed hazing violations committed in February.

A separate investigation revealed hazing violations at the Delta Kappa Epsilon fraternity, and the dean's office has placed them on suspended recognition as well.

The problems at KKG consisted of alcohol violations which resulted in one girl being brought to the emergency room. The report did not outline the specific violations at DKE, but did say that the problem was not alcohol-related, and referred to the handbook clause prohibiting physical harm or emotional strain.

Lehigh students abuse E-mail

Twelve Lehigh students lost their network privileges for sending chain letters titled "With Sex All Things Are Possible" over the University computer network.

Any chain letter, whether obscene or not, is a felony offense, carrying a maximum fine of $15,000, but the director commented that the students' problem is doubled because the letter was obscene.

The letter stated, "You will experience great sex within four days of receiving this letter, provided you send it on." It went on to describe the sexual rewards the sender would receive, as well as the sexual problems that could result for a person who broke the chain.

Sculpture stolen at F&M Library

A piece of sculpture from Franklin and Marshall's permanent art collection was stolen from the Martin Library of Sciences; the piece was donated to the school by recently the deceased artist, J. Dugan.

The sculpture is a rectangular piece of Pakistanian onyx about 18 by 22 inches, with green and brown striations. The piece has very little monetary value.

Dugan donated the piece because he felt that younger people should be exposed to art in surroundings other than museums or galleries, and that students should work among art.

Other pieces of Dugan's work reside at Villanova and Bucknell.

In Celebration of Earth Day?

How many Bucknellians know that this campus has a prime strip of waterfront property on the Susquehanna River? The administration obviously isn't keen on letting the community know that we have a waterfront, because if people actually visited this area, they would be appalled at what they encountered.

After passing the mounds of coal beside the campus power-plant, I had to walk through the parking lot adjacent to the physical plant's paint shop. Outside the paint shop lies a disgusting pile of old paint buckets, wooden pallets, and road signs.

To get to the small hill that leads to the riverbank, I had to edge my way through old picnic tables and benches lying at the far end of the parking lot where the school's busses are parked. Climbing down the hill, I had to pick my way through piles of brick and concrete blocks that had been dumped over the side. Once on the edge of the river, I had to watch where I was walking to avoid stepping on the rusty bits of metal, glass, and assorted garbage that covered the ground.

The area behind the paint shop would be a prime spot for alternative social space—does anyone still remember those TIP proposals for alternative social space? This location could be ideal as an open area with picnic tables and barbecue pits. There could also be a space from which to launch canoes or innertubes.

Granted, in these tough economic times, the University may not have the funds to convert this space into a picnic grove. There is no excuse, however, for allowing this tract of land to become an all-purpose dump. At the very least, the physical plant should stop adding to the garbage that already exists behind its paint shop; the University should begin the process of cleaning the riverbank so that the we can walk along the river without having to worry about where we step.

Top: To get to the riverbank, one must first walk through the parking lot/open dump next to the physical plant paint shop. Middle: The riverbank itself has become a dumping ground for everything from an old oil drum to an old car seat. Bottom right: Getting to the riverbank itself requires careful manuvering through the mass of old metal pipes, bricks and concrete blocks scattered over the terrain. Bottom left: The riverbank could be a place to enjoy the beauty of the Susquehanna river, yet garbage like this concrete pillar mar the view.

Japanese TAs receive a taste of Bucknell life

BY ROBIN STUTMAN

How important is it for you to master your foreign language? Atsuko Adachi and Hiromi Kamishohara, the two Japanese teaching assistants this year, took at least eight years of English before traveling across the Pacific to Bucknell to become more fluent. Kamishohara even had to temporarily leave her husband, who is working in Tokyo to become completely bilingual.

In Japan, most women from the countryside Adachi and Kamishohara's age (27 and 28) are married. Aside from playing the important role of keeping house, the women actively participate in ikebana, or flower arranging, and cha-no-yu, the traditional Japanese tea ceremony. Adachi and Kamishohara, coming from the countryside, consider themselves lucky to be able to improve their Japanese teaching skills by traveling abroad, even if the trip does involve a major culture adaptation.

Elizabeth Danneberg—The Bucknellian

Atsuko Adachi and Hiromi Kamihoharo enjoy their stay in America as they are driven by their quest for fluency in the English language.

Both women attended four-year colleges in Japan. The TAs find university life in America quite different from their own experiences, however. When comparing Bucknell students to typical college students in Japan, Kamishohara believes that "Japanese do not study hard because the professors do not encourage their students." In addition, she thinks that the educational environment and the library system are much better here at Bucknell. Adachi agrees and adds that since the size of a class in Japan is so large, there is "no access to the professor."

The collegiate social life is completely different because there are no accomodations for living on campus. Everyone must commute from home to school by train and/or bus, which sometimes takes up to one or two hours. Most students live with their families until they are married. There are no evening classes, no Greek life, and no parties on campus. However, a system similar to the American Greek's does exist. According to Kamishohara, "We have the same kinds of clubs, but each has a specific purpose, such as skiing or tennis." These sports and related clubs serve as social organizations as well as athletic and academic associations.

Neither TA finds the Bucknell environment to be as friendly as expected. Kamishohara explains, "Bucknell students are friendly on the surface, but hard to get to know." The TAs have made a few attempts to mix with Bucknell students and have attended some fraternity parties out of pure curiosity. They did not like them. Adachi stated, "We were simply curious. We did not go to make friends, but to see what American parties are like." So, Adachi and Kamishohara turn to studying on the weekends and find this "boring."

The language barrier is yet another obstacle with which the TAs must deal. Both are currently enrolled in a Linguistics class with other Bucknell students, and find the lectures often difficult to understand. In addition, it is hard to join in a conversation because students speak so fast. Without knowing slang, it is extremely hard to converse and develop close relationships on campus. Kamishohara believes, "People need to be relaxed before they can develop a friendship—we are always speaking the formal language so it is hard to make a good friendship." The TAs have found friendships outside their classes but not as many as expected.

Like many Japanese their age, Adachi and Kamishohara are eager to master the English language. They frequently meet with other foreign students and speak in English, since that is the only common language known. Even when the two are alone, Adachi and Kamishohara are constantly practicing their English speaking skills. Although Japanese students do study at least eight years of English prior to college, there is little practice for conversational skills. Thus, the visiting Japanese are eager to use their knowledge of the language. Kamishohara thinks that, in general, Americans would be treated in a friendly fashion if they visited Japan because "Japanese are more interested in English-speaking students and wish to practice their skills."

So, for free room and board, a one-way air ticket from Japan, and $2100, Atsuko Adachi and Hiromi Kamishohara decided to become teaching assistants for Bucknell, brave the cultural adaptations, and leave families far behind. They applied through a Tokyo organization which placed them here. After this year, Kamishohara will be rejoining her husband in Tokyo, while Adachi will be returning to Japan and then later back to the US to attend New York University, continuing her study of English.

And now, as promised sometime in the distant past, this week's column will be devoted to what Winston Churchill once called "a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma": Japan. Actually, Churchill was referring to Soviet foreign policy, but, you know, it sounds good, so... Well, anyway, I think you know what I'm trying to say, here.

But why this conciliatory focus on Japan, especially at a time in America when Japan bashing seems en vogue? Because the Japanese are our friends, dad rat it! After all, they're just like us— their stock market crashes just like it does on Wall Street, and they have recessions and a shortage of really good minor league baseball stadiums to boot! Sure, they may have everything over us when it comes to electronics and automobile manufacturing, but that's our fault.

Some Americans will have you believe that the Japanese are to blame for our current economic malaise. Hardly. We may not be a lazy people, but we've certainly gotten mighty complacent in recent years after climbing to the top of the industrialized world. A leader is only going to hold onto the pole position for so long if it's standing still.

Other people complain that the Japanese aren't masters at conducting foreign relations, but so what? They gave us Godzilla, for heaven's sake. And if that isn't enough, when their corporate heads see economic troubles coming, they fight with each other to see who can take the biggest base pay cut to make up for their mistakes. Now that's something to model after here in the States.

Besides, it's obvious that they like us, too. Heck, the Japanese are suckers for American popular culture, although political scientists have not yet deduced the reason why. You know how much a pair of Levi's blue jeans can go for in downtown Osaka? $200. If broken in by an American? Upwards of $300. I kid you not.

And Batman! They love him!

Suffice it to say, understanding is the key in such situations as this. In this vein, then, we present to you a Japanese language primer for clueless Americans:

Phrase/Translation

Hai = Yes

Iie = No

Ohayoo Gozaimasu = Hello

Sayonara = Goodbye

Konnichi wa = Good afternoon

O-genki desu ka = How are you?

Doomo arigatoo gozaimasu. = Thank you very much.

Ganbatte kudasai = Good luck

Boku no namae wa Razamatazz Wilson desu. = My name is Razamatazz Wilson.

Gaijin = Foreigner

Yakuza = Japanese mafia

Onna no hito wa doko desu ka? = Where are the women?

Boku wa ookina hito da kala! = I'm a big man, so watch it!

Anata wa kileidato omoimasu! = I think you're pretty, babe!

Boku wa otoko, anata wa onna desu yo. Demo, kore wa... ii desu! = I am man, you are woman. But that's... okay!

Konnichi wa, chikushoo! = Darn it, good afternoon!

Anata no me wa Havana skyline nite masu. = Your eyes remind me of a lit-up Havana skyline.

Smells-san, double ya nanimo kono putt o miss oshimasu! = Hey smells, double or nothing you miss that putt!

At this juncture, it would seem to be the politically correct thing to give a bunch of freebee French, Spanish, and German common phrases, since the French, Spanish and the Germans, like the Japanese, still have not come up with a decent cultural equivalent for Spiderman:

Votre mousse au chocolat est tombé sur mon nouveau pantalon, stupide! = Your chocolate mousse fell on my new pants, you loss!

Pourquoi est-ce que nous avons dormi dans ce prison jusqu'à dix heures ce matin? = Why did we sleep in this jail until ten o'clock in the morning?

Hagar, vous vivez une vie pleine d'aventure; cependant, vous avez trop bu hier soir. = You lead a very adventurous life, Hagar; however, you had far too much to drink last night.

Niños, atencion! Hace tiempo a limpiar la vaca! = Attention, children! It is time to soap up the cow!

No busques el Wildebeast, o lo repentinás. = Do not seek out the Wildebeast, or else you'll be asking for it.

Señor Hidalgo, no pises la yerba! = Father Hidalgo, stay off the grass!

Dicen que es imposible alquilar boletos para los Redskins en este pueblo, a menos de que sea durante el Calgary Stampede. = They say it's impossible to get Redskins tickets in this town, except during the Calgary Stampede.

¡Cuidado! ¡Camas misteriosas! = Look out! Mysterious beds!

Stellt das radio leiser, oder ich werde das rote hemd anziehen. = Turn down the radio, or else I'll put on the red shirt.

Wie schmekt heute den salami salat, Oleg? = How is the salami salad today, Oleg?

Du kannst Clint Eastwood nicht? Wozu eigentlich bist du? = You don't know Clint Eastwood? What good are you?

Now, let's sum up. The Japanese: Our good neighbors. Second languages: Can be fun, if your professor is sick in the head and doesn't grade on content as much as on how you say it. And finally, the Wildebeast: Don't mess with him.

I think I can feel the members of the world community becoming more in harmony already.

The pros & cons of each residence hall

Should you choose a single in Hunt, Swartz, Kress, or Trax? Or a Gateway or a Mod?

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What room will you choose with your lucky or not-so-lucky lottery draw? Due to the changes in the Greek system, room selection is more confusing than ever. Juniors will be especially plagued with housing dilemas.

Who can live where?

Hunt Hall, typically a sophomore women's residence hall, will exclusively house junior and senior women come this fall, due to Panhellenic rules essentially stating that rushees may not make contact with sorority sisters outside of the rush parties. Living together on the same hall would pose a problem.

Because of this, junior women, if the motion is passed by BSG, will be allowed to block-book only in Hunt Hall. If this does not fill the rooms, then junior sorority sisters and those junior women with the worst lottery draws will be called upon to live there.

According to Assistant Dean for Housing, Gerald Commerford, this means that singles in Swartz, Kress, and Trax Halls, normally chosen by junior women, will now be more readily available to female sophomores. This "trickle-down" housing theory will also apply to male sophomores.

Gateways should still be senior lottery draws and Mods, juniors and sophomores picks. Roberts will basically remain a junior and senior lottery pick.

Advantages and disadvantages of each residence hall

Gateways: Kalman-Poshner, Malesardi, Roser, Silbermann, and Vidinghoff Halls

All Gateways have four single bedrooms, a kitchen/living room, a bathroom, air-conditioning, and cable. Kalman-Posner houses the Gateway laundry room, however, and Roser is equipped with a computer room. Malesardi is closest to the parking lot, for those of you who are lazier than others, and Kalman-Posner and Silbermann are next to the Sunflower Childcare Center where children are dropped off to play and scream in the early a.m.

Two-hundred fifty-two students will get to live in Gateways. They will cost $2485 to live in during the 1992-93 school year.

File Photo—The Bucknellian

Will anymore of the much sought-after Gateways ever be built?

Bucknell West or "the Mods"

No, they won't blow over. According to Commerford, "They are very stable." They were first built in 1972. The newest ones, #'s 1-8, 17, 18, 27 and 35 all have air-conditioning. There are 35 mods and all have two double bedrooms, a bath, and a kitchen/living room. Located along with them, across the highway from campus, are laundry and computer facilities. Some might consider the mods far from campus, especially on a rainy or snowy day when it's tempting not to make the hike to campus. For the most part though, students like the extra freedom that being across Route 15 provides and being so close to the practice fields. Barbecues in their big "backyards" are therefore common when the weather turns warm.

Non-air-conditioned mods cost $2300 a year and the ones with air-conditioning cost $2365.

Singles in Hunt, Kress, Trax, and Swartz

All of these singles are similar in size, with Kress and Trax being the largest. Hunt singles are the smallest, though they possess more unique characteristics, such as dormer windows. Swartz singles are equipped with two desks and closets, both which are immobile. Kress and Trax also possess "armoire-type" closets, while Hunt has deep, in-the-wall type closets. Swartz has air-conditioning, the other three dorms do not. Kress and Trax both also possess heating problems. One side of the building is usually rather cold, while the other side is such a sauna that windows have to be opened in the middle of winter to stay cool. As Kelly Shepard '93 of Kress says, "They're trying to create a tropical rain forest up here." In both dorms, it is the side facing onto the quad that is the overheated one. Water problems are also a problem in these two older dorms, with spurts of scalding hot and freezing cold water not being uncommon. Trax is on the University's priority list to be renovated this summer.

Swartz residents have also experienced water problems this year. They often lack hot water – so don't live there if you dislike cold showers. All of these dorms have television rooms, and cooking and laundry facilities, but Swartz is the only one with computers.

Singles in Hunt, Kress, and Trax cost $2300 next year. Because of the air-conditioning, Swartz singles cost a little more.

Doubles in Roberts and Swartz –there is a difference

Lofts are a common sight in Swartz doubles. It's the only way to really have any "living" space. In Roberts, most of the doubles are two room doubles. Some even come with their own bathroom. Swartz once again comes with a computer lab, as well as cooking, television, and laundry facilities. Roberts has the latter three, but no computer rooms. It does house the Writing Center, Multicultural Center, and the Women's Resource Center though. It is also the oldest building on campus, originally serving as the main academic building. That's why it's called "Old Main." Lastly, Swartz has air-conditioning, Roberts does not.

Swartz doubles cost $2230 and Roberts doubles cost $2170 a year.

Coed halls?

Swartz has them; Roberts, Kress, and Trax do not. Men and women can not share Gateways or Mods.

Now all you have to do is come to a consensus among your friends about where to live!

Recycling becomes a way of life at BU

Separate and bundle are the key words behind saving your own corner of the earth according to Bucknell's recycling coordinators

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Within a relatively short period of time, recycling has become as common as any other daily routine in our lives. In fact, it's difficult to believe that even as recently as a few years ago, such items as bottles and aluminum cans were thrown in the trash and subsequently, taken to landfills, never to be used again. Although we still, in the Bucknell community, only recycle approximately 25% of what is possible to recycle, the figure keeps growing each year as we gradually become aware of the finiteness of the earth's resources. Facts and figures about recycling may be thrown in your face repeatedly every day, but what you may really be wondering is: are my painstaking efforts to recycle really worth it? And where does it all go anyway?

So to answer these questions, Penny Puskarich '92 and Karen Laffler '93, who are presently the coordinators of Bucknell's recycling program, took the time to explain the whole process. They work under the supervision of George Trutt, who is the ground supervisor for the Physical Plant, in order to reduce the area's waste by implementing this campus-wide recycling program. The program was begun in the Spring of 1990, and has been amazingly successful since, with the help of the Bucknell community.

As most Bucknellians have figured out so far, the recycling begins with you. It is up to you, as the consumer, to rinse the recyclable item out, and place it in the appropriately labeled box or pail. If items other than those which are supposed to be in the individual bin are mixed in with the recyclables, then the bin will not be recycled. The custodians who collect these individual bins to place outside are not obliged to sort the recyclables, so it is important that everyone be aware of what they are placing into the bins.

Once all of the bins have been bundled and placed into the large recycling sheds outside, full-time recycling man Bob Kahler (from the Physical Plant) goes into action. It is up to Kahler to collect all the items from these sheds, do a quick sorting, and deliver them to the recycling center on campus in gaylords (refrigerator-size cardboard boxes) on a truck.

And the process does not stop there, of course. Approximately every two weeks the recyclables are brought to various recycling markets in the area—depending on which materials the markets recycle. The items are primarily sent to either Williamsport, Lewistown, or Muncy, while newspapers are brought to Mazeppa, PA.

Subdivisions within each type of recyclable material exist, necessitating the items to be further separated by either color, as in the case of glass (only clear, amber, and green may be recycled), or types of plastic—for there are eight different plastics and only soft drink and detergent containers may be recycled.

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Robert "Stu" Faux '95 does his part in the recycling process as he dutifully takes his hall's newspapers out to the bin.

In the case of newsprint, only newspapers and catalogues may be recycled, never magazines or glossy advertisements. One thing that you may not realize is that in addition to aluminum, glass, plastic, newsprint, and paper, cardboard may be recycled as well. These may be package boxes, paperboard, cereal boxes, and brown paper bags. Pizza boxes and packaging material is not accepted, and staples and tape should be removed from the dry, flat cardboard.

Of course with all recyclables, it is necessary that you prepare them. Aluminum, glass, and plastic must be rinsed, and all lids and rings should be removed. Newspapers should be bundled in string or brown paper bags. Keeping the items compact and organized will not only make it easier for you to carry them out to a bin, but will help make the whole recycling process run smoothly.

So, again: why should we do all this? Well, if saving the earth is not reason enough for you, then maybe this will be. Those who live off campus all know that there is a $600 fine for not recycling properly. In addition, the Lycoming landfill does spot checks on the trash around campus. If they find recyclables or hazardous wastes in the trash, the University is heavily fined and the landfill will not accept trash. Puskarich explains, "It affects everyone because if we get fined, that's where our tuition money goes. So it is key to begin right there at the source."

Although the University sells recyclables for money, due to the extensive cost of labor in collecting the materials, the transaction does not sustain itself. The real profit is made from the savings in landfill space. Saving $42 per ton may not sound like much, but, considering the fact that we recycled 147.8 tons of material last year alone, it definitely adds up. Yet this is only about 9% of the total trash which was created last year.

"Our goal is to save on landfills and to try to find a better place for it," says Puskarich. She and Laffler are now in the process of going over recycling evaluations which were developed by Laffler, who will be working as recycling coordinator alone next semester. The surveys were designed so as to evoke a reaction from the Bucknell community on the recycling. Laffler says, "We hope to implement a lot of the suggestions that we have. Anyone who has questions may call me at home or at the physical plant (523-1911)." In addition to these surveys, Laffler has also been working on a recycling brochure which will include a comprehensive list of what can be recycled. Until then, keep your eyes peeled for recycling bins, because the whole process begins with you!

Expand your awareness

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

How many ways are there on and off campus to hug a tree? Well, o.k., maybe not hug a tree. How many ways are there on and off campus to become environmentally correct? The answer is many. Because reducing, reusing, and recycling is not the only environmental concern, several organizations have devised activities to expand environmental awareness into equally important territory.

Otcinachson, the local chapter of the Sierra Club, is an area organization that deals mainly with conservation issues. The group is locally involved in conserving the wetlands, saving the Chesapeake Bay from Susquehana River pollution, and preventing the installation of the proposed incinerator. As a group, the Sierra Club is primarily concerned with the legislative aspect of environmental problems. One accomplishment of the club was the legislative prevention of a contractor from filling the wetland area of Shamokin Dam a few years ago. Students are welcome to the monthly executive meetings to discuss current legislation and issues of environmental concern. For more information, contact Dave Hafer at 523-3107.

The Williamsport Department of Environmental Resources offers classes about air and water quality control, waste management, and community environmental control. The classes are free and open to the public. For more information, contact their offices at 327-3636.

Students for Environmental Action Coalition (SEAC) is a campus-wide version of the national organization that stresses environmental awareness through various activities. This year, SEAC sponsored Earth Week, a week in November dedicated to environmental concerns ranging from energy conservation to recycling. The group handed out flowers with environmental messages attached to them at Homecoming last semester. SEAC also organized a showing of The Lorax in the Bison. In order to increase awareness in the younger generation, SEAC is currently planning to visit several local elementary schools. SEAC holds weekly meetings every Monday night from 8:30 p.m. to 9:30 p.m. in room 302 in the Langone Center. For more information about becoming a member or participating in the group's activities, call Dannielle Lucas at x-5455.

The Outing Club is a campus organization that promotes environmental awareness through nature hikes and camping trips. The group participates in several outdoor activities, including caving and white water rafting. The Outing Club also rents camping gear, skiing equipment, and various other outdoor paraphernalia to any interested student. In order to receive more information about The Outing Club, call Raven Lyons at x-5507.

So, no matter what your environmental forte, be it active or passive, Bucknell and the Lewisburg area boast several environmentally correct organizations that are sure to appease any tree-hugging desires.

Dreams came true for this BU senior

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In honor of Earth Day, it seemed only appropriate for the spotlight to turn on the "recycling queen" herself, Penny Puskarich '92, who initiated the recycling program at Bucknell. Puskarich has been an integral force behind the operation since her freshman year, when she helped to draft a proposal to President Sojka stating why Bucknell needed such a program. Since then, not only has a great amount of landfill space been spared, but the recycling project is a definite reminder to the Bucknell community that we must all work together to salvage the earth's resources.

For Puskarch, it all began in 1988, when a drought in her home area (Washington, PA) helped her to recognize the sudden impact of global warming. Struck by this environmental crisis, she decided to read all available material about the ozone problem and realized, "that something had to be done," she says.

When she came to Bucknell, Puskarich decided to join the environmental residential college to increase her own awareness of the earth's problems. In her first year she also joined Earth Action, formerly known as the "hippie skipees," she says, which was made up of political activists and biologists who sold homemade granola as a primary fundraiser. In this crowd Puskarich met two women, Linda Kramme, then a senior, and Michelle Ramond, also a senior, who inspired her to help draft the proposal.

Elizabeth Danneberg—The Bucknellian

At the same time, Puskarich had it in her head to make Earth Action a more productive organization. This meant running for President (facilitator) of Earth Action at the end of her freshman year—a win which came easy for Puskarich. Presidential duties were not enough to satisfy her, however, as she decided to pursue the recycling program idea even further. After months of lobbying for the cause, Puskarich's real dream came true: she was given permission to coordinate Bucknell's recycling program, under the supervision of George Trutt, ground supervisor for the Physical Plant. This meant that after extensive research, Puskarich would be able to initiate something which had never been done before.

"It's not that I came to Bucknell as this recycling dynamo. It just seemed like the opportunity was there, and I took it. Everyone was so cooperative that it just fell into place. All along I've had a very supportive community," Puskarich explains with a gleam in her eye.

In addition to her presidential and recycling coordinator duties, Puskarich was a junior fellow of the environmental residential college during her sophomore and junior years. As a junior fellow she was able to coordinate extracurricular activities centered around environmental awareness for first-year students.

"Living deliberately and consciously—that is the key to being truthful," says Puskarich on her philosophy in life. She further explains, "Making tradeoffs is essential to living environmentally. For example, I'll turn off the lights to listen to the radio. People must make themselves aware of the ramifications of their actions."

Puskarich's efforts have not gone unrecognized. The Bucknellian chose her to be Person of the Year in May of 1991, and before that she received the Bucknell Volunteer Award for the class of 1992. As well, she was selected by the awards committee for her outstanding work with the recycling program.

Residing in the mods as a residential assistant, Penny is dreaming up her future. So far she has plans to work on farms in New Zealand, which she arranged through a program. The program would necessitate her to travel from farm to farm, completing chores as she is needed, for six months. After that, she will return to the states in order to live in the West for a while and then attend graduate school.

Although Puskarich will unfortunately leave Bucknell come May, the legacy of her recycling program lives on through the whole of the Bucknell community.

Earth Day is a valued tradition

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Earth Day began in April 1970 as a day to celebrate the planet Earth and all of her wondrous gifts. People were thankful to have the good fortune of such a habitable, lush place to exist upon, and they wanted to show their appreciation with a huge gala.

However, Earth Day 1990, the twentieth anniversary of the initial celebration was quite different. People across the globe were again coming together in support of their planet, but this time it was an effort to try to save the planet from the ills of humankind. Ocean dumping, chlorofluorocarbons in the atmosphere, global warming—all of these problems and many more had become a serious issue for society, and it was necessary to alert people to just how important these issues were to daily life.

Chinese Premier Li Peng summed it up appropriately in his speech on April 21, 1990, by saying, "The first Earth Day was observed on April 22, 1970, and symbolized the first large-scale environmental protection movement launched by the broad masses in the history of mankind. That movement has effectively propelled the vigorous development of environmental protection throughout the world, and we need worldwide cooperation to clear up the obstacles on the way to solving the problem in a concerted effort."

Bucknell's Earth Day celebration was first held in April of 1989. The planning was undertaken by the Umbrella Organization and, in 1991, the Earth Day Planning Committee was founded. "I think that Earth Day at Bucknell started out as more of an event for the really radical environmentalists than for the more mainstream students on campus," remarked Wendy Shaver '92, a member of the planning committee for her second year. She adds, "But now because our group is in contact with so many organizations like the concert and lecture committees, student groups who run booths on Earth Day, etc., it has become a campus-wide event."

The above logo was designed by Jacqueline Hockett '95 of the Earth Day Planning Committee to promote this year's events.

"I think that what we're doing is really cool, especially because it gets a lot of people involved in both Earth Day as well as Earth Week," noted Earth Day Planning Committee member, Erika Yencha '95. Students who are not members of the planning committee also expressed an interest in the event, such as Steve Welkley '92, who said, "It's great that so many people are working to achieve a solution for our environmental problems...it's something positive that we can all do to improve the environment."

Proceeds from this year's Earth Day will go towards preservation of the Merrill W. Linn Land Waterways in Lewisburg, So far, funds have been raised through the selling of colorful Earth Day 1992 tee shirts in the LC. Money will also be raised at the booths on Swartz Field. Various campus organizations will sell items or services to benefit the cause.

Bucknell gave up too soon on Jan Plan

During last weekend's open house for accepted students and their families, the administration tried mightily to display all of Bucknell's positive features, the better to convince these high school seniors to attend the University. In a meeting with parents President Sojka spoke in glowing terms about the January Program. Student tour guides were also told to mention the Jan Plan as a unique experience.

Those incoming freshmen will be shocked to know that their new University has pulled a fast one on them. They were never told that the Board of Trustees had "serious concerns" about the program's academic rigor, or that the faculty was scheduled to vote on the Jan Plan's future only two days later, a vote which expressed resounding support for the program's demise.

At a time when colleges are jostling to compete for a shrinking number of college-age students, every school is looking for an edge. Bucknell, however, has chosen to make itself less unique, and the elimination of the January Program will serve to drop us further back into the pack. The University is killing a program with broad student support in a decision made with only minimal student input, an odd way to attract brilliant new students.

The reasons for keeping the Jan Plan are many and, by now, well known, for they have appeared in this space before. January has traditionally been a time for research, internships, travel, or picking up new skills. It is a time to round out a Bucknell education in ways not available within the in-session classroom setting. Neither the faculty nor the trustees have denied that these are worthy goals, or that the program serves many students very well.

There are serious problems with the present January Program, principly with the level of participation. However, many solutions have also been proposed: courses for academic credit could be added, participation could be mandatory some or all years, the program could be shifted to the end of the spring semester. Professor Roger Tarpy, the January Program director, spent much time developing proposals for change. The most notable would create a Colloquy-type program for all freshman, in which they would explore one topic in an interdisciplinary manner with films, lectures, and study in a number of different fields; this plan would also dovetail nicely with the Foundations for the Future proposals, which call for broader approaches to learning. However, it seems that these proposals were given little, if any, consideration by the faculty.

Everyone agrees that the Jan Plan's goals are still noble and that the program benefits many students. It seems that the faculty who voted to kill the program have failed these students; they are letting a valuable part of their students' education slip away because they don't feel like expending the effort needed to save it. Similar programs can and do work at other campuses such as Bates, Middlebury, and the University of Delaware, and the program is worth saving at Bucknell.

For some students, the January Program was a large reason why they chose to come to Bucknell, and it has proven to be a valuable learning experience for them. Next year's freshmen will instead learn the lessons of old: that the faculty isn't necessarily concerned about what students want, and that student input isn't really valued, and that it's OK to deceive.

University still condones discrimination

To the Editor:

I cannot keep myself silent anymore. I must speak out again concerning R.O.T.C.'s discrimination against and legitimation of violence towards women and gay, lesbian, and bisexual peoples. I am also outraged at the fact that the University knowingly allows such practices to continue without the slightest concern.

By allowing the R.O.T.C. to continue to exist on this campus, the administration fails in in its responsibility to protect the rights and dignity of all people at this institution.

While some people might still wish to intellectualize about how offensive R.O.T.C. really is, I feel no need to carry on this debate. The University itself has already resolved this debate. For those who are not aware, the University this year has added a disclaimer to all of their literature which mentions R.O.T.C.. It reads as follows:

"Bucknell University regards certain policies and practices of the the Department of Defense and the Reserve Officers Training Corps as discrimination against women and homosexuals, and consider these policies to contradict Bucknell's nondiscrimination policy."

While I applaud the University for finally realizing the discrimination of R.O.T.C., I cannot agree that such a disclaimer is an acceptable response to this organization. As long as this University does nothing to end the discrimination and violence of R.O.T.C., it remains an equal participant in this offense.

By allowing R.O.T.C. to continue to exist on this campus, the administration fails in its responsibility to protect the rights and dignity of all people at this institution. How can any African-American person feel protected knowing that there would be nothing to stop an organization such as the KKK from forming a campus chapter regardless of their racial violence and discrimination? By providing R.O.T.C. with space and recognition, this University legitimates the discrimination which R.O.T.C. embodies. In so doing, this University gives us no proof that they will defend the rights of any group or individual, especially when there is money involved. For all intents and purposes, this University has sold its soul to injustice, and has become its partner.

I believe that this University should and will be held morally, if not legally accountable for its actions, just as Tufts is at present. There the students have filed a law suit holding Tufts accountable to their nondiscrimination clause. How can this University justify such a contradiction in policy and practice? I call on the administration to provide a written statement to the campus to explain how they plan to deal with this contradiction. A disclaimer in the catalogue simply will not suffice! Either phase out R.O.T.C. if it is unwilling to change, or admit to your participation in its injustice.

Now I also do not want to get into an argument about students who rely on R.O.T.C. scholarships. It should be

Professor explains spiritual significance of statue

To the Editor:

On Tuesday February 25th a dedication ceremony was held to honor Frederick Franck and his sculpture, "Seven Generations," which had been recently installed on the campus of Bucknell University. Early Saturday morning, February 29th, it was discovered that sections of the sculpture had been stolen along with the identifying label. Recently another piece of the statue was stolen, after the other sections were returned. This label explained that this work of art was inspired by the political wisdom of the Iroquois people, or as they call themselves, the Haudenosaunee or "People of the Long House". These First Peoples of this continent held to a principle of governance in which all decisions were subjected to the question of their impact on the seventh generation. By "seventh generation" the Iroquois included both humans, plants, and animals. Frederick Franck chose this principle to identify his sculpture because of the inherent wisdom and concern that these Native Peoples demonstrated for all life through a duration of time which is too frequently denied in contemporary American thought.

These First Peoples of this continent held to a principle of governance in which all decisions were subjected to the question of their impact on the seventh generation.

The theft on the Bucknell University campus of the final sections of this sculpture is especially disturbing because this work of art was a permanent testimony by Frederick Franck and by Bucknell to honor Native American peoples. That such an act of vandalism should occur during the two-year program on campus called "The Columbian Quincentennial: A Critical Investigation" demonstrates a continuation by some Americans of a disregard for Native American peoples. The theft is a shameful act of thoughtlessness which continues centuries of callous indifference for indigenous peoples. What can the perpetrators be thinking!...that this theft is a political statement?, or simply a playful prank?, or a misdirected act of some inebriated person? Those who have stolen this sign of Bucknell's openness to the indigenous peoples of this continent have deprived us all of a meditation on ourselves. They have left us all ripped out of the earth again for personal gain, for self gratification. I, along with the majority of this campus community, I believe, ask for the return of the stolen sections.

Writer objects to story changes

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to some of the choices made by the editorial staff concerning an article I submitted for publication in last week's Bucknellian.

Upon publication the article, "First female chaplain named," began "Once on the stage and now on the pulpit, Rev. Alison Boden joins Bucknell . . ." A lead serves to establish the focus and tone of a news article. What focus and what tone is set by this glib lead? In my opinion, "Once on the stage and now on the pulpit," serves to give the impression that somehow Boden's career change is one that was made easily or without much thought although she stated that this life choice involved a reassessment of what to her was "fundamentally important." Most importantly, the lead diverts attention away from Boden's work as a minister and from what she and others see her future role at Bucknell to be.

Unfortunately, this demeaning attitude and slanted focus is borne out in other editorial choices. In a window placed prominently in the middle of the prose, Rev. Boden's professional qualifications are listed under the heading "personal." This heading in a very subtle way serves to take some of the merit away from the accomplishments listed underneath. A subtitle announces, "Honors graduate from Vassar to bring 'youth and energy.'" Again, the tone is rather glib and the focus is taken away from Rev. Boden's future role as Bucknell's chaplain. Think how a more fitting subtitle such as "New chaplain interested in joint-programming with student groups" would have altered the tone and focus.

Although I realize that my original draft of the article was turned in rather late (this lateness was partially due to a phone interview with Rev. Boden Thursday night), I am annoyed also at what I see to be a sense of carelessness about the article that seems to indicate a lack of respect. There were two typographical errors, one which referred to William Becker, chair and professor of religion, as "she" and one which added to an editorial preoccupation with Rev. Boden's identity as a woman by repeating the phrase "to be the first woman." Also, what to me was one of the most noteworthy facts, Rev. Boden's formal presentation to the university, on Sunday May 10, was ommited accidentally.

I realize that the issues I have brought up may be considered by some to be very subtle, but language is powerful and sub-text can override the overt message of an article. I would ask the editorial staff to be a little more thoughtful in the future about the effect their choices have on The Bucknellian's readers. Make editorial choices that allow staff writers to be proud to claim their articles as their own.

Dearth Day

Let me say a few unkind words about Earth Day. Earth Day is a potpourri of trendy anxiety for the apathetic. Earth Day is a smarmy celebration with a marked dearth of intelligence. A mediocre musician, Sting, is perennially billed as our planet's savior. What better way to remove from your shoulders the burden of thinking? Maybe if we all sing and yabber loud enough, our hot air will lift all the pollution out into space.

Some might say, "Doesn't Earth Day bring up important issues? Doesn't it raise consciousness and initiate dialogue?" No, it doesn't. Earth Day is an orgasm of ignorance. Humorist P.J. O'Rourke wryly observes: "The college idealists who fill the ranks of the environmental movement seem willing to do absolutely anything to save the biosphere, except take science courses and learn something about it."

As far as "raising consciousness" goes, Earth Day actually lowers it. Earth Day is a party for intellectual lemmings, most of whom want to shut down the factories and throw themselves off the high plateau of Western civilization (and I, for one, would be happy to see them fall). Earth Day renders trivial some very complicated and hotly contested scientific issues (e.g., ozone depletion and the greenhouse effect). As a celebration of fiction and bad science, it gives the impression that the planet's problems are easy to solve, and pretends that the "solutions" are just, correct, and supported by a burden of scientific proof (they are not).

As a celebration of fiction and bad science, it gives the impression that the planet's problems are easy to solve, and pretends that the "solutions" are just, correct, and supported by a burden of scientific proof (they are not).

Does Earth Day "raise dialogue?" No (well, partly). It does raise monologue: a mindless, polluting torrent of nonsense about "big business," "nuclear fission," and "industry." Ironically, the same students who eschew business are often the same students whose tuitions are paid through the generosity of IBM, GM, et cetera. And the same students who eschew nuclear power are usually the same students who run the hair dryer for half an hour every day.

Earth Day has a long and venerable tradition of being wrong. Consider Earth Day #1, 1970. On that day, the environment took a backseat to overpopulation. Doom and Gloom were the order of the day. Dr. Paul Ehrlich, author of The Population Bomb, warned that by 1974, America would have to ration water; food rationing would be necessary by 1980. He predicted that, because of over population, diseases such hepatitis and dysentery would rise by 500 percent by 1980.

Finally, in a triumph of conscience over intelligence, he predicted that by 1979, the oceans could be as dead as Lake Erie. Dr. Ehrlich's record is zero-for-four, and he has a better track record than most of Earth Day's prophets.

At Earth Day, you can't swing a cat without hitting one of the tie-dyed dimbulbs preaching some anti-technology sermon. Gathering together, they form an ugly granola-cluster, which quickly takes on the character of a witch-hunt or a lynch mob. How long, one imagines, until the slavering mob, armed with copies of "Fifty Simple Things You Can Do To Save The Earth," undulates outward, ready to burn down the incinerator (note to the dippies: you can't burn down an incinerator; it isn't flammable).

If we want to live in unpolluted, pristine pastures, big business and industry will be more than willing to sell them to

The cost of defense

BY KATIE SMITH

The costs and benefits of military spending can be approached in two ways, short term and long term. It seems very obvious that those who bear the brunt of the sixty, or so, percent of the budget that goes to military spending (directly or indirectly), are the disempowered, the voiceless. The poor and disenfranchised people, animals, and the environment are the first to feel the opportunity cost of "defense" spending. However, when one sees past the next decade or so, looking towards the seventh generation (to bring in our most recent campus art piece), we see that all members of the global village will be effected by the percentage of available funding that goes to the military.

Once again this can be analyzed from two orientations, one is the opportunity cost of military spending; the money that is tied up in military spending that is unable to be used in other areas. Poor people lose directly, the defense money is inaccessible to them for aid in their day to day struggles for food, shelter, education and the "American" dream. In addition, as we spend more and more of our monetary resources directly and indirectly on military funding, we also take money away from research and development of other forms of conflict resolution.

I would propose that the military industrial complex is the reason for the continuation of high percentages of our budget going into defense in these times of "peace."

Another level upon which we can critique the allocation of funding of the military, is the attitudinal level. I'm speaking here about violence and the perpetuation of violence. Through increased funding towards the use of violence as an answer to our economic and political problems, we severely stifle the creative ability of the citizens of the United States. I'm speaking about the creativity involved in seeking out new ways to resolve conflict. The lack of government spending on research and development of non-violent means of conflict resolution reflects the governments conviction that might is right.

In the long term these other forms of conflict resolution, namely non-violent forms of arbitration, economic and political sanctions, etc., would most likely require less capitol investment. The decrease in the amount of money spent on defense issues that results from using creativity as a resource as opposed to more expensive resources such as uranium and petroleum, will result in the freeing up of funds for investment in infrastructure, education and health. So why don't we shift the allocation of funding? I would propose that the military industrial complex is the reason for the continuation of high percentages of our budget going into defense in these times of "peace." This is an institutionalized link between the government and the private sector, through which the private sector is contracted to do research and development by the government. . .or is the government contracted by the private sector to keep the profits high for military research and development. The lines are getting fuzzier and fuzzier as I write: who contracts who?

We all know the amounts of money that are required to run for any public office, and when large amounts of money are required its easier to look to large donors than to engage in a massive effort of solicitation of small donors (Thank you for an exception Jerry Brown). The wealthy individuals that donate bulk sums to capitol intensive campaigns, are the heads of the wealthy corporations, and these

Clinton's environmental record will be scrutinized

BY WILHELMINA DEHARDER

The 1992 Presidential Campaign turns to Pennsylvania with environmental issues on the minds of many voters in the Susquehanna Valley.

This may prove to put democratic forerunner Bill Clinton back in the political hotseat, at least where O.U.E. (Organization United for the Environment) Ban The Burner supporters are concerned.

The O.U.E. is trying to stop the building of the U.S.P.C.I. incinerator planned for Gregg Township and are looking for political leadership to further their cause. Although the O.U.E. suffered a setback with Phase One of the U.S.P.C.I. incinerator plan being passed in March, they are still fighting.

Just last weekend Fetters Meat, Seafood and Deli of Milton sponsored Spring Fling to generate donations for O.U.E. The two day event included food samples from local restaurants, carnival games, and live music from the Country Couple.

Governor Clinton's own state of Arkansas has an incinerator in Jacksonville which has caused an ongoing battle between the citizens and the state since 1986. Many O.U.E. members questioned Clinton's view that "incineration is safe" when any incineration plant carries the stipulation that no food products grown within 30 miles can be put to market.

Many members questioned Clinton's view that "incineration is safe"... (when) no food products grown within 30 miles can be put to market.

Clinton's statement ("I think it's important that our country elect a real environmental president") that he made to a League of Conservative Voters forum seems to be at odds with his actions.

In Clinton's state of Arkansas polluting industries get tax breaks. State income tax for individuals increased twice as fast as for corporations from 1985 to1987.

Clinton supported the Manufacturers Investment Sales and Use Tax Credit, called by critics "the I.P. bailout law," named after the International Paper Co. in Pine Bluff which it was created to help.

The tax credit cost the state $112 million by April 1990.

The International Paper Co. has been shown to be contaminating Arkansas rivers with dioxin at levels which presented a cancer risk to inhabitants.

Clinton has received contributions from I.P. including $3,000 from an I.P. Political Action Committee, $1,500 from Voluntary Contributions for Better Government and $1,500 from I.P. of Purchase, New York. Other P.A.C. contributors are Arkansas Oil Marketers, Waste Management, Arkansas Power and Light and Tyson Foods.

Ethyl Corp. of Arkansas is another company that has taken advantage of the tax credit. In addition, the company received a large increase in the amount of pollutants that the plant may emit, although the Columbia County residents where that company was located were steadfast against it.

Ethyl was found to be emitting 18 times the particulates its permits allowed.

Bill Clinton is not the only Clinton to have a questionable environmental record. Until recently, Hilary Clinton's law firm represented E.N.S.C.Q. Incineration Inc., the largest P.C.B. burner in the country.

E.N.S.C.O. is located in El Dorado, Arkansas where studies have shown an elevated amount of Lou Gehrig disease, known to be caused from exposure to P.C.B.'s.

Hilary Clinton presently sits on the board of directors of one of the largest waste hauling companies in the U. S., earning at least twenty thousand dollars a year to vote. As far as O.U.E. is concerned, Hilary would do better sitting at tea parties.

A little dash of communication, a sense of style

BY VINCE DECERCHIO

I attended parochial school for 12 years—a dubious distinction.

One benefit that remained with me as a result of my education was a strong foundation built on the subject of English. I was taught by a strong-willed, tough-minded American nun of Irish extraction who, in addition to requiring her class to memorize the words and music to the folk song "Oh, The Days of the Kerry Dancers," pressed her students to become highly proficient in English grammar. This was her obsession.

The prepositions are: "about, above, across, after, against, among, around (dear Lord, please don't let me miss one), at, before, besides, between, beyond, by, and so on and so forth."

We were drilled and grilled in nouns, verbs, usage, conjugation and vocabulary. We practiced diagramming sentences the way Brent Musburger outlines the arrival at the NCAA Final Four. There was always a wooden ruler on hand to correct an errant student who failed to appreciate the importance of the difference between an adjective and an adverb: "I happen to know, Sister, that I'm not going to need English when I grow up." I prided myself on my written communication skills, thanks to Sister Helen, which brings me to my story.

Although I have never been satisfied with the size of my vocabulary ("Don't use a word and you lose that word," Sister Helen would always say.), I believed I knew the English language sufficiently well to recognize all the words Noah Webster defined as American when he compiled his first dictionary 186 years ago. Poor Mr. Webster! If he were alive today, might he be as confused as I am with the "new" language?

Are new words created because there are not enough of the old ones with which to communicate? Or has language also become the victim of our trendy, all-style, no-substance society? You know it—The one where something which is too difficult to learn does not inspire greater application. We simply make it easier. I sometimes worry about today's engineering students who will build tomorrow's bridges. I hope their calculus wasn't too difficult the first time around.

In a business meeting the other day, one of my colleagues commented that although he did not understand exactly what one of the presidential candidates represented, he had a "sense" of what the candidate was all about. What is this nonsense, sense? Is this some clever way of saying he really doesn't know anything about the subject? I have a sense of how a pilot flies a Boeing 747, but this sense won't get me past the cockpit door.

Somewhere along the way, a psychologist slipped into English class and tried to change a precise science. I pray he or she doesn't take a course in aeronautical engineering.

Then, there's one of my partners in the car pool to work. She remarked the other day, on the way to work, that she did not agree with my heated assessment of how Ronald Reagan had handled the economy, but she certainly could "validate" my feelings. As I understand this word's meaning, from the context which it is so often used, when you validate a statement or feeling, you do not agree or disagree with it, you simply recognize its existence. We used to do this with a nod of the head.

Somewhere along the way, a psychologist slipped into English class and tried to change a precise science. I pray he or she doesn't take a course in aeronautical engineering.

Returning to my meeting of the other day, I listened while one of our public relations staff discussed a change in company policy. He said he was seeking some "commonality" in the group to arrive at a consensus. Does this mean he was searching for something we have in common? Why didn't he say so? He proposed that we "brainstorm" (there's a beauty) by throwing out some "sound bytes" to see if any appealed to the group. Is sound byte another term for words? It sounds like a request my dentist would make after having filled a large cavity. Our meeting lasted two hours. Our chairperson viewed her watch and said: "Let's bring some closure to this meeting." I proposed we end the meeting and go to lunch.

Now I'm a hip guy. My daughter won't let me use the term "rad." "Oh, Daddy! You can't say that—you're embarrassing me." I can adapt as well as the next fellow. Haven't I kept up with the fluctuating widths of ties, darn the cost, in order to keep Kmart solvent?

I decided I could speak this new language as well as anyone. The next day, at lunch, a colleague asked me if I had seen Oliver Stone's new movie, "JFK." I perked up. Yes, I had! "I think I have a sense of what Stone was trying to say in his movie. There seemed to be a commonality which coursed through his movie, reaching out to the viewers. I cannot validate all the feelings I experienced during the viewing. I felt his use of sound bytes in various scenes, however, elicited some strong reactions. Nevertheless, the movie was a bit long and near the end of the second hour, I longed for some closure to the story."

My lunchmate stopped chewing and placed his sandwich on the plate. He furrowed his brow and looked directly at me. "I know exactly what you mean," he said excitedly. "I felt the same way. JFK was awesome."

us. Saving the planet is a daunting project—further complicated by "caring types" who want to start in all the wrong places. The planet's problems (the real ones) will be fixed by hot-shot researchers, backed by large corporations, and funded by consumers like you and me. "Caring" is not enough. Without wisdom and intelligence, "caring" is simply the heart's victory over the brain. We need well-trained, well-funded scientists. But these people work for institutions the "eco-warriors" generally despise.

So folks, go out and enjoy Earth Day. Go on, hug the Earth (yes, Virginia, there is an Earth hug—at 3:00 p.m.). Eat your trail mix; curse big business. Convene your "Council of All Beings," and assert for yourself a constituency of trees, rabbits, and other beings; (If those constituents could talk, they'd probably ask you to shut up and leave them alone). Congratulate each other on how much you all care. I'm spending Earth Day preparing for a long career in business and government. I'm gonna sell you all a clean world—and I'm gonna make a load of dough in the process.

wealthy corporations are the ones that our government is contracting for defense spending. The rich perpetuate their position, in large part, through the government spending on the military.

I will end this by stating what is hopefully the obvious, I feel that the growing gap between rich and poor is unjust. To systematically marginalize groups of people (and the voiceless environment) will only cause the eventual degradation or destruction of the whole. Our capacity as a nation to look upon this marginalization as some sort of survival of the fittest/natural selection strategy, could easily be linked to the deterioration of moral standards that so many blame for the deterioration of the family. The results of our commitment to this institutionalized inequality can be correlated with military spending, either as directly required by military spending, or indirectly produced by military spending. Regardless of the specific relationship, there is a link between military spending and institutionalized oppression and it is a link that perpetuates an injustice that needs to be resolved. In Peace.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Administrator asks for return of stolen statue

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing to every student residence on campus to ask for your help. As you likely have noticed, another of the "Seven Generations" elements (the 4th) has been taken. Perhaps you read in The Bucknellian about the Iroquois Native peoples' vision that "all decisions should be made with seven generations in mind" and about the representation of this vision by an 82-year-old Dutch artist. In a day when so much of our world seeks instant gratification and short-term solutions to personal and economic problems, Franck's sculpture and the Iroquois' message are important educational reminders.

What deeply saddens me, and I hope you, is that virtually nothing is off limits to our pranks and deprecations. If art cannot stand to tell us of our past, who will tell us when our ancestors are gone? If we cannot look beyond seven forms of steel and see ourselves, our parents, and our future children in these artistic symbols, how can we ever learn meaningful lessons, even in our youth?

If we cannot look beyond seven forms of steel and see ourselves... how can we ever learn meaningful lessons, even in our youth?

The "Seven Generations" sculpture was brought to Bucknell as the inspiration of a group of students who do understand the Iroquois' message. I am writing to ask you to persuade those who took this piece to return it to the spot where it originally stood (and where no pieces now stand) or to call Public Safety to tell them where to pick it up. Then your classmates may commence with the student celebration they have planned to dedicate this sculpture.

The sculpture's "feet" will be placed in concrete now, and we have lost a bit of our humanity. Perhaps this, too, is a symbolic message for our time. Please help reverse such trends by helping us put "Seven Generations" in its rightful place as a reminder to future generations of Bucknell students of the Iroquois' powerful message.

made clear that by "phasing out" I mean that as long as the policy and practice of R.O.T.C. remain unchanged they should be allowed no future class of cadets. And, I also believe that the only moral response to this situation would be for the University to guarantee to provide financial assistance to anyone whose participation at this University would be threatened by this phase out process. No one should have to rely upon or participate in the injustice of R.O.T.C. to remain in school.

I also realize that this problem extends beyond our campus. Homophobia and sexism are global issues. But to avoid dealing with these issues at our campus level because of their size is inappropriate. Shall we do nothing about about sexism, racism, heterosexism, classism, etc. all because they are too big. Such attempts to abstract and depersonalize these issues is nothing more than a failure to take responsibility for our part in these issues.

This is, I believe, a soul check for this University. Where does this University really stand? Are we going to do the right thing? As we all know, there is no better time than Spring to start anew. I suggest that this University take heed of the opportunity. In peace.

Writer saddened over stolen statue

TO THE EDITOR:

I was appalled yesterday to hear of the theft of part of the "Seven Generations" sculpture. Actually, I consider it more of a desecration than an act of mere vandalism.

I was there at the dedication, and I was moved by the generosity, the humanity of Frederick Franck. I know he wanted it to be not just for us, here and now, but also as a message from our time to those who are to come. And the "invocation" by Professor Grim was stirring, uplifting.

I don't know if the theft was a willful political statement (I suspect that it was) or a display of someone's ignorance; either way it's a sad moment for Bucknell, an attack on diversity and on artistic expression. It's sadder still when one remembers that the sculpture was intended as a symbol of hope. If I believed in omens, I would take this pathetic act to mean that the human species is definitely on the way out. I can't help but think of the sculpture currently in the atrium of the biology/chemistry building, the dinosaur-like creature in its shell. The dinosaurs became extinct through no fault of their own; they couldn't change their world. But humankind will become extinct because of our crimes against the earth and against ourselves. I think I should stop, since I'm making myself depressed!

I can still hope that the full sculpture will be restored. That would be an act of decency and a positive sign, perhaps, of better things to come. If I can help in this matter in any way, please let me know.

If I believed in omens, I would take this pathetic act to mean that the human species is definitely on the way out.

Bucknell Opera Company plans a varied show for spring

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Featuring works from five operas, the Bucknell Opera Company, under the direction of Catherine Payn, assistant professor of music, will present its spring production tomorrow night in Tustin Studio Theatre. Accompanying the group will be Bernard Kunkel on piano.

First on the program is "The Mighty Casey" by American composer William Schuman, based on the famous poem "Casey at the Bat" by Ernest L. Thayer. Fans of baseball as well as opera will be able to appreciate the humor in Schuman's opera.

"A Game of Chance," composed by Seymour Barab, demonstrates the irony that is sometimes involved when one's wishes come true. The libretto, by Evelyn Manacher Draper, is based on the play All on a Summer's Day by Florence Ryerson and Colin Clements. "A Game of Chance," is directed by Jennifer Walsh '92, a bachelor of music major and manager of the opera company.

The only complete opera slated for Saturday's performance is the chamber opera "A Hand of Bridge" by Samuel Barber. Centered around two couples who meet regularly for an evening of cards, the opera focuses on the lives, thoughts, and relationships of the characters.

"Die Fledermaus (The Bat)" was originally written in German by Carl Haffner and Richard Genee and was composed by the Austrian waltz-king Johann Strauss.

The program will end with a scene from Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," based on the popular fairy tale by Ludwig Grimm. Like "Die Fledermaus," this piece was originally written in German and will be performed in English.

Saturday night's program premiered last weekend at the Waverly Community House, in Waverly, PA. The Bucknell performance is free and open to the public.

Brian Sipes–The Bucknellian

The Bucknell Opera Company will perform selected works tomorrow night part of its spring concert. Premiering last weekend in Wavery, PA, the concert will be accompanied by Bernard Kunkel on piano.

In Hollywood, to be considered a classic means to have stood the test of time. Yet there are a host of films in the movie archives which may not be classified as Hollywood legends, but will none the less provide more entertainment than an afternoon with Birth of a Nation. So, with finals and term paper season upon us, if you've resigned yourself to a weekend of "staying in," here are a few films to consider:

Video Selections

He Said, She Said

Starring: Elizabeth Perkins and Kevin Bacon

Directed by: Ken Kwapis and Marisa Silver

Summary: Two journalists (Perkins and Bacon) break up on the air during their talk show. The movie centralizes on the story of their relationship in retrospect from two different points of view (his and hers).

Attraction: He Said, She Said contains an outrageously hysterical script. The dialogue contains quick and fresh one-liners that steer away from dumb and predictable jokes. Writer Brian Hohlfeld has a talent for exaggerating mundane daily events with a satire and sarcasm not common in most movies. The approach is original, and the two-sided narration sets up an endless supply of comedic situations. Perkins and Bacon both demonstrate their comedic expertise with flawless timing and deliveries.

Warning: Not the kind of movie to watch over and over. He Said, She Said loses part of its freshness and spontaneity after the first viewing.

Dominick and Eugene

Starring: Ray Liotta and Tom Hulce

Directed by: Robert M. Young

Summary: Liotta and Hulce are twin brothers living together in an average apartment. Dominick (Hulce) suffers from mental retardation brought upon by a childhood accident. Although he works as a local garbage man, supporting his brother Eugene (Liotta) through med school, Dominick relies on his brother in a guardian/best friend relationship. The movie focuses on the trials and everyday stress placed on both of them, as Eugene tries to build a life for himself with girlfriend Jamie Lee Curtis, while feeling an overwhelming responsibility to his brother.

Attraction: Liotta and Hulce both display incredible acting talent in portraying the lives of these two brothers. Their performances are realistic and convincing, particularly that of Tom Hulce as a retarded man who emulates his brother like a father. The situations are believable and will tug at your heart strings without an abundance of extraneous mush.

Warning: This movie gets very emotional—not the one to watch if you've had a depressing day.

What's Up, Tiger Lily?

Starring: A group of random Chinese actors

Directed by: Woody Allen

Summary: A private eye is hired by a country trying desperately to get on the map. His mission: to track down the country's secret recipe for egg salad (a pre-requisite for mapdom) stolen by the notorious villain Wing Fat. His job is complicated by a rival thief, also seeking the recipe in order to ransom it back to the country for one million dollars.

Attraction: What's Up, Tiger Lily? is a 1970's Chinese ganster film that Allen bought the rights to, deleted the soundtrack from, and superimposed his own script onto. A gifted comedic writer, Allen has succeeded in turning the film into one long farce. It's the kind of movie where the acting is so bad, it's funny. The slapsticking, so-stupid-you-have-to-laugh factor is explored to its fullest potential with hilarious results.

Warning: Some of this movie is actually so stupid, it's not funny, although Allen's success with jokes outnumbers his failures. Not for those viewers who dislike Allen's brand of humor, this movie is packed with his trademark style.

Taxi Driver

Starring: Robert DeNiro and Jodie Foster

Directed by: Martin Scorsese

Summary: Taxi driver Travis Bickel (DeNiro) spend his nights and most of his days roaming the cities in his cab. A certified insomniac, he falls for child prostitute Jodie Foster. Plagued by a sense of guardianship, Bickel becomes obsessed with building up a small arsenal of weapons for the purpose of killing Foster's pimp and freeing her from a life of degradation and crime.

Attraction: This is for those of you who are unclear why Scorsese occupies the position of director god. The camera shots, editing, and overall vision of the film are incredible. DeNiro's intensity is unmatched as the psycho taxi-driver. The audience can see clearly the avenues his mind takes from your average everyday kind of guy, to an obsessed insomniac, to raving murderer. The film scores high in all aspects of production and leaves you with a definite sense of lonely city life at his grimmest.

Warning: Not for the weak of stomach. Taxi Driver is one long sequence of violence, profanity, and vulgar situations.

Clark takes the role of a lifetime

Brian Sipes–The Bucknellian

Brian Clark '92 assumes the role he knew would inevitably be his as he directs Valerie Marsden '93 and George Hannah '93 in the Department of Theatre and Dance's production of The Crucible.

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Even when I acted in high school productions, I'd look at the director from the stage and know that that's what I wanted to do." This semester Bryan Clark '92 is playing the role he knew would eventually be his as the student director of the Department of Theatre and Dance's production of Arthur Miller's The Crucible.

Student Profile

Clark's involvement in theatre began at the age of twelve when he auditioned for a school play. By the time the curtain closed, Clark was taken with acting and continued to act throughout high school. Despite the fact that his interest in theatre outweighed his interest in business, Clark entered Bucknell as a business major. As a freshman, Clark involved himself heavily in the theatre, stage managing the production of Cabaret. Quick to credit the faculty of the Department of Theatre and Dance for encouraging him to pursue his interest, Clark eventually switched to a theatre major.

"As a freshman I was made aware of a sequence of events to follow before becoming a student director," Clark states, explaining the prerequisites to being allowed to direct a main stage production. As a sophomore Clark directed Penguin Blues to fulfill his directing class requirements and went on to tackle Sam Shepard's The Holy Ghostly, performed as part of Cap and Dagger's Evening of One-Acts, the following year. Proving himself a capable director, Clark was approved for an independent study in directing his senior year.

"A play selection committee determined what plays would be produced," Clark describes, telling how he was chosen to direct The Crucible. "In the Shakespeare category, Kate Pogue, visiting professor in the department of theatre and dance, directed A Midsummer Night's Dream. In the category of works by a woman was Laurie McCants' The Alice Project. Gary Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance, did The Latin American Project. In the modern category, The Crucible was chosen, and I was asked to direct."

As director, Clark is responsible for coordinating the overall vision of the show. Not one to take all the credit, Clark refers to the production as a "collaboration" with costume and set designer F. Elaine Williams, associate professor of theatre, and technical director Steve Draheim, professor in the department of theatre and dance.

"In a play like The Crucible, decisions have to be made as to how to set it. Miller wrote the play during the McCarthy era, so some might choose to set it in that era. We made the choice to set the play in 1692 Salem, Massachusetts, which is how Miller wrote it." Having decided on that, Clark and Williams traveled to Salem, photographing the houses and environment that the characters of the play were surrounded by to get an actual feel for the confused, repressed society that existed in Salem during the period of The Crucible. "We were going for a minimalist effect," Clark states, adding that although the sets are large, the minimalist effect is achieved. "We wanted sets focused on the actions of the characters. We want the audience to be more interested in the relationships of the characters on the stage than on the sets."

Following graduation, Clark will spend a year working, before hopeing to move on to graduate school for an MFA in directing. This summer Clark will travel to Bloomington, Indiana to work with Karen McCann '91 on the Bloomington Playwright's Project. Returning to his hometown outside of Baltimore in the fall, Clark will direct Dylan Thomas' Under Milk Wood at his alma mater, the McDonogh School. "As things keep getting closer, they seem to come together. When a project comes up, I do it and then move on to the next project. It's risky, but at the same time it's exciting."

Clark's goal is to someday be the artistic director of a theatre of his own creation specializing in the development and production of the works of young playwrights. A playwright himself, he has submitted monologues to the Playwright's Project. Although his immediate attention is focused on directing, Clarks feels certain that "writing is definitely in the future."

Baseball rallies to defeat St. Bonaventure

Jack Kazanjian '93 garners Pitcher and Athlete of the Week honors; team travels to Bethlehem this weekend to battle the Engineers

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It has been another strange and frustrating week for the Bucknell baseball team. It all started with a three-game series at Fordham last weekend in which the Bison were held to a total of three runs on 12 hits for the entire series—but still managed to win one of the three games. Then, on Wednesday, the "Cardiac Kids" literally stole a game from St. Bonaventure.

In that game, Bucknell starter Denis Maguire '93 was roughed up for four run on five hits in just two and a third innings, as St. Bonaventure jumped out to a 4-2 lead. Two more runs off of reliever Rich Heller '94 made the score 6-2, and the game was seemingly out of reach.

In the bottom of the seventh, however, the Bison rallied for three runs, with the big blow being a two-run single by Mark Kennedy '92. In the bottom of the eighth, Bucknell put runners on second and third with two outs, when Mike Kearns '93 came to the plate to try to get the tying and go-ahead runners across the plate. What followed was one of the strangest at-bats ever seen.

With the count at one ball and two strikes on Kearns, St. Bonaventure pitcher Mike Callaghan threw a hard breaking ball in the dirt, and Kearns offered a checked swing. The catcher—assuming Kearns went around far enough to be ruled out on strikes upon an appeal to the base umpire—threw the ball to first to apparently record the out and end the game. On the throw to first, however, Larry Trout '93, the runner on third, alertly scampered home. Much to the delight of the Bison bench, the field umpire ruled that Kearns had, in fact, not swung at the pitch, meaning the count would simply go to two and two, and Trout's run would count.

The St. Bonaventure bench could not believe what had just happened, and their manager and several players went wild. When the dust settled, the Bison had tied the score, and the Bonnies had lost their manager, who was quickly ejected from the game. On the very next pitch, Kearns blooped a single, his third of the game, to center field to bring home what would be the winning run.

It is still unclear whether or not Kearns swung at the pitch or not. The fans down the left field line thought he may have went around, while Trout, from a similar vantage point at third base, thought he held up. "It's a tough call for the umpires," said Kearns. "But if they had called me out, I probably would have argued."

Dave Scranton '95 (1-2) was the winning pitcher in the 7-6 final. Scranton hurled the last two and two thirds innings for his first collegiate win, and he extended his scoreless innings streak to five and a third innings.

In the weekend series in the Bronx, Fordham put on a pitching clinic in taking two of three from the Bison. The highlight of the weekend came in the first game of a doubleheader on Sunday, when Jack Kazanjian '93 shut out the mighty Rams in the 1-0 Bucknell victory. Kazanjian improved his record to 4-1 on the season, and was named the Patriot League's co-Pitcher of the Week. The junior righthander also lowered his ERA to 1.85, placing him among the league leaders in wins and ERA. Opponents are hitting just .225 against him. Jim Zervanos '92 drove in Kearns in the first inning for the only run of the game.

Kazanjian attributes much of his success to hard work in the off-season as well as increased confidence on the mound. "I've learned to throw all four of my pitches well, and I am confident that I can perform well at this level," said Kazanjian, who also believes that his success may start to rub off on some of the younger hurlers.

"Most of the freshmen are in the same situation that I was in when I was a freshman," he said. "They are learning to challenge hitters—to be strong and tough. To be pitchers out there."

Perhaps Kazanjian was inspired by the performance of Fordham's Jim McDermott the day before. In the seven-inning game, McDermott tossed a one-hit shutout, while striking out 14 batters. Only a double by Dave Koerner '92 prevented a no-hitter. Meanwhile, Bucknell starter Kurt Waldner '93 was plagued not only by the lack of offense, but by poor defense and some poor pitches. The defense committed four errors, and Waldner (2-3) gave up six runs (four earned) on six hits in five innings pitched.

In the first game of Sunday's twin bill, Maguire was rocked for six runs on four hits and six walks in just an inning and two thirds. Kyle Morris '95 did not fare much better, allowing five more runs in the next inning and two thirds, as Fordham cruised to an 11-2 win.

In addition to Kazanjian, several other Bison are putting up solid numbers. Centerfielder Matt Sniegocki '93 is leading the nation in triples. He has seven this season for an NCAA-high .350 per game. Waldner struck out nine Fordham batters last Saturday, moving him to the top of the Patriot League in that category. He is averaging 9.31 fans per nine innings. Catcher John Martine '94 is hitting .500 for the season (6-12), and he also has six walks, giving him a .667 on-base percentage.

The Bison now stand at 10-11 on the year, 3-3 in the Patriot League. Since only the outright conference winner gets a bid to the ECAC championships, it is imperative for the Bison to sweep Lehigh this weekend, and Colgate next weekend. A loss to hapless Lehigh last season severely hampered Bucknell's title hopes, and with Fordham off to a 7-1 start, wins over the second division teams are vital.

Men's lax sweeps Air Force, Denver in trip to Rockies

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The men's lacrosse team squeaked past the Air Force Academy, annihilated the University of Denver, and overcame an invisible opponent—Colorado's thin air—to complete a successful weekend stint in the Rocky Mountains.

With the two victories, the Bison raised their record above .500, to 5-4, for the first time since the beginning of the season.

Bucknell's swing through the western United States first took the team to Colorado Springs, CO to take on the Air Force Falcons, in what would become one of the team's wildest battles in recent history. After a solid first quarter, which saw the Bison clinging to a 2-1 lead, the Falcons exploded for five goals in the second quarter to take a 6-3 lead at intermission.

According to Justin Zackey '94, "Everyone on the team was having trouble with the altitude." Kevin Roth '92 agreed, stating, "The thin air played a particularly big role in the first half. By the second half we had adjusted to the conditions a bit more."

The Bison played inspired lacrosse in the third quarter, fighting back with five goals of their own to tie the score 8-8 after 45 minutes of play.

Since both teams were eager to pull out of this war of attrition with a victory, the lead continued to see-saw back and forth in the final period.

With just under a minute to go in the game and the score tied at 11 apiece, the Falcons netted what appeared to be the game-winning goal. On this day, however, the Bison were not to be denied. Rik Herrema '93 controlled the Bats sparkle, but defense hurts softball

Bison sweep Mount Saint Mary's, split with Fordham, drop two to Army; team travels to Lehigh and Lafayette this weekend

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Errors and wild pitches plagued the Bucknell softball team in two of the team's three doubleheaders last week. The Bison split a twinbill with Patriot League foe before dropping two to Army, the 1991 Patriot League Champion. Last Tuesday brought fame and fortune back to the Bison as they put together two winning efforts against Mount Saint Mary's.

Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian
Jen Yuengling '93 leads off third during the St. Bonaventure game last weekend at the mod fields.

On Sunday, Bucknell opened its Fordham doubleheader with a classic pitchers' duel. Allison Love '95 took the mound for all seven innings of the initial game, which ended in a 1-0 victory for the freshman. In the shutout, Fordham mustered only three hits off of Love. The rookie also struck out four in the contest.

The Bison had a tough time in the hits area as well, picking up only three of their own behind the batting efforts of co-captain Jen Yuengling '93, Kelly Corr '95, and Carol Gesler '93. Defensive leader Heather Hoehn '94 also reached base on two walks, setting up the one run that Bucknell scored in the second inning.

The Bison did not fare as well in Sunday's second game as they suffered a 7-0 shelling. Lisa Fink '93, who is primarily an outfielder, started on the mound for Bucknell. The junior struggled with her control for one and two thirds innings and received little defensive help from her teammates, who bobbled their way into four errors on the game. In that short period, Fordham scored six unanswered runs, only three of which were earned. The Rams scored a total of seven runs off only two hits.

Offensively, Bucknell was cold as well, with only three players recording hits. Devany Kerr '94 went two-for-two, while Yuengling and Ellen Gabriel '93 added one hit apiece.

On a positive note, freshman sensation Heidi Dawson pitched well for the five and one third innings that she played. In her outing, Dawson threw only two hittable balls and added no earned runs to her season's statistics.

Bucknell returned to West Field the following day and was further frustrated by the Army Cadets. Game one saw Bucknell's offense pick up, but to no avail. The Bison, who led 4-0 at one point in the game, had ten hits to Army's six, but still suffered an 11-6 loss due to the poor defensive play on the field.

Bucknell's disheartening seven errors and Love's five wild pitches served to undermine its credible offensive play—six Bucknell batters recorded hits for the team. Yuengling led the Bison at the plate, going three-for-four, while Fink followed with a two-for-three (one double) and three RBI performance. Gesler was the team's final multiple hitter, going a perfect two-for-two at the plate and adding an RBI to her stats.

Game two was equally disastrous for the Bison, who again performed at the plate but crumbled in the field. Once again, Bucknell held a lead going into the fourth inning before the team fell apart. Army ended up scoring 12 runs off eight hits, while Bucknell smacked 13 balls into the field but came up with only seven runs.

FROM THE BULLPEN
Freshman pitchers are 16-7 ... Lisa Fink '93 and Jen Yuengling '93 are a combined 30 of 31 on stolen base attempts ... Fink leads the team in batting average, doubles, runs, and stolen bases.

Although Dawson was charged with the loss, the score is not entirely indicative of her performance. Dawson did throw four wild pitches and added an error to Bucknell's list of seven in the game; however, the dependable pitcher threw her way into only four earned runs in the 12-run trouncing.

Offensively, the Bison came up big yet again. Fink was three-for-four at the plate, including a double and two RBI. Gesler followed suit with yet another perfect performance, batting three-for-three. Gabriel also added notable stats, going two-for-two while drawing three walks. Yuengling rounded out the team's list of multiple hitters with a shaky two-for-five performance.

Consistent play returned to the softball team on Tuesday as they took control of a weaker Mount St. Mary's squad. Both Love and Dawson recorded wins for Bucknell, pitching 9-2 and 6-4 games respectively.

Fink continued her offensive domination throughout both contests; the centerfielder was five-for-five on the day, with two doubles and a RBI. Collectively, Fink also enjoyed five successful stolen bases on five attempts.

The Bucknell softball team took its 16-9, 3-3 record to Bethlehem today to take on another league rival in Lehigh before traveling down the road to meet Lafayette in Easton on Saturday.

Crew enjoys success at LaSalle Invite

BY EDWARD S. WILLIAMS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Without a doubt our strongest showing ever. Every boat made it to finals," remarked coach Jimmy King about Saturday's races at the LaSalle invitational in Camden, NJ.

The Varsity-lightweight-eight race began with five oarsman crabbing—the stroke, six man, four man, two man, and the bow man. Despite this rough beginning, by the end of the high 20, Bucknell was only down to Villanova University by one seat and had five seats over Lafayette College and four seats over Manhattan College. Drexel University had a length on the Bison oarsmen. After the high 20, Bucknell settled to a rating of 34 strokes per minute.

The lightweights were able to pull through Villanova—never getting more than a one length lead during the 2,000-meter race. At the 1,000-meter mark, Drexel, at a 34 rating, had a one length lead on Bucknell which had fallen to a 32 The Bison in turn had a six seat lead on Villanova ,boasting a 33 rating.

Drexel then pulled away from the other crews, finishing first with a time of 7:08.16. Villanova continued battling Bucknell, gaining four seats at the 1,250 mark. With a 34 rating at the sprint, the Bison rowers were able to regain their one length lead. Bucknell finished second with a time of 7:25.85, and Villanova third at 7:29.99. Manhattan and Lafayette rounded out the field.

The lightweights were pleased with their performance on Saturday. They raced with a different line up than usual: Tyson Rosser '94, Chris Gnieczki '94, Jim Behnke '93, Brent Chandaria '93, captain Chris Norrie '92, Edward Williams '93, Derek Updegraff '93, Norm Bartlett '93, and coxswain Jacquelyn Shriver '93. Updegraff commented that, "We are beginning to prove ourselves against some of the better established rowing schools." Additionally, Ginieczki remarked, "The only boat we lost to was a Drexel boat coached by Ted Nash, the coach of the 1988 Silver medal four in Seoul."

"We are in a good position [for championships] as a result of our strong performance."
— Coach Anne Shapiro

The Varsity women's eight, consisting of Melanie Muehe '94, Jen Criss '94, Gretchen Maton '92, Kathy Kolasheski '92, Tina Pinto '94, Megan Buehler '94, captain Kristin Gundersen '92, Shannon Owens '92, and coxswain Erin Burns '93, qualified for finals by beating La Salle University, Villanova, and Lafayette.

Despite a rating of 39, the women began their final in last place after the high 20. They settled to a 33 and began to make a move on Marist College. At the 1,000-meter mark, all boats "hit a wall" before the Bison started to move on the University of Delaware and Army. Eventually, the women finished third, 1.17 seconds behind Army and 3.95 seconds in front of Delaware.

Women's coach Anne Shapiro remarked that this was "an important race for the placing at Dad Vails [championship regatta at the end of the year] . We are in a good position as a result of our strong performance."

The Varsity heavyweight men: Shaun Lippy '94, Scott Campbell '93, Paul Rodgers '94, Wells Reinheimer '93, Steve Kish '92, Carl Lindquist '94, Doug Lebda '92, Dave Rhodes '92, and coxswain Kim Tinstman '95 were in a race against some strong programs. This was clear at the start when, after the high 20, St. Joseph's University and Drexel had open water over Bucknell. The Bison were two seats down to Delaware and even with Army. Bucknell had an open water lead over SUNY Binghamton. The Bison were then battling Army for fourth place. Army was able to take the last stroke and the victory over the Bison by 1.4 seconds.

Coach John Skotedis commented that Bucknell gave a "stellar performance from the entire squad. It was a strong showing by both the men and the women in the regional regatta. It was Bucknell's strongest performance in one of America's major collegiate regattas."

Cyclin' Bison "A" place two in top fifteen

BY CHRIS NEUMANN
AND ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The cycling team traveled to West Point last weekend for one of the team's biggest races, the Army Classic Stage Race. This race series is a prestige race worth twice as many points as other races toward National qualification.

The Bison arrived on the scene Friday evening and got a good night's rest for the long weekend ahead. Saturday's conditions were less than ideal as it was cold and raining. When the first of the two C races started, the Bison not only had to fight the rain, cold weather and fast pace, but Oliver Hasse '93 had also crashed in warm up and was racing injured. The race took off fast, and Hasse got into the lead pack right away. Tony Massaro '93, competing in his first race, could not keep up with the pace, and was lapped before the race was over. The pace also took its toll on Hasse, and he too was lapped.

In the next race, Greg Tall '93 and Jim Ruiz '95 suffered practically the same fate. Ruiz had difficulty attaching his foot to the pedal at the start, and had to play catch-up for the rest of the race. Tall started out strong, but misshifted on the first hill lap, which put him off the back. He too was never able to catch up to the lead.

By the time the A race started, the rain had stopped. The 100-man field took off fast, but Lee Lefkowitz '93 and Chris Neumann '95 got to the front right away. Several laps later, Lefkowitz suffered a flat, and was unable to get a spare wheel, taking him out of the race. Neumann raced tough, and moved to the front for the final sprint. He placed third, just behind riders from Princeton and UMass. The points amassed by Neumann were enough to put the Bison in eighth place for the team rankings, ahead of a large Harvard team.

The road race was later Sunday. The C riders did one lap of a grueling 14-mile course, which included a three-mile climb. On the downhill, the riders approached a U turn at 50 mph, causing several of the riders to lose control. At the top of the climb, the C category Bison were again off the back, and finished between 30 seconds and two minutes off the pace.

The A riders rode three laps of the same course. The climb wore down the riders as the race progressed, almost pushing Neumann and Lefkowitz off the back at one point. They held on, however, and were at the front to contest the sprint. The two moved into position to help one another, when they were forced back by some slower riders in front of them.

Lefkowitz and Neumann pushed their way to the front, and, when the dust had settled after the 40 mph sprint, Neumann took 7th, and Lefkowitz 15th, another strong showing.

The Bison will be at Cornell this weekend in preparation for the Eastern Championships and National qualifiers the following weekend.

Major League Preview: N.L. East

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As many of you sit down to read about what's going to happen in the National League East this season, you are probably saying to yourselves, "It must be easy for this guy to make these predictions two weeks into the season." This is a valid point, so I'll let you in on a little secret. There's a little green box in my room with a lock on it, and inside of it are my 1992 picks. Only my fellow Sports Editors Chris Drowne and Andrea Falcione have keys, and despite many threats to get one from them, the picks you see here are the ones I made the night before Opening Day.

That said, let's talk about the Pittsburgh Pirates, who are a mortal lock to win this division for the third straight year. Most people who think Pittsburgh can't "three-peat" cite the losses of Bobby Bonilla and John Smiley as the primary reasons. If you look at my comments on the Minnesota Twins in last week's column, you will remember that I thought the Twins could not repeat because they lost too many role players. Well, the Pirates bench is almost exactly the same, and Kirk Gibson coming in will actually improve it. The return of Jeff King from back surgery will help to make the bottom of the order stronger. Andy Van Slyke and Barry Bonds (in a contract year) are potent in the middle of the order, and with Gibson, make up an outstanding all-around outfield. The starting pitching is excellent, with Doug Drabek due for a better season than last year, and Zane Smith, Randy Tomlin, Bob Walk, and newcomer Denny Neagle filling out the rotation. Jim Leyland, the best manager this side of Tony LaRussa, always has a knack for getting the most out of veteran relievers. Anybody who can turn Roger Mason, a guy who went seven years between major league games, into a successful pitcher must be doing something right.

On paper, the New York Mets are one of the best teams in baseball. Unfortunately, most of the Mets' players gloves are made of paper, Vince Coleman's hamstring rips as easily as a piece of paper, and the majority of the Mets have seen policemen hand them little yellow pieces of paper. Getting Gregg Jefferies, Kevin McReynolds, and Mark Carreon out of town will help the defense tremendously, but it is still pathetic. The good news is that their lineup is awesome. The additions of Bobby Bonilla and Eddie Murray will obviously help, and the addition of the scrappy Bill Pecota is a very underrated move. Howard Johnson may be the best all-around player in baseball. When you consider that he hit 38 homers, drove in 117 runs, scored 108 runs, and stole 38 bases, it is hard to believe that he only finished third in last year's MVP balloting. The major addition to the pitching staff is Bret Saberhagen, but he never does well in even-numbered years. Doc Gooden has apparently recovered from arm surgery, so he, along with David Cone, Sid Fernandez, and youngster Anthony Young make up a good staff. The Mets should also improve because they finally have a decent manager, Jeff Torborg.

The Philadelphia Phillies may have pulled off one of the greatest trades in baseball history this winter. They dealt Von Hayes to the Angels for two rookies with All-Star potential—Kyle Abbott and Ruben Amaro, Jr. Trading Von Hayes for a warm six-pack of Piels would normally be considered a steal, and getting two Rookie of the Year candidates could make the deal one of the all-time great coups. In fact, when centerfielder Lenny Dykstra was informed that the club had traded Hayes, he responded, "Great trade! Who'd we get?" Wes Chamberlain—the greatest clerical error acquisition ever—is another top youngster who give this team some reason to be optimistic. The pitching is young and basically raw. Andy Ashby, Tommy Greene, and Abbott have tremendous potential, and Terry Mulholland is just now living up to his.

Despite some serious holes in their lineup (third base, center field, catcher, closer), the Chicago Cubs have enough talent to work around it and finish in the middle of the pack. Obviously, Ryne Sandberg, Mark Grace, and Andre Dawson are going to put up above-average numbers. Question marks are youngsters Sammy Sosa, Gary Scott, and pitcher Lance Dickson. Starter Greg Maddux is becoming a top-notch pitcher, and the addition of free agent Mike Morgan and Danny Jackson's return from injury will make for a fair staff. The bullpen is basically awful. Dave Smith was a bust last year, and Paul Assenmacher is probably not going to be the answer as the closer. However, any bullpen that includes a guy with a name like Heathcliff Slocumb can't be all that bad.

It's about time the St. Louis Cardinals stop overachieving, and live down to their potential. Every year I pick them to finish near the bottom of the division, and they make me look bad by playing about five stories over their collective heads. So in an effort not to break with tradition, I will pick them down at the bottom again. Really, though, this team is not that good. They traded Ken Hill, one of their best pitchers last year, to Montreal for Andres Galarraga. This move forces Pedro Guerrero, a guy who is probably ready to be a designated hitter, to move back to the spacious Busch Stadium outfield. Not even the lightening-quick Ray Lankford can cover enough ground to make up for Guerrero's inadequacies. Other than that, only Felix Jose and Todd Zeile are legitimate threats, and those two have only had one good season in the majors. St. Louis leadoff hitters only hit .247 last season, which is definitely not typical of a Cardinal team. Closer Lee Smith is the best in the business, and assuming the Cards ever have a lead late in the game, they are a sure bet to win it.

There is not much good to say about the Montreal Expos this year, except that their new uniforms are pretty nice. They don't even know if their stadium will stay upright, much less who is going to get hitters out this season. Dennis Martinez is one of the best pitchers in the league, and Ken Hill joins the staff now, and maybe John Wetteland will win some games, but other than that the staff is awful. The bullpen is the worst in baseball. The team's strength is the outfield, where Ivan Calderon, Marquis Grissom, and Larry Walker are good.

Athlete of the Week

Jack Kazanjian '93

Bucknell baseball pitcher Jack Kazanjian '93 has been named The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of Apr. 10-16.

Kazanjian was honored as the Patriot League's Co-Pitcher of the Week last by the league office for his impressive play on the mound. On Sunday, the junior pitched ten scoreless innings in a 1-0 victory over Fordham. The game marked the first time in many years that the Rams suffered a shutout. Perhaps the most dependable and consistent pitcher on the Bucknell roster, Kazanjian sports a 4-1 record and added to his list of accomplishments a save in a game against Penn State earlier last week.

He also leads the Bison and is among the Patriot League leaders with a 1.85 ERA. Kazanjian's opponents are hitting only .225 against him as well.

Behler is truly "Voice of the Bison"

Bob Behler's hard work brings Bison athletics into fans' homes on radio and television

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

When Bob Behler came to Lewisburg in 1986, he did not expect to stay much past the expiration of his ten-week contract. Leaving his job as the play-by-play announcer for Minor League Baseball's Chattanooga Lookouts, Behler came to Bucknell to announce the Bison football games on a local radio station out of Williamsport.

At that time Bucknell's sports broadcasting consisted of only football games on the local radio stations and a small selection of basketball games on the campus station, WVBU. Behler remembers, "I knew I didn't like the direction that things were going in Chattanooga and I knew that I could make something happen here."

He was certainly able to do just that as he wasted no time in moving the program in a new direction. That first year, Behler gathered enough advertising support to sell a Bucknell basketball package to a radio station out of Mifflinburg, and eventually he combined the two sports. Now, all of the school's football and basketball games are carried on WTGC from Lewisburg.

In his second season as the "Voice of the Bison," Behler brought Bucknell sports into the television age when he began editing, producing and hosting weekly highlight shows for football and basketball that are now carried by cable stations in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and Washington D.C. Remarked the show's creator, "I think that the show is well-received in different markets. Right now we are looking at systems in Pittsburgh and New York We have to sell them on Bucknell and the teams."

Behler, a California native, found before college what his life's calling would be. "Our high school had a TV cable station and I would do some of the team's games on tape-delay. During my junior year, our school made the state play-offs in Oakland, and a local station asked me to do the game." Obviously impressed, the station hired him to announce their Game of the Week, setting down the foundation for his career.

After starting at a local college in California, Behler transferred to the University of Georgia after his sophomore year. At that school, well-renowned for its broadcasting program, he was hired to announce the Bulldogs' women's basketball and baseball games on a student station of approximately 20,000 watts.

Upon graduation, the broadcast news major applied to a number of different places and was a finalist for a job at the Citadel. The position went to the former announcer for Chattanooga, and Behler was recommended for the job with the Lookouts.

He finished that season and the next, but was soon looking to move on. He sent letters to about 50 colleges and ultimately was offered a ten-week job at Bucknell to announce the football games. Soon proving his value to the school, he has transformed the part-time position into year-round work.

Between games, Behler can be found preparing for the Bison's next opponent or selling advertising for upcoming shows, an aspect of his job that he ranks among the most difficult. "The advertising is the hardest part. You have to sell the program, and then, since most of our sponsors are local companies, we have to write and produce the commercials ourselves."

In his off-season, Behler lends help in the Sports Information Office, but he also finds time to do some free-lance work. In 1990, he was asked by TBS to fly to Seattle to cover team handball and boxing competitions at the Goodwill Games. While at the Games, Behler ran across some fortune that gave him even more exposure. An early morning phone call woke Behler to the news that the station's basketball announcer had to leave due to a family illness. Arriving unprepared, just in time for the national anthems, Behler worked four consecutive international basketball games. Reflecting on the experience, he commented, "I was encouraged that I was able to pull it off; it showed I can work under pressure, but I much prefer to be prepared going into a game."

After six years in Lewisburg, Behler says he is looking to move on to a major Division I university. He states, "It's funny in this business in that jobs are rarely advertised—everything is done through the grapevine. It's really who you know and being in the right place at the right time. I'm sure that there is someone out there waiting for this job, who can't believe that I've been here this long."

Amy Clare–The Bucknellian
Since his arrival in 1986, Behler's broadcasts have brought Bucknell sports into the 20th century.

He adds, "I like Bucknell, but Lewisburg is not a broadcast mecca, and some state school's have 50-60 stations. Here we could branch to Williamsport, but sometimes you feel you've gone as far as you can and its time to move on."

It may be time for Behler to move on, but he and Bucknell have both gained from his stay in Lewisburg. He closes, "I've been here six years and, looking back at some old tapes, I can see that I've gotten better. You always get better. I hope that in six years when I look back, I won't believe how much I'll have improved."

gate are expected to round out the top four. However, don't count the Bison out of that group just yet.

and four assists, while attackman Todd Streelman '93 notched two of each. Roth again was the team's top goal-scorer with three, while midfielders Brown and Chris DiMenna '95 added two apiece. Dan Snyder '93 and Doug DePietro '92 both had one goal and one assist.

Goalie Colin Barker '94 recorded 13 saves in the Bison net.

Although Herrema also added a goal in this one, he would have to be considered the single most significant player in the Bison victory by winning a remarkable 23 of 28 face-off opportunities . On the season, Herrema has won an impressive 60 percent of his attempts.

If the Air Force game was considered to be as draining as taking a standardized test like the MCAT's, the contest the following day against Denver was as strenuous as Spring Break in Cancun.

The fact that the final score read 26-9 in favor of Bucknell should sufficiently indicate that this was a case of a good team coming up against a team that is simply not so good. Although this game should have been over before it ever began, it was officially over at halftime, when the Bison led their weaker opponents by the score of 19-4. Before the 60 minutes could expire, Bucknell had already set new school records for goals in a quarter—11 in the second—and in a game, breaking a mark which had been in place since 1983.

Zackey greatly understated this game when he said, "It was an anti-climactic end to the trip."

It is worth noting that team captain and defensive midfielder Mike Conway '92 once again proved that players with long sticks can score, as he added two goals and one assist.

For those on campus this weekend, the Bison laxmen will be playing a 2 p.m. home game against Patriot League rival Lehigh on Saturday.

My week in baseball

I often tell people that baseball is my life, and everything else is just work. Free agent squabbles, lockouts, outrageous salaries—nothing could shake my love of The Game... or so I thought. This is a tale of two cities, and my crisis of faith in baseball.

I managed to survive the winter with the help of my USA TODAY Baseball Weekly subscription and my recording of "Willie, Mickey & the Duke," but now it was time. Opening Day. I was set to travel to Veteran's Stadium in Philadelphia to watch my beloved Phils battle the Cubs under the sun. What could be better?

Everything. It was a typical trip to the Vet, a characterless multi-purpose concrete donut out of the early '70s. The ushers were rude, the traffic was horrendous, the fans typically unpleasant. These people booed Mike Schmidt for 18 years, and where else can you be heckled in the advanced ticket line for taking too long?.

The game was mildly exciting, as I watched from my $10 upper-deck seat while holding my $4.00 beer. RiverSide Stadium, home to the minor-league Harrisburg Senators, looked like a pretty good place to be. I began to think that maybe major-league baseball just isn't worth the hassle.

Two days later, I journeyed with three friends to Baltimore to see the Orioles, my American League team, take on Cleveland. One of us, Kamran Sarshar '93, is an Orioles employee and had gotten us free tickets. I was really excited, for it was my first trip to brand new Oriole Park at Camden Yards, a splendid ballpark—not a stadium—which boasts all of the modern conveniences, yet all of the charm of the beautiful downtown parks of old. I was also hoping the trip to this gleaming new-old cathedral would restore my flagging faith in The Game.

Everything you've read is true, the place is amazing. Every detail is perfect, from the skyline, to The Warehouse, to the ushers' bowties and striped shirts. The Baltimore fans, as usual, were pleasant and upbeat, and ready to have fun. But all was far from perfect—there was a BIG problem.

The Orioles had moved their ticket office only three weeks before, so everything was far from settled in their new home. After waiting in the "will call" line, where nobody heckled us, we discovered that the comp tickets weren't there. Somewhere there had been a mix-up, and after driving for three hours we were left on the outside looking in on this baseball heaven that none of us had yet seen. While Kamran went inside to try to straighten things out the rest us waited and tried to watch as the game unfolded without us.

Alright, I thought, this is it. If I can't have a good time at Oriole Park, which is already being mentioned in the same breath as Wrigley Field and Fenway Park, then the baseball gods have surely conspired against me. I'll be watching the Eastern League; somebody tell me who wins the Series.

Just then, another man who had also been waiting approached us. "Are you waiting for tickets?" he asked. We said that we were. "Now you're not," he said, handing us three tickets and walking away as we stood speechless.

I felt just like Ray Kinsella in Field of Dreams, when he heard The Voice. No matter how the game may be manipulated or corrupted, this is what it's really about. I can't imagine such an incident taking place at a football or a basketball game. When we took our seats later, he explained that his friends had missed their train, and that "I just wanted someone to use the tickets." He didn't try to scalp them, or even recoup his money; this man just wanted to make sure three people got to enjoy the game, a brilliant two-hit shutout by Ben McDonald capped by a Mike Devereaux home run, the first O's dinger in the new park.

Memorial Stadium, the Orioles' only home before this year, was called "The House of Magic," but this was bigger than any miracle on 33rd Street. It's impossible to visit Oriole Park at Camden Yards, built on the site of "The House Where Ruth Lived," and not come away a true believer.

Spikin' Bison take national title

Men's club volleyball team captures Division II national championship; Jarosz, Lutz, and Dycka honored

BY MIKE LUTZ AND CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Bucknell men's volleyball team, led by head coach Pat Musselman and outside hitter Keith Martin '92, won the Men's Intercollegiate Club Volleyball Division II National Championship this past weekend by going undefeated in the three day tournament in Buffalo, NY. The tournament was sponsored by Mikasa Sportsgear. U.S. Olympic Volleyball Assistant Coach Gary Sato was present to recruit players for the national team and to hand out all of the awards during the closing ceremonies.

The Division II tournament consisted of 24 teams. In this tournament, "Division II" included smaller NCAA Division I schools and all NCAA Division II and III schools. Since all of the schools at the tournament do not have men's varsity volleyball, they are represented by their top volleyball athletes. Ben Jarosz '94 won the National Division II Most Valuable Player Award while Chris Dycka '93 and Mike Lutz '94 garnered National Division II All-American status. However, the only story of the weekend was the relentless pursuit of the national title exhibited by the entire Bucknell team, and the craftiness of head coach Musselman.

The tournament consisted primarily of a round-robin format. Every match was a best of three affair with the third game being rally scoring (a point scored on every serve). The format was extremely fair but at the same time mentally grueling.

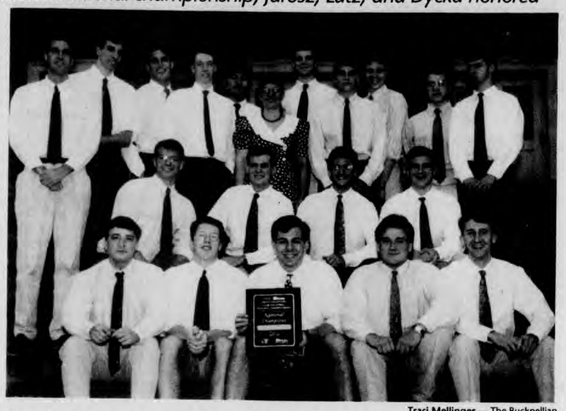
Through the first two rounds of the tournament, Bucknell conquered five teams, including Syracuse, Georgia Southern, Ithaca, Toledo and Scranton Universities. Brian Sell's '94 consistent passing, and Glenn Gesek's '94 consistent hitting and blocking at the net were two of the primary reasons for the Bison's unblemished record going into the quarter-finals as the second seeded team. At this point, Bucknell buried a small Robert Morris (PA) team 15-2, 15-1, and advanced to the semi-finals.

Bucknell next faced East Nazarene College (MA), who sported an undefeated record. East Nazarene started off aggressively with four digs in a row. Down 6-0, BU's Musselman called a time-out that changed the course of the match, and put the Bison on the road to the national championship. During this time-out, Martin pumped up his team with his tremendous enthusiasm.

"His intensity was what changed our attitudes," said outside hitter Steve Welkley '92 later. "He was the primary reason for us winning that match." Bucknell went on to completely frustrate East Nazarene, scoring 15 unanswered points, and winning 15-6, 15-8, to reach the National Final.

In the national championship match, Bucknell squared off against Niagara. The team was taller than the Bison had been used to, sporting a 6'8" middle blocker and two 6'5" outside hitters.

Welkley said later, "We were a little intimidated in warm-ups. The team was at least one notch better than the rest of the teams in our division. They had only lost one game all tournament long and it was obvious that they were the pre-game favorite."



Traci Mellinger — The Bucknellian

Niagara's intimidating pounding during warm-ups took its toll as the shell-shocked Bison were not mentally ready for such heavy artillery, and crumbled 15-6. Fortunately, Niagara underestimated Bucknell's tenacity.

In the second game, Niagara lost enough intensity to give the Bison the slight edge they needed to turn the momentum in their favor. The entire team proceeded to raise its level of play to new heights. Dycka and Sell dug almost every ball that came in their direction. Jarosz, Martin and Dice Nishii '94 were consistently cutting shots and hitting impossible angles, while Gesek's blocking dominated. The Bison, riding completely on adrenalin, hung tough with Niagara, eventually winning the game with a key dig by Dycka, and an impressive kill by Jarosz, 15-12. That play set up the final rally scoring game that would determine the national champions.

With Bucknell's bench and fans going crazy, the team its heart out and was never seriously challenged by the larger and stronger Eagles. The Bison never dropped the lead in Martin's and Welkley's final intercollegiate game.

Two key kills by Sell put the Bison ahead 13-7. From then on, Niagara was history as Bucknell triumphed 15-10 in what was by far the most memorable game in each player's career.

As the crowd cheered, tears of happiness formed in the eyes of Coach Musselman. She had been a great motivator and the primary driving force behind this team all season long. There have been times when the team was backed into a corner, but Musselman was always there to find the secret exit. From the team's perspective, she has done the coaching job of her life. The 1992 Bucknell men's volleyball team has proven once and for all that they are the number one Division II team in the nation.

Track prepares for league championships

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For those of us who are used to teams having at least two scored games per week, the outdoor track and field season can be difficult to follow. Eventhough their schedule calls for somesort of an invitational every weekend, the only meet that the coaches and athletes concentrate on is the Patriot League Championship the first weekend in May.

"We have a gameplan for each athlete that's designed to get him or her on track for conference," explained head coach Art Gulden. "In fact, the whole team never cxompetes together until the championship meet."

Gulden's gameplan has been to rest those athletes who are the least bit hurt or tired and enter those who are healthy in enough events to get the team ready for May. Most of the athletes have been running competitively all year, from cross country to indoor track to now without any significant breaks.

"We're not like basketball in the sense that we don't have three games or meets every week where we have to perform to win," said Gulden. "On the other hand, we run the whole year and if you were forced to run competitively that often it would put the kids in a coma."

Besides proper rest and preparation, it is essential to remain healthy come championships. "We use superior depth to beat other teams and that means having everyone healthy and ready to go," commented Gulden. Last year, both the men's and women's teams captured first place at the inaugural Patriot League Outdoor Track and Field Championships held here. "Some people were ailing going into that meet, but nobody seriously," said Gulden.

So far Gulden is pleased with his teams' progress, but did acknowledge some injuries that concern him, most noticably Blaine Fawcett '93. Fawcett, who scored in a number of events and was a key to last Spring's title, was injured during Spring football practice. When asked his condition, Gulden replied, "I don't know where he stands right now. We need him in three events."

Those who haven't had football practice and have remained healthy have posted impressive results. At the Wake Forest Invitational, the women's 4X200-meter relay team of Dana Harbst '93, Tricia Plasko '92, Audra Wilson '94, and Tameka Hinton '95 placed second in school record and top five regional fashion with a 1:43.6. The same four finished first in the 4X100-meter relay and qualified for ECAC's with a 48.5. Harbst and Hinton have since suffered minor injuries, but are expected to be ready fairly soon.

A number of the men have also turned in strong performances thus far. Jean Simon '94 ran a 50.09 in the 400-meter dash, good for eigth place on Bucknell's All-Time list. Tom Wuchenich '92 also broke into that list with a 9:08.7 in the 3000-meter steeplechase. Matt Deardorff '92 sneaked into the ten slot in the 10,000-meter run.

Today, the two teams will host Shippensburg at the stadium. Once again, Gulden de-emphasized the importance of winning the meet. Instead he merely said, "We're ready to run well and fast in some events. But, we're not going to kill anyone."

Less than two weeks from now is when all of the preparation and rest gets put to the test at the Patriot League Championships at Holy Cross.

Baring any more football practices, the squads should be ready to defend their titles against the familiar faces from Easton, the Bronx, and Bethlehem, as well as the first year participants from West Point.

Peter Ho — The Bucknellian

Blaine Fawcett '93, pictured here high jumping at last spring's Patriot League Outdoor Track and Field Championships held at Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium, suffered an unfortunate injury during spring football practice that could cost the men's track team some valuable points when they try to defend their title in May.

Bill Reisnyder '84 earns first-alternate spot on Olympic team

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The next time you're trying to think of the most pressure-packed event in sports consider the Olympic Track and Field Trials in which Bill Reifsnyder '84 placed fifth in the marathon this past weekend in Columbus, Ohio.

A 15-foot putt to win The Masters could have been avoided by doing better on one of the 71 earlier holes. A free throw in the waning seconds of a basketball game would be meaningless if one of the dozen plays you can recall off the top of your head were different. At these Olympic trials, it's as simple as one, two, three. That is, the first three people to cross the finish line are the three named to the United States Olympic Team. You train years for one race on one day. If you're not 100 percent for that race—tough.

Reifsnyder, a member of the Bucknell Athletic Hall of Fame, shared the lead for a portion of the race before being caught by the three eventual qualifiers. However, his performance earned him first alternate honors. In other words, should one of the top three runners be unable to make it to Barcelona this Summer, Reifsnyder would take his place.

Bucknell head track track and field coach Art Gulden, who watched Reifsnyder set numerous Bucknell records, believes that he stands a fairly good chance of taking someone's spot because one of the qualifiers has had knee trouble recently. When asked about the pressure and the system of choosing the team, Gulden said, "I think it's the only way to do it without being subjective. Yes, it's tough, but it's fair."

New policies mandate housing changes

BY SUZANNE W. O'NEILL
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Following the issuance of 1992-93 residence hall lottery numbers last Friday, the effects of an increase in the number of theme halls, sophomore rush, and the new off-campus living policy have students confused about their choices for living accommodations next year.

The Residence Hall Association approved 29 proposals for theme halls next year, according to RHA Advisor Kari Kuehl.

"Theme halls give students the opportunity to come up with something creative and to put some time and effort into their living/learning environment," said Kuehl.

In the proposals, each group must provide a description of its theme, its goals, and in what ways the group plans to contribute to the campus community.

Kuehl said she was greatly impressed with the scope of theme halls and the depth of the proposals. Some themes include environmental and women's issues, health and fitness, and academic athletics.

While some have contended that students propose theme halls simply to improve their rooming options, Kuehl believes this isn't usually the case, and the facts for next year support her claim.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

RHA Advisor Kari Kuehl says theme halls promote academic exchange between residents.

"I think that any time the students are inconvienced by the housing situation ... it is unfortunate, and shows that ... the implementation of sophomore rush still has a few kinks that need to be worked out."
—Jamie Diaferia '94
RHA President

A few theme halls have been placed in halls in Swartz where this year's singles are being converted to doubles next year.

Many students feel that they have been better off with their lottery number and are requesting they be dropped from the program.

According to Kuehl, there is no penalty for dropping out of the program and choosing a room using priority numbers.

Currently, most theme halls are located in Swartz, traditionally a sophomore dormitory in which the current singles were doubles before the Gateways were built.

There will also be one theme hall in Roberts, two in Trax, and one in Hunt Hall next year.

According to Gerald Commerford, assistant dean for housing, next year will be a "year of transition," and the University is left with very few choices.

Commerford believes most of the disruption stems from changes within the Greek system and the fact that a significantly lower number of people are living off-campus next year because fraternity houses must be filled.

As a result of requests from the Department of Modern Languages, one Gateway will be set aside next year to accommodate French students, giving them the opportunity to speak the language daily and improve their skills.

Commerford feels this program is similar to theme halls, providing an atmosphere which fosters academic exchange among residents.

Since sophomore rush has decreased the number of Greeks by 25 percent, sophomore students who would normally live in fraternity houses or sorority suites are now competing for rooms in University-owned residence halls.

RHA President Jamie Diaferia '94 recognizes that there are problems with the housing situation.

"I think that any time the students are being inconvenienced by the housing situation, as it seems they are, it is unfortunate, and shows that, to some degree, the implementation of sophomore rush still has a few kinks that need to be worked out."

With all this confusion, some aspects of housing will remain the same. Mods will be primarily for juniors and sophomores, and seniors will occupy the Gateways, with the exception of the one reserved for a new program.

According to Gerald Commerford, assistant dean for housing, next year will be a "year of transition," and the University is left with very few choices.

Faculty passes revised curriculum requirements for Arts and Sciences

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences voted to revise the curriculum requirements with the adoption of the Common Learning Agenda on Monday, marking only the second formal change in the Arts and Sciences curriculum in the past 22 years.

The faculty voted 90-5 in favor of the General Education Council's proposal in what was called "an amazing consensus" by Stephen Stamos, professor of international relations and chair of the faculty's Curriculum Committee.

Stamos stated that he was "amazed at the specific but low-level concerns" expressed during the meeting before the vote, as there were logistical questions raised concerning the proposal's implementation but "no questioning of the general proposal."

According to Elaine Garrett, associate professor of modern languages and chair of the General Education Council (GEC), "there was a dialogue" between some faculty members about the necessity of requiring a third natural science course, "yet there was never a formal motion to amend" the proposal. Stamos said that no major concerns were expressed about the Foundation Seminar, the Capstone Experience, or the "Broadened Perspectives for the 21st Century" requirements.

The faculty's decision came after three open faculty forums and after the Curriculum Committee voted unanimously on March 14 to recommend adoption of the GEC's proposal to the Arts and Sciences faculty. Although these new requirements will not affect any current Bucknell students, representatives from the GEC also met with members of the BSG's executive committee and with the full congress of the BSG to explain the proposal.

Garrett and two other members of the GEC addressed the BSG Congress Sunday, April 12 to present the Common Learning Agenda and to answer questions. According to Mike Thomas '94, president of BSG, the "general feeling was that Congress did support" the GEC's proposal. Susan Gedrick '94, chair of BSG's public affairs committee, stated that "there is a general consent that the core distribution requirements need to be changed."

Speaking for the executive committee of BSG, Thomas said that "we're in favor of the GEC's proposal" and there will be a motion presented to Congress supporting it at this Sunday's meeting. Unfortunately due to the Easter holiday, the motion could not be addressed before the faculty meeting occurred. Considering the proposal's passage, Garrett said "it would be good for BSG to endorse" the Common Learning Agenda at this point.

"there is a general consent that the core distribution requirements need to be changed."
—Susan Gedrick '94
BSG Public Affairs Chair

Garrett stated that "it was the time element" that made it difficult to have open forums to hear more student reaction. She said that "it was absolutely necessary that the faculty vote on this now" before the end of this semester.

Concerning the Board of Trustees, Garrett explained that the Common Learning Agenda "doesn't have to go the the Trustees for approval" as curricular revisions are not within their jurisdiction. However, the Trustees are currently aware of the proposal and Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs, will inform them of its status during the Trustees' weekend in May.

One of the next steps will be to appoint a Common Learning Coordinator to administer the new curricular requirements. This coordinator will report to the dean and will be assisted by the three associate Arts and Sciences deans, the Curriculum Committee, and the Faculty Advisory Committee on Teaching.

The Common Learning Agenda will be implemented in several stages over the next several years. The Class of '97 will be the first class that is required to enroll in a Foundation Seminar, taken either in the fall or spring semester of the first year. The Class of '97 will also be the first class to fulfill the expanded "Disciplinary Breadth" distribution requirement, which adds another natural science, mathematics, or computer science course to the current system.

The "Broadened Perspectives for the 21st Century" requirement encompasses two courses, one concerning technology, society, and the environment and one which would "address themes of human diversity either within or across national borders," according to the Common Learning Agenda. The Classes of '97 and '98 would only have to take one of these courses, and assuming adequate staffing and course offerings, both would be required starting with the Class of '99.

The incoming first-year students this fall will be the first students to take the senior Capstone Experience courses, which will be designed to tie together the students' academic career. This is also based on the assumption that enough courses will be offered which would meet this requirement, and implementation will be delayed if this is not the case.

Garrett called the passage of this curricular reform "astonishing" considering the number of attempts to revise the curriculum that have failed since 1970. However, she said that "in the last 22 years there have been a lot of new faculty" and "the students are not the same as they were then either."

Senior perspectives: abolishing the Jan Plan

BY MICHAEL MCLEAN

News Feature
Second in a series

The recent abolishment of the January plan and the uncertainty of its future have left most students, particularly seniors, with powerfully mixed emotions.

Last week, the faculty, by overwhelming majority, passed a motion that eliminated the present January program effective January 1994. Following this vote was the defeat of another motion that would have required students to partake in a Winter study program. This program was brought up and advocated by Associate Professor of Geography and Committee on Instruction Chair Ben Marsh. Under this proposal, students would have been required to participate in a minimum of two January projects during their four-year career at Bucknell.

Despite seeming apathy and lack of involvement in the whole January plan debate, seniors, veterans of four Bucknell Januaries, are concerned about the future of their soon-to-be alma mater.

Typifying the sentiments of the majority of seniors, Chris Mitchell '92, an international relations and Russian major, remarked, "I think it [the January plan] needed to be revised, but definitely not abolished altogether. The Jan plan could be very positive. It was never promoted effectively in my four years here." Mitchell's summation may explain why the level of student participation in January averaged only about 32 percent each year.

Similar to Mitchell, English and German major Amy Anderson '92, met the abolishment with mixed emotions. Anderson expressed how the discontinuation of the January plan would hurt those students who actually made good use of their time whether in studying or getting a job to make extra money. At the same, she admitted that it might be a good thing since many students do not use the extra time in a "worthwhile way."

In assessing the possible reasons that led to the demise of the January plan, Anderson responded, "Since the faculty never seemed to value it [the January Plan], how could you expect the students to value it? It would be interesting to compare the motivation of students and faculty as well as the success of the Jan plan from the time it was introduced in 1968 to the present. That comparison would reveal a lot about where things went wrong."

Emory Todd '92, an economics major, believes that the January plan failed in part due to the lack of diversity of courses offered, as well as the lack of the credit incentive. "I always thought it [the January plan] wasn't that good since most people never took it seriously. The

BSG passes motion to improve weight room

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Echoing concerns of the student body and the athletic department, the Bucknell Student Government recently passed a motion mandating the replacement and/or repair of the equipment and facilities in the Davis Gym annex.

The motion cites deteriorating equipment, poor maintenance, and crowded conditions as posing a safety threat to the University community, as well as preventing adequate opportunity for students, faculty, and staff to pursue physical fitness.

Tanie Miller '94, chair of the Student Affairs Committee, which authored the motion, says the document was constructed in response to heavy concern among students and staff that the weight room simply wasn't adequate.

Director of Athletics Rick Hartzell supports the BSG's initiative, and recognizes the insufficiency of the annex facilities.

"I fully support the motion," said Hartzell. "There's no question that the equipment is antiquated and the facilities are not what they should be."

While minor improvements have been made, and new equipment added, a lack of funding prevents a full overhaul of the area at this time.

"Funding for the annex weight room comes partially from the P.E. [physical education] budget and partially from capital expenditures. We currently get about $15,000 annually. Just to replace the nautilus equipment would cost anywhere from $70,000 to $80,000. We simply aren't getting the funds we need."

Strength coach Eric Thurston stresses that the Athletic Department is doing what it can to improve conditions and maintain the existing facilities.

"We are doing everything we can financially," said Thurston. "It's a small space for a lot of people and equipment. You can only put so much back there."

Addressing the issue of maintenance, Thurston said, "I inspect the equipment regularly, as do the checkers. We try and get equipment fixed soon after it is broken." Work on the machines is currently done through maintenance requests to the physical plant.

Hartzell added, "I go back there every day myself. Repair is done on an as-needed basis. Having weekly maintenance done on the equipment sometimes isn't needed."

The issue of safety is the prime concern of BSG, according to Miller.

"We understand that funding is difficult right now, but student safety should be a first priority."

Thurston acknowledged the danger of the conditions. "There's not doubt that it could be a safety hazard," said Thurston. "Conditions are crowded and that could be dangerous. I think that the people down there know what they are doing, and by working together they make it safe. We have had no reports of injuries due to faulty equipment."

Hartzell also noted that the stadium weight room and the annex weight room are funded

Task force explores options for campus programming

BY CATHY DARRUP AND TARA GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Last in a series

The task force devoted to discussing the philosophy behind campus programming has almost completed its job. Group collaboration and student involvement in program development head the committee's list of priorities.

The committees for examining the philosophies behind campus programming, the alcohol policy, and the judicial system are a result of an external review done in the division of Student Life. The three task forces are a result of recommendations made by the review board.

Gordon Meyer, assistant professor of management, cited several vital issues examined by the task force. In its final proposal, which will be presented to Shailor within a few weeks, the committee will likely address student involvement, group collaboration, and program education as three major issues.

To gain a better knowledge and understanding of a foundation for the restructured system to be built upon, the committee first identified the purpose of campus programming.

To catalyze the holistic development of a student, the committee decided, programming should help students understand cultures other than their own and educate students on values, ethical standards, and personal skills such as leadership, assertiveness and conflict resolution.

Programming should contribute to the development of a student's "compassion, civility, and sense of justice," according to the committee.

With the foundation and purpose of a programming system established, the committee then turned to the question of how programs should be initiated. The committee is clearly in favor of significant student participation involving a large cross-section of campus organizations.

"We think there ought to be better communication between the groups and within the campus," Meyer said, "so that the entire campus community could be involved."

The committee is also concerned about the "silent majority" of students who do not belong to any particular group but still want to offer suggestions for the programming system. Task force members believe that students should be educated with at least minimum knowledge of where to go for the resources to contribute to campus programming.

"The committee encourages more student-run and student-initiated programs," Meyer commented, "rather than having them run by the professional staff who may not be in touch with what students want, need, or are inclined to get involved in."

Additionally the committee calls for a collaboration of student groups and faculty.

Ideally, cooperation among campus organizations will result in an increased community awareness and interaction. Perspectives, energies, and resources can also be pooled and used more efficiently.

> Chair, Programming Committee

Discussing specific programming approaches, the committee suggests that organizations can tie their programming together by developing a certain theme or issue for a specified period of time to increase awareness and knowledge of a significant issue.

The final difficulty the committee identified was the means to coordinate these themes and programs. Its solution: develop a centralized calendaring system.

"Too often it happens that energy, money, and time are put into planning an event," Meyer said. "When too many events occur at the same time, he said, organizations can become frustrated by disappointing attendance because there are a lot of other events going on at the same time."

A centralized calendar system would not limit the diversity of programming; instead it would further encourage group interaction and cooperation to program events that would be welcomed by the entire campus community, said Meyer.

Assault investigation continues

Despite continuing efforts by the Office of Public Safety and the Lewisburg Police Department, authorities are no closer to apprehending a suspect in the April 20 assault of two female Bucknell students.

"These are very difficult cases," said Director of Security and Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio. According to incident reports, the two females were walking South on Third Street at 11:10 p.m. when an unknown white male "walked into the victim's line of travel and put his hands on her thighs and rubbed his hands up her sides to her mid-section."

The assailant fled north on Third Street when the students began shouting at him. Both students were unharmed in the incident. Searches by Public Safety Officers and Lewisburg Police Officers failed to locate the assailant.

The suspect is described as 5-foot 6-inch, 160-pound white male, aged 20-25 with short, dark, curly hair and a stocky build. He was last seen wearing an olive green baseball-type jersey with lettering on the back and blue jeans.

completely separately.

"The stadium facility is funded entirely by the football budget, and much of the equipment has been funded by donations from alum who are former football players," said Hartzell. "The nature of the equipment is different, too. It's important to realize that the cost of basic free weight equipment, like that in the stadium, is considerably less than nautilus-style equipment. We are definitely not favoring the stadium over the annex. They are entirely separate things."

Repair and replacement of weight equipment are part of the overall Davis Gym renovation proposal being submitted to the trustees in their May meeting. "We are hopeful that some of the items in our proposal will be approved for funding soon," said Hartzell.

JAN PLAN

university failed either by not offering credit for courses taken or not expanding and diversifying the offered programs."

Although having similar feelings to Todd's, psychology major Nancy Henry '92 sees the January plan as a potential maturing time for students. "Students are old enough to make decisions about how they spend their time. Making decisions on what to do with your time is a part of the learning process that comes with college." Henry alluded that if students wanted to waste time over January, then that should be their decision.

Most of the seniors interviewed claimed that the time they spent over January was worthwhile and essential for many reasons. Seniors expressed considerable concern about the loss of internships and jobs arising from the annulment of the January plan. As a contrary perspective to Marsh's claim that the January plan reduces the competitive edge students have in the summer job market due to the end-of-May finals schedule, many seniors see the time in January as an economic necessity.

Math major Suzanne Barry '92 has worked at home for the past four Januaries and offered this viewpoint concerning the repeal of the January program: "I needed all four Januaries of employment. During January, I was able to make the extra money that helped me get through the second semester. It would have been difficult to get through the second semester had I not had the opportunity to work."

In accord with the feelings of Barry is BSBA accounting major Greg Sullivan '92. "Not only is January a good time to make extra money for food and spring break, but it is also a time when many accounting firms are looking for interns due to the upcoming tax season." Sullivan felt that the abolishment of the January Plan would hinder students' opportunity for summer and future employment with accounting firms. "January internships in accounting often facilitate permanent job offers." Sullivan further supported the current January program remarking on how the extra time enables students to uninterruptedly pl: 1 for their future. "I needed this undistracted time to study for the GMATS. I'm sure students studying for the LSATs, MCATs and the GREs need and can use this time as well."

Wavering about the faculty's decision, Bill Farrell '92 a BSBA management major reflected on the legitimacies of both efforts to keep the January plan and to abolish it. Farrell, who travelled, worked, and studied in past Januaries offered support for and against the January plan saying, "I think it [the abolishment of the January plan] is a shame but I can understand the reasons given by the faculty. It was never really structured in a way that allowed it to be successful. However, from a personal perspective, if I didn't have the time over January, my senior thesis would have been much less ambitious. Further, my travelling and employment enabled me to learn in a different environment outside of the classroom."

In an economic light though, Farrell saw the January plan as wasteful due to the low participation of students and faculty. "It doesn't make real economic sense to heat and operate the university's buildings when less than half the faculty and students are present."

When asked if the Winter study program and its requirement would have any success in rectifying our unstructured January plan, most seniors did not think so. Almost all seniors agreed that if it were a requirement for students to spend two of four Januaries participating in the Winter Study program, then there should be the opportunity to augment credits toward graduation.

When questioned where he would like to see the future direction of the January plan go, Physics major Marc Raphael '92 remarked, "I would like to see the Jan plan as it is now but with the opportunity to get credit for the classes you take. This should go for professors too, since they are often as unmotivated as their students." Raphael addressed the Winter study program, saying it would set up the wrong type of atmosphere since there would be no credit incentive involved. He concluded that this type of program might coerce students to participate against their will, thus undermining the "right kind" of academic motivation. Concerning the current January plan, Raphael remarked, "It is a terrific opportunity for casual learning without the pressure of grades. The abolishment is a big mistake."

In reference to the Winter study program, economics major Rhonda Buford '92 had similar contentions as those offered by Raphael. "You shouldn't force students to participate in something that does not offer credit. The students are the ones paying for their education and likewise should have some freedom to decide what they want to do with their time over January." Buford further added that the Winter study program would discriminate against those students who need to work for extra money. She concluded that only if internships and outside jobs could satisfy the Winter study plan, it should be implemented.

Most seniors felt that they should have been included in the decision making process that led to the abolishment of the January plan. Representing a minority opinion was sociology major Lisa Gaetano '92. She felt that students should have had a voice in the decision process, but that it was their own fault they did not. "Students should have taken more of an interest in it. They knew the motion was going to be made and yet they remained apathetic. There was no effort and initiative to voice a student opinion."

A student voice seems irrelevant to most seniors now that the decision to abolish the January plan has been made. As one senior put it, "We must now wait for the next faculty meeting to see what will happen."

Capturing the view of many seniors, economics and political science major Reed Edwards '92 concluded, "I feel bad for incoming freshmen. The whole idea of the 'Bucknell experience' is slowly losing its meaning. Some of the best experiences we had were during January. It now seems that we are going through college with the faculty and administration holding our hand every step of the way."

Black students leave Olivet

After a set of demands presented by African-American students were not fully met by the college President on April 6, 90% of Olivet's black students left what they feel is a racially hostile campus.

The demands, presented in response to an incident between black and white students occuring in March, called for hiring minority faculty and administrators and a new multi-cultural academic requirement and administrative post.

Of the 750 students at Olivet, 40 are black. Olivet has no black administrators or faculty members.

Henry Henderson, president of The Elite, a predominantly black fraternity, said, "The problem is not between the white and black student body, it's with the administration. They've shown a lack of sincerity. We've come to question our value to the college and our value to the administration."

Feminism debated at Skidmore

On March 31, 1992 conservative lawyer Phyllis Schlafly and former president of the National Organization for Women Karen DeCrow debated "Is the Feminist Movement Enhancing or Destroying the Fabric of American Society?"

Schlafly has made herself famous rejecting the feminist movement and promoting conservative values based on the family.

Schlafly said, "Women's studies courses are propaganda. Your're wasting your tuition dollars and then you're surprised when you can't get a job."

DeCrow rebutted by presenting the other side of the issue. DeCrow emphasized equality, not the "anti-male" ideas Schlafly attributes to feminism. DeCrow says, "If nothing else, the feminist movement was a great success because it got Phyllis out of the kitchen and into the public arena."

Mitchell witnesses Ukraine's freedom

Senior waited in line for food and an exit pass while the Soviet Union collapsed around him.

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"I had the euphoria of being abroad. Coming back to Bucknell where everyone is young, rich, and smart is not easy. I'm just another college student who has to buy ramen noodles," Chris Mitchell '92 commented about his four-month experience in the Ukrainian capital of Kiev.

An added bonus to the time Mitchell spent abroad was being able to witness the end of the Cold War and the beginning of a new era. He was in Kiev during the time in which the former Soviet republic voted itself independent from the U.S.S.R. Though the Ukrainian leadership had decided to declare independence before Mitchell arrived, the historical event did not become official until December 1.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Chris Michell '92 was spending the semester abroad in the Soviet Union when the Ukraine officially declared independence.

Despite the call for changes, Mitchell saw little evidence of social reforms. "People were free to complain, but special visas were still required to travel from town to town, and the day-to-day bureaucracy was the same," said Mitchell. Mitchell also noticed the underlying fears of Ukrainians as a cause for slow change. "People were scared about changing employment opportunities. They were taught that capitalism means competition, a social factor they are not accustomed to," he said. People were also concerned about the rise in crime. They feared that the existence of a capitalistic system would mean a drastic rise in street and violent crime.

The most visible evidence of the lack of social reforms were the long lines of people waiting for food, clothing, and other basic staples. Mitchell's toughest transition was having to stand in those lines for hours just for one meal. "It takes one to two hours just to find the food for a meal. People carry around net bags in case they run across a good buy, because they are always looking for food," Mitchell says.

Mitchell's worst memory of those lines was his departure from the Soviet republics. He was forced to wait in a line of 400 to 500 people for two days and two nights in order to board a train. Aside from standing for almost the entire time, Mitchell saw several fights between people waiting to get out of the country. Fortunately, a sympathetic Ukrainian grandmother helped Mitchell through the ordeal. "She saved me with fatback and vodka," he laughed.

It would seem that the Ukranians would be hardened by their increasingly harsh economic and political conditions of their new republic. Mitchell observed quite the opposite, saying, "People are very friendly, and they like America. They are genuinely concerned about each other. If I walked out in the cold without a hat or scarf, several grandmothers would offer me theirs." Generosity and kindness were two features that Mitchell, during his stay in the Ukraine, learned to appreciate and admire about the people. Unfortunately, upon his return to school, Mitchell noted, "You don't see the Soviet attitude of sharing at Bucknell."

As for his future plans, Mitchell, an international relations and Russian major, would like to go back to Russia or the Ukraine to start an American/Soviet joint business venture. He noted that the countries lack several seemingly ordinary businesses, namely bars and good restaurants. Mitchell hopes to form a type of international trade that would bring these services to the Ukraine and other Eastern bloc countries. "The people scrounge for what we don't give a second thought to. They need everything — things we take for granted," said Mitchell.

What the Health is Going on?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI

Colin Bridgewater—The Bucknellian

Baking soda is a good substitue for chlorine when a stain remover is needed. It, unlike chlorine, will not irritate your eyes or skin. Aerosol spray odor removers cover up nasty smells, but also pollute the air and irritate our lungs. Baking soda is a good substitue for air fresheners also.

What causes indoor air pollution

"Air pollution can be a problem where you least expect it, in the place you may have thought was the safest in your home," according to the Consumer Safety Commission and the American Lung Association. In agreement with these two organizations is the Environmental Protection Agency; all three state that the air indoors is often more polluted than the air outdoors. And since most people spend 90 percent or more indoors, the risk to people's health is great.

Many household products are the source of indoor air pollution; among the most common are aerosol spray products, chlorine bleach, paint, shoe polishes, hobby materials, and many household cleaners. Aerosols release particles which, when inhaled, are absorbed into the bloodstream. Some adverse health affects are nausea, shortness of breath, eye and throat irritation, skin rashes, burns, liver damage, and heart problems. However, they can be replaced with pump sprays, which are also more economical. Chlorine bleaches are known to irritate skin and eyes. They also give off fumes which are just as irritating. Chlorine bleaches should not be made more concentrated by mixing them with substances such as ammonia or vinegar because these mixtures emit gases which are harmful if not deadly. As an alternative, there are non-chloride available on the market, or you can make your own cleaning solution by mixing baking soda and water. Certain paint products also irritate the eyes, skin and lungs, and cause nausea, headaches, respiratory problems, muscle weakness, and liver and kidney damage. To lessen the chances of harmful effects, make sure there is adequate ventilation and try to use water-soluble paints. In addition, many shoe polishes contain chemicals which can cause cancer. Check labels to make sure that the polish you are using does not contain trichloroethylene, methylene chloride, or nitrobenzene.

Many common household cleaners are also the source of harmful chemicals. For example, oven cleaners contain lye and various other pollutants that can severely irritate and burn your eyes and skin. To reduce the chances of coming in contact with such cleaners, wipe your oven out after baking or clean it with a homemade solution of ammonia or baking soda dissolved in water. Furniture and floor polish contain chemicals that are also eye and skin irritants, some of which can cause photosensitization, or an increased sensitivity to light. Instead of using these polishes, soapy water is just as good for cleaning wood. Or, you can mix carnauba wax and mineral oil to make a polish. Air fresheners, aside from being irritants, can interfere with your sense of smell. Opening windows, setting out a dish of hot vinegar, using a bouquet of flowers, and putting a box of baking soda in the refrigerator are all good suggestions for eliminating room odors. Perhaps the most dangerous of household chemicals are spray fabric finishes, as they can cause severe eye damage. These chemicals cannot be washed out of the eyes through natural tearing, and are therefore a real danger.

Many hobby products, though may seem harmless, can actually contain very dangerous chemicals. For those interested in pottery, precautions must be taken to ensure that you don't inhale clay or rock dust, both of which cause respiratory problems. When working indoors, make sure you have a good dust mask, and proper ventilation. Some papier-mache contains asbestos, which is a carcinogen, and should be avoided. Metal working often involves the use of poisonous chemicals, so wearing goggles and gloves in a well-ventilated area is strongly advised. Glues and epoxy are commonly thought of as dangerous because many people have died from inhaling their fumes. For this reason, proper ventilation is again advised. The chemicals used to develop photographs are extremely dangerous. Not only do they cause skin, eye, and lung irritation, but they are also poisons that can burn or blind you. All the above-mentioned precautions should be taken; in addition, make sure that you store acids in nonmetal containers and never add water to an acid.

It is important to realize that in addition to all the direct solutions mentioned, there are other ways to rid your house of poor air quality. The first is source control, or the elimination of individual sources of pollutants. According to the Consumer Product Safety Commission, "In some cases, source control is also a more cost-efficient approach to protecting indoor air quality than increasing ventilation because increasing ventilation can increase energy costs." However, ventilation is still a good way to reduce indoor air pollution because it increases the amount of cleaner air coming in from the outside. Also, you might consider taking your hobby materials outside and working in the open air. This way, chemical pollutants are not accumulating in your home. A third option is buying an air cleaner, which are range from very basic and inexpensive models to more complex and therefore more expensive ones. Of all three solutions, source control is the most effective and the easiest to maintain. By simply not having these chemicals in your home you automatically reduce the chances for indoor air pollution and poor indoor air quality.

Clean Air Week is May 2nd through the 8th. For more information about indoor air quality contact the American Lung Association of Central Pennsylvania, 264 Market Street, Sunbury, PA 17801-3405, (717) 286-0611.

A Modern Butler

A three part short story
PART ONE: Proper Introductions

It was the Fall of '91 when Master Wildes took a liking to jumping out of the cloak room. He managed it easily enough, excusing himself early from supper with a dab of his napkin and a pollte excuse. He would offer a lanky shrug and an apologetic smile, his royal silver mustache tinged lavender from the beet juice, and a few bothersome strands of angel-hair pasta still clinging to his teeth. And when we moved into the drawing room we could quite easily hear him in there, giggling and snorting and shifting amongst the coat hangers. Sometimes he'd let loose with a muffled series of sneezes. Then, at exactly quarter to ten, he would come bursting out, flushed and sweaty and chuckling to himself. As he flung open the door, he was prone to calling out fruits, paying special attention to the more exotic sounding ones like mango or kumquat. Although, he would occasionally stray from this pattern, shouting the names of incarcerated childhood actresses, Shakespearean villains, or Central American political leaders. And then there were the times when he just said "boo." And so Silvermissy would faint and the rest of us would act surprised or horrified while Mrs. Wildes attempted a shriek or two. If the master was satisfied that he had succeeded in provoking a sincere sense of awe and wonder, he would join us and we could all go back to our drawings. If not, he would quickly divert our attention by staring beyond us while pointing and shouting, "Oh dear, look at that big bourgeois rebellion." And when we turned our backs he would dash back into the cloak room, chortling and gasping even louder than before. His employers (and mine as well) might have deemed all of this a regression, but my impression was that it was more a series of phases. Like those of a pre-pubescent child. Perhaps there was a pattern. In any case, it was because of Master Wilde's latest interest that we suspected nothing when the scratching noises emerged from the vaults. Not one of us presumed that a bugler would be captured that very night. Or that Silvermissy would correct her problem. Or that Mrs. Wildes would learn the truth about Churchill's gender. Or that Sparky would finally get bitten. Or that Irma would share her secret. Or that I, James The Butler, would fulfill my late father's singular ambition of marrying into a household and shedding the servants status.

Perhaps I am progressing ahead to quickly, though. I realize there are some who might consider my tale a tad unusual. And I certainly do not intend to shock or offend you, which would be impolite. Or cause you to laugh, which would be disrespectful. Or assert a theme and message, which would be tactless and rude. Just to make sure that none of this can occur I will start my story from the beginning, which is what all proper stories should do anyway.

It began one score and two years ago when I was summoned to a small locality in Pennsylvania for an interview with a company known only by its initials: C.B.A.Z.Y.

Mr. Bainbright and Mr. Northrung, two smartly dressed important looking young men with sharp goatees and thick cologne, began the meeting by declaring that only a few select members of the corporation actually knew what the letters stood for, and they were all sworn to secrecy under fear of losing special vending machine access privileges. So, therefore, if I wanted to start off my evaluation on the proper foot I should not inquire, hypothesize, or theorize about the nature of those five letters. Any attempt to do so would be deemed presumptuous and all employment considerations would immediately cease. Then one of them, I believe it was Northrung, leaned forward in his chair and positioned the lamp so that it shone more brightly into my eyes. "Now," he said softly. "Why don't you tell me everything you know about Mr. Ernest Wildes, before my partner here loses his temper and teaches you a lesson you'll never forget."

Well, at that point in my life, I knew absolutely nothing about Master Wildes. I remained silent until the other one (Bainbright?) took out a chalkboard and went to work. Two hours later, Bainbright discarded the periodic table along with the maps and charts and multiplication flash cards. He was satisfied that I was withholding nothing.

"He works for us and his family needs a butler. That's all you need to know. We'll pay you big money." He pulled from his wallet an oversized five dollar bill to make his point.

Yet my father had warned me against hasty employment acceptance, especially when the family in question had not been met or even seen. The mere fact that I was being solicited by an employer did not vouch for this 'Mr. Wilde's' status. I needed more information.

"Sir, may I inquire as to this Mr. Wilde's position in your company and the reasons you feel that he needs a butler."

"Maybe he's building a new bomb. Maybe he's working on a cure for diphtheria. Maybe he's building a bomb that cures diphtheria. Maybe he sweeps the floors. Maybe it's classified. Your job is to make sure he doesn't hurt himself. Keep things in order. You'll be his family's servant, audience, and friend. Nothing more, nothing less."

And yet however reckless and distasteful this may sound, there was something about those final words that intrigued me. Fascinated even. And that evening, I found myself in front of sprawling castle of a house, holding a small suitcase full of clothing and a large stack of references.

The Peace Corps calls you

BY ALISSA BLAND

"Peace Corps: the toughest job you'll ever love." It's a slogan that we are all familiar with, but is it true? Founded by President John F. Kennedy in 1961, the Peace Corps was designed to encourage smaller, underdeveloped nations to grow and expand. Volunteers must be at least eighteen years of age, and will spend two years of their lives in the Americas, Africa, Asia, the Pacific, or Central Europe.

James Rice, Director of Bucknell's Corporate and Foundation Relations, spent two years between undergraduate and graduate school teaching English and organizing teacher workshops in a small Korean village. He believes that the Peace Corps was an invaluable learning experience that helped him to mature and discover what he really wanted from life.

Sally Nyquist, biology department chair, spent two years in the Phillippines and helped to design a general science curriculum in conjunction with the Bureau of Public Schools. The program was written, tested, and rewritten in an attempt to find a curriculum that was truly appropriate for the time and place. She found the experience of teaching eight classes each day in rooms with no walls challenging, but highly rewarding. "It was one of the best choices that I've made," she said.

More than 14,000 applications were received for 3200 positions last year. Competition is stiff. Those with specialized training in the fields of agriculture, engineering, or health care are especially needed, although many applicants have bachelor degrees with no specialized training.

The Peace Corps offers a learning experience that cannot be obtained simply through travel. Volunteers will spend two years as a member of a village eating the same food, doing the same work, and earning the same wages as the natives. Despite this, Rice says "I think that I got more out of it than the Koreans did." He encourages Bucknell students to look into the possibility of the Peace Corps after graduation. It's a unique opportunity and experience.

Teach the Japanese English, earn $25,000

BY ROBIN STUTMAN

Want to spend some time in Japan without the high cost usually associated with such an adventure? U.S. college graduates are actually in demand to share their American cultural experiences with students and businesspeople who have the funds to learn English.

The Japan Exchange and Teaching Program (JET) is sponsored by the Japanese government and offers its participants 3.6 million yen for a one-year contract, a sum equivalent to more than $25,000. "Our wages permit participants to explore, experience, and enjoy Japan," says a JET coordinator with the Japan Information Center in New York City.

One can be assigned to a rural area, such as a picturesque town near Kyoto, the misty hills of Nikko, or perhaps a small hamlet close to the Pacific, where room and board are quite reasonable compared to Tokyo prices.

The goal of the JET program is to help internationalize Japan by promoting mutual understanding between many cultures of the world. The program is based upon intensifying foreign language education in Japan and upon promoting the locals' international contacts through fostering ties between Japanese youth and JET participants. These program objectives are achieved by offering young college graduates the opportunity to serve in local governments and public and private schools.

The five-year-old JET program invites its participants to Japan as representatives of their countries. Therefore it is desirable that applicants possess a positive attitude toward Japan and also have a sociable personality. Both positions available through the JET program—the Coordinator for International Relations (CIR), who engages in international activities, and the more popular Assistant English Teacher (AET), who engage in language instruction—require strong communication skills.

Applications are reviewed rigorously, and there are typically several interview steps. Strong references, attesting to teaching and public-speaking skills, leadership potential, and ability to work under pressure, are required. The Japanese culture emphasizes ritual and courtesy, so hard-driving "Type A's" probably will not qualify. The interview entails viewing enriching cultural videotapes of Japan seen through the eyes of a foreigner, followed by questions posed by three representatives from the JET program. These questions involve situation ethics and how one would react in the given situation.

The application process is extremely competitive. Of the many Bucknellians that applied for a position with JET this year, only eleven were accepted. Nancy Henry '92, who will leave for Japan this summer, believes "one must be flexible in this particular job." She is anxiously awaiting to be placed somewhere in Japan, but will not receive an assignment until late May. However, Henry, having studied two years of Japanese at Bucknell, is tremendously excited to join the JET staff and experience Japanese culture first-hand.

If you are interested in truly experiencing Japan, are flexible in nature, and open to where you might live next year, the JET program provides an option for a well-paid occupation following graduation.

Teach for America

BY LISA BAKER

Are you interested in teaching, but maybe do not have a teaching certificate? Consider, then, Teach for America. This national teaching corps is an organization which was founded by Wendy Kopp, a 1989 Princeton University graduate. It is a two-year program designed for well-educated people who want the challenging experience of bettering the educational sytem of America.

Teach For America trains college graduates and places them where they are really needed—in understaffed, impoverished rural and inner city schools. Trainees of this program understand that there are children in America who are not receiving the education that that they deserve. Successful applicants start with eight weeks of training and are then placed in different locations across the country.

An education major is not a necessary qualification. Graduates with majors in the liberal arts are welcomed. Math and science majors are especially needed. The program offers positions in both elementary and secondary education and teachers are paid between $14,000 and $29,000 per year.

Kristin Ehrgood '92, an international relations major at Bucknell, will work for Teach For America in a rural school system in Louisiana. "These kids deserve a quality education," she says. "The present educational system is not reaching all children of America. We want to make a difference."

Enter your first job at the managerial level

BY WAYNE FERBERT

Bucknellian Staff Writer

The chance to own and operate a business is often a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, but for some college students, the chance has evolved into reality through the creation of College Pro Painters. College Pro Painters offers franchises to qualified students, and these students, in effect, own and operate their own house painting business.

College Pro employs a long and exhausting interview process when deciding which students to offer franchises. Usually over fifteen students apply per franchise outlet, and sometimes franchise outlets go unfilled because College Pro cannot find even one qualified student. College Pro provides the training and support to effectively operate a painting company for an entire summer. An effective College Pro manager can make between eight and fifteen thousand dollars during the first summer of operation. This large monetary amount can be achieved due to College Pro's very market-oriented approach in fulfilling the public's painting needs.

The idea of owning and operating such a lucrative business may sound too good to be true, and it is unless you're the type to put invest long hours of hard work. The time commitment is strenuous and involves sacrificing one's free time during almost every spring weekend (to secure summer customers) and most of the summer. A typical summer day involves making paint runs at 7 a.m. and then filing paper work until 10 p.m. The investment in such a business is not entirely risk-free either. There is not an upfront franchise fee, but one is the sole proprietor of the business and must manage it well enough to make a profit—or suffer the losses personally. Of course, College Pro's 21 year history has enabled it to achieve a 95% success ratio among its managers. Bucknell has always been a strong feeder school for College Pro managers, foremen, and painters.

While it is too late to become a franchise owner for this upcoming summer, College Pro is currently hiring painters and foremen in every state on the East Coast. The most successful routes to becoming franchise owners is to be a painter or foreman first and then work one's way up the ladder. Anyone interested in applying for a position with College Pro Painters should contact Wayne Ferbert at 523–4374 or call 1-800-327-2468 and ask for extension 312.

Sample some good, clean country living

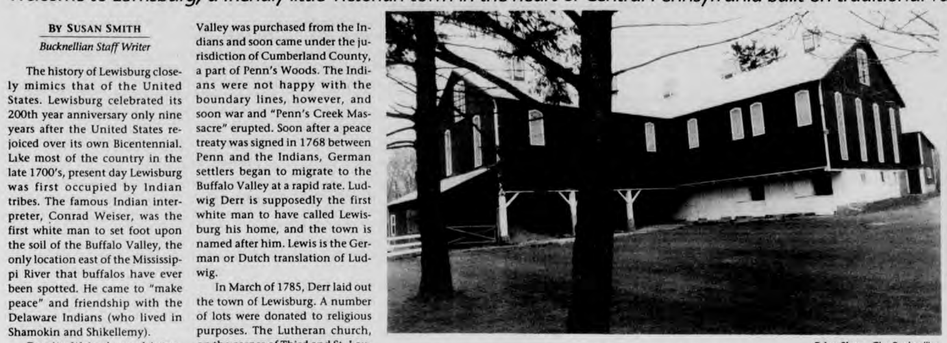
Welcome to Lewisburg, a friendly little Victorian town in the heart of Central Pennsylvania built on traditional values

BY SUSAN SMITH

Bucknellian Staff Writer

The history of Lewisburg closely mimics that of the United States. Lewisburg celebrated its 200th year anniversary only nine years after the United States rejoiced over its own Bicentennial. Like most of the country in the late 1700's, present day Lewisburg was first occupied by Indian tribes. The famous Indian interpreter, Conrad Weiser, was the first white man to set foot upon the soil of the Buffalo Valley, the only location east of the Mississippi River that buffalos have ever been spotted. He came to "make peace" and friendship with the Delawaare Indians (who lived in Shamokin and Shikellemy).

Despite Weiser's good intentions, bad relations soon developed between the white man and the Indians as settlers began to push their way westward. Buffalo Valley was purchased from the Indians and soon came under the jurisdiction of Cumberland County, a part of Penn's Woods. The Indians were not happy with the boundary lines, however, and soon war and "Penn's Creek Massacre" erupted. Soon after a peace treaty was signed in 1768 between Penn and the Indians, German settlers began to migrate to the Buffalo Valley at a rapid rate. Ludwig Derr is supposedly the first white man to have called Lewisburg his home, and the town is named after him. Lewis is the German or Dutch translation of Ludwig.



Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Malcolm Sinclair '52, decided to retire in Lewisburg and become a "gentleman farmer."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Bucknell University was founded by members of the Baptist church who wanted their sons and daughters to receive a higher education.

In March of 1785, Derr laid out the town of Lewisburg. A number of lots were donated to religious purposes. The Lutheran church, on the corner of Third and St. Louis, was the first to be constructed. For many years the service was preached only in German.

The town centered around St. Anthony, St. Mary, St. John, St. Louis, St. Catherine, St. George, Market, Water, First, Second, Third, Fourth, and Fifth streets. The town gravitated outwards towards the new gristmill and the University at Lewisburg as they were built and the community moved from being one of agriculture to one of railroading, milling, and academia.

The University at Lewisburg was opened in the basement of the Baptist church in the fall of 1846. It was established because the Baptists saw the need for a higher education of their sons and daughters. The University focused primarily upon a School of Theology, but contained other departments as well. The west wing of the University, now called Roberts Hall, was built in 1851 and was said to be "unsurpassed in pleasantness by those of any other University." University functions, such as the President's Reception and alumni reunions, were first held at the Lewisburg Hotel, then known as Kline's Hotel.

Today the University still claims to be one of the better looking ones in the nation and the town has been deemed historical and attracts hundreds of visitors each year with its colonial and Victorian charm.

More historical information about Lewisburg can be obtained at the Historical Society located in the Union County Courthouse on Market Street and through the Chamber of Commerce, also located on Market Street. Put on your walking shoes and take a walking tour of the town.

No one leaves Good Wil's with an empty stomach or wallet

"Mom" Landis runs her restaurant out of good will rather than for profit

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA

Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you happen to drive a couple of miles past the Lewisburg bridge on Route 45 East, you might notice an innocuous yellow sign with the words, "Good Wil's Restaurant" printed neatly in tiny black lettering on the right-hand side of the road. The sign, nearly obscured by a thick metal guard rail, does not feature bright flashing lights, nor does it say, "Billions and billions served" at the bottom. It is simply "Good Wil's Restaurant," a place to eat good country food for a good country price.

When walking through the door, the first thing that may strike you is the number of people that eat breakfast there every day. While many Bucknell students simply stagger in on Sunday mornings to the sight of a packed restaurant, it would amaze you to note that the same-sized crowds exist on a Monday morning. The owner of the restaurant is "Mom," a sweet, elderly woman with greying hair, who will always greet you with a genuinely pleasant smile. Anyone who has met her knows that this nickname suits her perfectly.

Susan Smith—The Bucknellian

Good Wil's is packed every morning with Mom's faithful customers.

Mary "Mom" Landis opened the restaurant in 1985 after she retired from her job of 27 years as a state employee for the treasurer's office in Harrisburg. "I retired and had nothing to do," she said. "I liked to bake, and I liked to cook, so I decided to open a little tea room." It started with five or six tables, she remarked, noting that it was about half of its present size. Business picked up rapidly, and Mom soon converted the small tea room into the present-day Good Wil's. The restaurant now operates on a grueling seven-day week, and is open from 5:30 a.m. until 8 p.m., Sunday through Thursday, and until 9 p.m. on Friday and Saturday.

Mom attributes her success to three important and unique factors. First, she cites her "old fashioned-type food, just like Grandma's." She does most of the cooking and all of the baking, and notes that all of the food is made fresh daily. Secondly, she says that the price is decent. "I don't make a large profit," she confessed. "I opened this place with the idea of keeping busy and having a place for the older people who are on a fixed income, and for the students. They can always come in here and have something to eat for a reasonable price." Good Wil's even offers a discount for the elderly two nights a week. Mom says, "I'm here to kind of cater to the people. If they say they don't have enough to eat, I get them more." Mom's third business philosophy is based on friendship. She says, "It's quite a meeting-place type thing, a friendship type thing." Any Bucknell student who has frequented Good Wil's on the weekends knows this, as it is virtually impossible to eat there without spotting a familiar face.

When asked if there are regular customers that appear daily, Mom pointed proudly to the counter that runs along the side wall. "Every day that counter is usually full," she said. "Men who probably lost their wives, or workers going to work or coming home from work." Alluding to the personal nature of the restaurant, she adds with a chuckle, "They all know me by Mom and call me by Mom. It's a tradition here. Without me they'd wonder, 'Where's Mom?'" Additionally, she remarked that of the twenty-two employees that work at Good Wil's, six have been employed with her since day one.

Throughout a conversation with the gentle proprietor, you will certainly get a sense that Mom is proud of the type of service her restaurant provides for the community. She continually stresses the differences between her food and that of other similar establishments, noting that the freshness of her food is what sets Good Wil's apart from the competition. When asked what type of delicacies most people order, she said, "I'm real famous for my sticky buns. I make a real nice sticky bun. Also, the ham pot pie, which is made from scratch, and the chicken waffles." While most people have never heard of "chicken waffles," it may strike you that this is the type of food that one simply cannot find at a Perkins, or an International House of Pancakes. In those two words, she had summed up what makes her restaurant so special.

While Good Wil's is certainly a unique and in Mom's words, "quaint," restaurant, the happiness she derives from her work seems to make her job something of a hobby rather than a chore. "I get up in the morning, and it's something I look forward to. When I come here, I meet people. And look what we have," she said, pausing to extend her arms out to her customers, as if to embrace them. "That's my life."

Why did you make Lewisburg your home?

BY SUSAN SMITH

Bucknellian Staff Writer

Many people are attracted to Lewisburg due to its Victorian charm. They like the three-globe lampposts and all the houses with their decorative gingerbread trim. Others like living in the country and relish the beautiful rolling hills. Because Lewisburg is a small, rural town, people know your name when you walk down Market Street or stop by one of the local establishments for lunch. Traffic isn't hurried and the lifestyle isn't fast-paced and frantic.

It is for this reason that many professors and students choose to attend Bucknell. Patricia Misciagno, assistant professor of political science, admits that it was easier to finish her doctorate thesis here than in suburban Connecticut. Liz Felter '92 says "I didn't want to be distracted by a city atmosphere." She thought that Lewisburg would provide a serene setting to study and enjoy college life.

Malcolm Sinclair '52 also enjoyed his college days in Lewisburg. He liked Bucknell and Lewisburg so much that he decided to retire here after 30 years of teaching and coaching on Long Island. To him Lewisburg has everything a retiree could want except for continual sunshine. He says that he and his wife enjoy Lewisburg because they live "right across the river from Bucknell and can watch all the social and sporting events." The Sinclairs bought a gentleman's farm with a few horses upon their return to Central Pennsylvania.

Good friends, lack of traffic, lovely scenery, and strong academics—these are what everyone comes seeking and finds when they arrive in good 'ol Louieburg.

Academic credit could save January

MANY FACULTY MEMBERS SAID THAT THEIR decision to kill the January Program was a painful one for them; they wanted to save the program, they insisted, if only there was some way they could...

They can. Professor John Peeler's motion offers a chance to resurrect the Jan Plan while addressing the concerns about faculty and student participation. "Academic credit," Peeler said, "is the basic currency of our curriculum," and he is right; adding academic credit to the Jan Plan can only enhance it while addressing most of the concerns of all the groups involved:

• Bucknell's Board of Trustees and the Middle State Association of Colleges and Schools, the body which certifies the University, both expressed serious concerns about the academic rigor of Jan Plan programs. Adding academic credit should solve these problems.

• Faculty will still be able to choose whether to participate in the January Program, but those who do will have their efforts recognized. Like students, they will receive course credit, which they can use to lighten their course load during the normal academic year. More importantly, those faculty members who want time to do research can save those credits to use toward a semester off, parlaying what would be a few weeks of research time each year into a semester-long opportunity for extended, in-depth study.

• Students will still be able to get the same benefits from the program, as well as the added feature of up to one course credit. They will gain greater flexibility in their scheduling by being able to add credits, and the program will still be voluntary for them. Gaining course credit also gives these experiences greater legitimacy outside the Bucknell community, as employers and graduate schools will see that January courses are indeed a legitimate, valuable part of a Bucknell education.

There is only one flaw in the Peeler motion. The additional tuition charge seems logical at first glance, but brings potential problems. The January Program will continue to provide needed, beneficial programs, and will offer unique opportunities for types of study not available during the school year. Making students pay more for this privilege will discriminate against those students who cannot afford the added costs, and some Bucknell students will get a better education than others, based on their ability to pay for it. January courses should be included in the regular tuition. Currently, students who choose to take three, four or five courses each semester all pay the same amount; there is no reason why adding the option for another credit during January should be on a pay-as-you-go basis. This will also eliminate the ability to offer additional compensation to faculty for teaching in January, but the opportunity to acquire course credits should be enough of an incentive.

ADMINISTRATORS HAVE BEEN TRYING FOR SOME time to fight the perception that January is not a "real" part of the academic year, as this perception is the root of many of the problems with the current Jan Plan.

If faculty members are sincere in their desire to keep the January program, then they should support the Peeler motion. All of the Jan Plan's benefits would remain intact. The program would remain voluntary and flexible for both faculty and students, both groups would be rewarded for their extra efforts, and the concerns of faculty and administrators would be addressed. Most importantly, the motion would save a program which is valuable to the University.

Faculty members should also remember that the students are watching this time.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

'What is Security doing with its time?'

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing this letter to reflect upon the absolute disgust I have for the security that works at Bucknell. I am a sophomore, and I have had enough encounters with security to know that there is something wrong with the structure in which they work. My list of complaints is too long to become too detailed, but the frustration I feel is clear.

First of all, I know that it is not the fault of security that there are not enough parking spaces on the Bucknell campus to accommodate all the cars, but I think they should see that ticketing cars in the Swartz parking lot when there is a performance at the Weis center or a football game is a waste of time, both for the security guards and the people that will be in the office appealing the ticket.

Secondly, I have registered my car at the office of security, thinking that perhaps in paying them $25 at the beginning of the year will obviously not guarantee me a space in the limited spots (how could I be so optimistic), but at least protect my car from the possibility of vandalism. I was wrong in this supposition also. This year alone I have had one of my license plates stolen as well as my roof racks. I don't know why anyone would want either of these articles but they took them, assuring me that security is in no way protecting my vehicle, either.

I also registered my bike at the beginning of the year, for some reason thinking that this little act might be a way to protect it. I was wrong there also. I left my bike in the shelter that was appointed to me, locked. One day, when I went out to ride it it found that it was missing a wheel. Unfortunately for me, the person who took it was not a very good bike thief so he took some time to do some serious damage to it in the effort to get it off. So what is security doing in their twenty-four hour a day job at Bucknell?

I have experienced trouble in trying to convince them to drive girls uphill to their dorm from downhill apartments late at night. I have called them, trying to get them to drive friends that are too drunk to drive and heard them refuse, which to me almost encourages drunk driving. Again I ask, what is security doing?

Oh, now I remember what security is doing on those nights when I thought they might be doing some rounds in the parking lots or possibly helping out students. They have been walking the halls of dormitories, yelling at students at two-thirty in the morning to move their bicycles from the hallway to the oh-so-safe shelter outside. Either that or they are going to parties, trying to get people to leave or to stop drinking, both of which they must know will never happen. I was actually in a car one night that was pulled over on a reckless driving charge and there were five security cars to help out — thank God — at least we can be assured that they will be around when we need them most. I think that it should be clear to these security officers why we have no respect for them; they don't seem to be doing anything worthwhile. I don't think that I have to explain why I am not going to pay my parking ticket that I got on one of those winter wonderful days when there was a performance in the Weis Center that left no parking in the Swartz lot or in the convenient stadium lot. I admit that I did park illegally on the grass, but I was next to other cars, and I was not causing any sort of disruption. When I went to move my car the next day my battery was dead, and by the time Buck's was there to save the day and tow it away to the shop I had gotten a ticket. I refuse to pay. Let my payment for that ticket come out of the money that I had to pay for the repair of my bike, the replacement of my roof racks and the trouble of replacing my license plates.

Student supports Jan Plan

TO THE EDITOR:

After reading last week's article on the faculty's decision to abolish the Jan Plan, I feel that this issue must be addressed and that the voice of the students must be heard. I have read the article and considered the arguments carefully, and yet I fail to see how this step can actually benefit the student body in general. I feel that in many ways this new policy will hurt a great many students and create a loophole in their education in the long run.

Speaking from personal experience, I think that the Jan Plan is extremely worthwhile. I participated in Jan Plans three of my four years at Bucknell. My only regret is that I couldn't do a fourth one as I needed to use that time to stay home and have surgery. Without Jan Plans, I would not have learned to use a computer to type papers or resumes. I would not have learned about sports medicine and eventually obtained a job as a student trainer with sports teams. I also wouldn't have had the opportunity to travel to the west coast with the Chapel Choir and perform for Bucknell alumni and other appreciative audiences, thereby helping to promote Bucknell's reputation and make it more visible at a time when the University is seeking to increase geographic diversity in the student body.

Lastly, I wouldn't have had the opportunity to do a month long internship at Geisinger Medical Center. During that time I received exposure to nearly every department of the hospital in hopes of finding out a bit more of what I am looking for in terms of a career. That month was absolutely invaluable for me as it not only helped me to make decisions for my future, but it also became a key point of my application essay for medical school and all of my subsequent interviews. Some may argue that I could do internships at home but there is no way that I could create, on my own, a program with that degree of diversity and at a hospital with a comparable reputation. The success of this venture is due to the affiliation Bucknell has with Geisinger and the devotion of professors and doctors alike.

I speak from the perspective of a premed student, but the same principle holds true for students in many disciplines. In order to obtain a competitive edge in the job market or graduate level education programs, students invariably need practical experience. Bucknell's Career Development Center is an excellent resource for students to find internships which have been set up through alumni or parents. January is an ideal time to offer these opportunities. Neither student nor "employer" is inconvenienced for very long by lack of pay or lengthy disruption of schedule. Forcing students to create or find existing internships in the summer can be a problem as summer is prime vacation time for most people. Also, my response to Professor Ben Marsh's idea [from Faculty abolishes Jan Plan effective '93-'94, The Bucknellian April 17, 1992] that students complain that an end-of-May finals schedule increases the difficulty of competing in the already highly competitive summer job market is that making students set aside time in the summer to do internships will not completely eliminate the problem of obtaining summer employment as most places hire for the whole summer. Starting late or ending early will still hurt their chances of being hired.

I applaud Professors Pusey and Baumwoll and others who were not mentioned for their support of the Jan Plan program. I am disappointed by the recent decision of the faculty body as a whole and I hope that in the near future more thought will be given to adding a May session or reinstating the Jan Plan.

Stolen statue is artistically worthy

TO THE EDITOR:

Frederick Franck is a major twentieth-century sculptor who has gained international recognition for his inventive use of metal in monumental outdoor works. His humanistic subjects are rooted in the earth, unlike the more conventional sculpture on pedestals which are removed from the lives and concerns of the viewers. Franck's geometric simplifications of the human form are part of the modernist tradition earlier in this century of Brancusi, Picasso, Nakian, and Giacommetti.

This act of vandalism to the Seven Generations is an act of violence to the entire Bucknell community.

Student worries about statue

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing this letter not only to The Bucknellian, but as an appeal to the entire Bucknell campus. Sometime this past weekend, part of the Seven Generations sculpture and its name plate were removed from the sacred ground on which it was recently dedicated. Through the support of President Sojka, Vice President Shinn, Center Gallery Director Robert Metzger, Professor of Religion Mary Evelyn Tucker, and a group of students, the sculpture was brought to this campus as a symbol of hope and respect for the generations to come. The Iroquois statement contained within the sculpture awakens us as humans to our role to take into consideration how our actions today will affect the generations to come. Now that part

America is failing at foreign policy hardball

BY ERIC LYON

Foreign policy is supposed to be George Bush's strong suit. After the Gulf War, Bush had an approval rating as high as Jimi Hendrix at Woodstock. According to conventional wisdom, Bush (and sidekick Baker) masterminded and crafted a unique coalition of nations, united in purpose and effort. Hogwash.

Let's put aside for now the ease with which nations unite during wartime. America's Gulf War success remains simply the fortune of circumstance. Our allies acted out of self-interest rather than out of a sense of community. With eyes lit up by dollar signs, Russia and Israel did our bidding. Turkey wanted a slot in the EC. Britain sent troops because they are obedient. Japan, embittered since the 1973 oil scare, gave us a big cheque and best wishes. Syria and Egypt, Iraq's eternal enemies, wanted a piece of the action because they wanted a piece of Iraq. Given those circumstances, perhaps the alliance was inevitable.

We shouldn't be too critical of Bush and his foreign policy. He is simply following a long tradition of dumb foreign policy based on bogus information gathered without using common sense. This tradition has its roots in the Vietnam War (where, incidentally, peace talks were halted over a disagreement on the size and shape of negotiation tables).

Let's take a look at some examples of American foreign policy in action (or in inaction):

• Soviet Union: Bush is torn over whether to extend diplomatic recognition to newly established nations in the former Soviet Union. But we shouldn't saddle all the blame on Bush. He is being advised by "intelligence officers" who couldn't predict the Soviet collapse in the first place. Not even scholars have any idea what will happen next. Further, if he formally recognizes Georgia, he ought to recognize South Ossetia (presently trying to secede from Georgia). What's next, South-Eastern Moscow declaring independence from South-Western Moscow? None of this matters, unless you are a map-maker.

• Latin America: This part of the world could teach the CIA a lesson or two about rigging elections. In Latin America, newspapers and policy makers try to predict and analyze elections using public opinion polls. It never occurred to many that in some of these countries, it is illegal for the general citizen to opine in favor of the opposition. Hence the newspapers often present an inaccurate picture of popular political consensus.

• China: Bush received heavy criticism for giving this country Most-Favored Nation (MFN) trading status after it crushed student protestors. Leftists argued that we put economic considerations over human rights. I agree. Let's be equitable in our criticism. Bush extended MFN status to China in order to thwart Japan. Ironically, the people who argue against MFN for China are the same people who want to erect trade barriers against Japan.

• Africa: For years Africans have starved. But in America, thanks to American pop culture and left-wingers, one might think that American foreign policy actually promotes starvation. Promotes starvation? In many parts of Africa, people are starved by their own governments who would rather fight petty civil wars than feed their populations. Famine-relief food lies rotting on the docks. If the US sends trucks to haul that food, chances are that the vehicles will be used in civil war efforts. By sending vehicles, America will actually be assisting authoritian regimes to starve Africans. Such a policy would give the perennial protesters something real to complain about.

Why does American foreign policy consistently ignore the obvious structural impediments to effective global politicking, and why is it so ineffective?

In large part, blame rests within our enormous foreign policy bureaucracy. The State Department, Defense Department, and White House National Security Staff (and the CIA, DIA, JCS, ACDA, and the NRO to spell a few) obey the FIRST LAW OF BUREAUCRACY: justify your existence and budget by inflating your output (regardless of quality).

Beltway Bound

By Michael Wardell

Remember the One-Puka-Puka

What's wrong with Japan-bashing? Japan is a neat little country with a super economy and a world-class constitution (courtesy of General MacArthur). Japan likes to trade with the United States. Sometimes they cheat; sometimes we cheat. Most of the time, we have good old-fashioned competition, punctuated by name-calling. Nothing to get upset about. It's when the yahoos start yelling at Japanese-Americans, our blood ought to boil.

Japanese-Americans have had a long and distinguished history in America. But after Pearl Harbor, thousands were rounded up and sent to relocation camps like the one at Tule Lake. On April 13, 1943, General DeWitt testified before a Congressional subcommittee: "They are a dangerous element. There is no way to determine their loyalty. It makes no difference whether he is an American citizen; theoretically he is still a Japanese, and you can't change him." Yet Japanese-Americans rose to the occasion and proved once and for all that they are truly loyal Americans.

Out of Tule Lake Relocation Camp came young Japanese men. Some were drafted; most were volunteers. They found a place in the segregated American Army of World War II. Together they formed the 100th Infantry Battalion (the "One-Puka-Puka"—Puka is Hawaiian for "Hole.") and the 442nd Regimental Combat Team. They were ready, willing, and able to fight hard for America (and fight hard they did).

Consider what it must have been like for these men: Their country had little faith in them. They were rounded up and herded into camps because of their race. Their families remained in those same camps. Their country was at war with their homeland. If America lost the war (and in 1942, that prospect was possible), they might have enjoyed privileged status under Imperial Japanese occupation. A betting man might have chosen to wait out the war.

They fought the Italians and Germans. If captured (and some were), they faced the prospect of interrogation by nations allied with Japan. By volunteering for combat, they risked imprisonment—in other words, they would go from one prison camp to another. Yet they volunteered by the hundreds.

In Italy and France, they fought alongside other American units. Trained in American fighting doctrine, they put to rest the myth that Japanese could fight only with banzai charges and kamikaze attacks. They fought some of the most heated battles of the European campaign, and their courage was legendary.

In Italy, the German Army prepared a strongpoint at the town of Cassino. Specially-picked German soldiers were determined to defend the position. General Mark Clark, commander of the Fifth Army, characterized the Battle for Cassino as "the most grueling, the most harrowing, and in one aspect the most tragic, of any phase of the war in Italy." In four successive waves, the Americans attacked Cassino. The 100th Battalion went in on the first and second waves. They fought on the same ground where, days earlier, one of the regiments from U.S. Army Thirty-sixth Division had been nearly wiped out. They fought against overwhelming odds. Months later, Major Kermit Hansen (U.S. Army Thirty-fourth Division) recalled, "The line never could have been broken by infantrymen. Every officer in the Thirty-fourth is convinced of that. It couldn't even have been broken by tanks." Yet the 100th, without tanks, played an essential role in breaking that line.

After more than a week of constant fighting, Cassino fell to the allies. But Cassino came at a tremendous cost, especially within the 100th Battalion. As a whole, the Battalion took more than 60 percent casualties. Company A suffered 85 percent casualties. Compant B lost 171 out of 187 men: 91 percent. Within the 5th Army and at home, the 100th was nicknamed "The Purple Heart Battalion."

STREET BEAT: How would you improve student and faculty relationships?

BY TRACI MELLINGER '95

JEN REEB '92
International Relations
"It is important to have faculty participation in outside student activities. The athletic dept's sideline program, where a faculty member attends a specific sport's practices and competition, should be expanded."

JONATHON EDWARDS '95

"I believe that student/faculty relations could be improved if more professors took time to get to know their students by name. Also, students should never be afraid to ask their professors for assistance."

KRISTIANA FARRIS '95
International Relations
"Student/faculty relationships benefit most from small recitation sections and classes. Through this more intimate environment, open discussion and interaction between students and faculty is most likely to propagate."

KEITH BURNS '92

"I think that student/faculty relationships could improve if there were more receptions/activities where students and faculty could interact. It is important for both to put an effort into interaction."

ALICIA GERMANI '92

Is liberalism back in saddle? Hardly!

The Road to the White House

BY JOHN SHIRE

"The big question for the 1992 election is whether the Democrats have overcome their timidity and have found a leader capable of exploiting the shift of public opinion toward a more activist government role to solve social and economic problems — or whether the incumbent President can ride that tide by presenting himself as the agent of change."

This concluding paragraph appeared in the Business section of The New York Times last Friday, April 17. The author, Leonard Silk, seems to believe that the nation is calling for liberal change, and that it has been calling for several years now. Mr. Silk cites a detailed analysis conducted by William Mayer, a political scientist at Northeastern University, that suggests the return of liberalism on a variety of issues including military spending, foreign relations with eastern Europe, taxes, domestic spending, and environmental protection; however, I believe that the evidence is weak. He states that, "In 1980, half the public agreed with the statement that 'the Government in Washington is getting too powerful for the good of the country and the individual person'. In 1988, only one-third felt that way." To begin, only one-third of what or who felt that way? I find it hard to believe that the question was initially put forth to the whole American public and half the public responded, then one-third of the public responded. It seems that Mr. Silk's evidence is twisting public opinion surveys. Further he states, "In 1980, a majority of Americans favored higher military spending; by 1988 only 15 percent did." Now is that 15 percent of the majority or 15 percent of the whole public? It really isn't too clear is it? Let's look further into the column. He cites further that implications for the 1992 election indicate that, "new democratic initiatives in such areas as education, day care and health care will receive a considerably more sympathetic reception than they would have 12 years ago." So what does this mean? To me, it suggests that if one out of every one thousand people were in favor of the democratic initiatives, then new evidence finds four out of every one thousand people in favor of democratic initiatives. Yes this is considerably more than the previous survey, but it sure isn't a whole h— of a lot. Is it? I acknowledge that I have made gross exaggerations, but only to prove a point. There may be evidence that truly suggests a shift to liberalism, yet Mr. Silk failed to use language and numbers that support it. When an individual seeks to persuade others to believe in a shift of trends, that individual really should have numbers to show how many people, out of how many, supported what specific issue. Without this the reader is left questioning the validity of the evidence.

Mr. Silk entitled his column, "Is Liberalism Back in Saddle?" Ironically, I believe his evidence suggests that the answer is no.

The 100th and 442nd emerged from the war with outstanding records. They endured German taunts on the radio: Axis Sally often asked if "the little brown soldiers" hadn't picked the wrong side to fight on. They experienced a disproportionately low incidence of shell-shock (veterans of the 100th chalk it up to their Yamato damashii, or Japanese spirit). They received more awards and medals than any other Battalion in the US Army (18,143 individual decorations for a unit of less than 4,500 soldiers). Never again would their loyalty or valor be called into question.

They received more awards and medals than any other Battalion in the US Army (18,143 individual decorations for a unit of less than 4,500 soldiers).

After the war, veterans from the 100th and 442nd returned to a grateful nation. They marched in Washington—the first overseas unit to receive a Presidential review. Some, like Cincinnatus of ancient Rome, went back into the fields. Others, like Spark Matsunaga and Daniel Inouye (minus an arm), went on to the U.S. Senate.

The One-Puka-Puka led by example. They inspired President Truman to proclaim, "You fought not only the enemy, you fought prejudice, and you have won." They earned the right to be called American, and the right to be called American heroes, and true American patriots. In 1944, the Des Moines Register rightly concluded: "We know plenty of folks that call themselves Americans that have done much less to prove they give a dang about their country."

This war between powerful organizations yields chaos. But every President has campaigned to end chaos (and therefore ought not hide behind the FIRST LAW).

American foreign policy is counter-productive because it lacks common sense, and pays too much attention to sovereignty. Simply by applying some good old-fashioned common sense and violating the sovereignty of our adversaries, I think American foreign policy could spread some goodness around the world.

Lets consider how hardball policy might have a beneficent effect on the CIS and Latin America.

•• CIS: Provide humanitarian aid only. Let their centralized economy crumble to the ground. The former Soviet Union could use a healthy dose of chaos. This is the best way to jar their idiotic faith in a centralized economy. Evidently standing in line all day staring at decaying buildings while waiting to purchase goods (that aren't even there) won't do it. Besides, the collapse is a cogent wake-up call to all the world's socialist upstarts.

•• Latin America: Let's go home. Pull out of all diplomatic involvement. Let United Fruit deal with them. This is what usually happens. When things go wrong, our government emerges blameless. Besides, the multi-nationals would never expose themselves to the potential of getting burned in a fair election. The 1990 Nicaraguan election was a race between a socialist home-wrecker and a capitalist challenger. We ought to have vigorously supported the sole savior of our little Latin American neighbor. Instead, we tried to guarantee "fairness." In other words, we tried to guarantee for Ortega one more try at ruining his country. The U.S. almost shot itself in the foot. United Fruit would never let that happen.

For Bush to be considered a true foreign policy master, he needs to exercise some common sense. If you get into bed with the dogs (such as China), you're bound to get some fleas. America ought to cut through the bureaucracy and act in its own self-interest (everyone else does). Let's stop standing around, bemoaning the unfairness of it all. Let's have a policy that puts us ahead of where we started. That's the best way to measure the success.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

IVCF explains the meaning of crucifixion

TO THE EDITOR:

Last Friday, at noon, uphill from the U.C., a group of Bucknell students re-enacted the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, offering a response to the question, "What's so good about Good Friday?" At first glance, the drama obviously did not portray a favorable event; in fact, many were shocked by the violence of the presentation. However, the scene simply depicted the real-life crucifixion of Jesus Christ. It is difficult for us to imagine what it would have been like to watch, let alone experience, the slicing blow of the whip or the agonizing death of the cross. The historical death of Jesus Christ was not a nice Easter-time story; it was a bloody, nauseating, inhumane execution. InterVarsity's attempt was to remind ourselves and fellow members of the Bucknell community of both the reality of the cross and its significance.

Yes, the cross of Jesus Christ was and is of tremendous significance. Jesus was certainly a great teacher and a great philosopher, but these have little to do with the purpose of his life on earth. Fully God, Jesus came to earth to die as the sacrifice for the sins of the world; this is what he said he would do and precisely what he did. The fact is, even though we were not the ones who spat in his face or pounded the nails into his wrists, the Bible tells us that, "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Romans 3:23). Therefore, it is you and I who are directly responsible for the death of Jesus Christ. For this reason, the drama that was performed should be not be brushed aside as someone else's brutality; it is all of ours. We must no longer cling to the self-destroying notion that we can each define truth according to our own fanciful beliefs and desires. Past Bucknell president John Howard Harris summed this up well when he said: "Pride of intellect is forever humbled at the cross of Christ, because while it is the function of intellect to recognize the truth, the intellect of man is so perverted by his egotistic will, that when the Truth appeared, the Truth was crucified."

So what is it that is so good about Good Friday? The good news is that Jesus did not undergo humiliation, torture, death, and the unfathomable wrath of the just and perfect God simply to make a religious statement. Furthermore, the story of Jesus does not end with his death. Jesus came to destroy death and to bring life (2 Timothy 1:10). Three days after he was placed in that tomb, on the day that is now called Easter, "God raised this Jesus to life" (Acts 2:32). His tomb is empty! His disciples did not steal his body, the authorities did not take it, and he was certainly not still alive when they put him in that rock-hewed grave. The fact that we are forced to recognize is that Jesus Christ rose from the dead, and thus only he has the authority to say: "I am the way and the truth and the life, no man comes to the Father but through me" (John 14:6). The risen Christ offers freedom from sin, death, meaninglessness, and eternal separation from our Creator (Isaiah 59:2), to all those who truly believe in him and submit to his wonderful will and purpose.

Our desire in presenting the drama was two-fold. We wanted to communicate to the Bucknell community the fact that whether we wish to admit it or not, the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ affects us all in an intensely personal way. Along with this, we wished to give every person on campus the opportunity to understand the significance of Good Friday—not just another day on the calendar, but a truly Great day.

STATUE From page 8

of the sculpture is missing, we must reevaluate our role in preserving that which will continue to have meaning seven generations from now.

I, as a student, had hoped to look at the sculpture as an indication of the changing of our times; a time when more respect is given not only to the environment, but also to our Native American brothers and sisters. The Iroquois are giving us a powerful message, to think before we act, and look at long-term consequences, not just what is beneficial to the here and now. Unfortunately, the consequences behind the disappearance of the sculpture lead me to wonder whether or not we are ever going to move away from short-term acts for our personal satisfaction. Should this piece of the sculpture not be returned, not only would present Bucknellians be unable to appreciate and meditate over the message the sculpture embodies, but future generations of Bucknellians will not be able to fully grasp what the sculpture signifies.

I was extremely saddened by the news that part of the sculpture and the description plate were removed, and not a trace was left as to what happened to it. What saddens me more is the thought that someone would deliberately want to remove a piece of artwork that holds special meaning for what is to come in the future. I understand that the sculpture does not hold the same meaning for everyone as it holds for me. However, I can only hope that whoever removed the artwork will have enough respect and appreciation for a fine work of art to return what belongs to its proper place. Any information as to the whereabouts of this sacred piece would be greatly appreciated. Above all, whoever is responsible for its disappearance, please return the sculpture, and respect the meaning that it holds.

Professor thinks that "Beltway" needs love

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to quote Michael Wardell, who is well known for his weekly column "Beltway Bound."

"Saving the planet is a daunting project—further complicated by 'caring types' who want to start in all the wrong places. The planet's problems (the real ones) will be fixed by hot-shot researchers, backed by large corporations, and funded by consumers like you and me. 'Caring' is not enough. Without wisdom and intelligence, 'caring' is simply the heart's victory over the brain. We need well-trained, well-funded scientists. But these people work for institutions the 'eco-warriors' generally despise."

All action and all paths are needed. In nature there is no superior/inferior work. All things have purpose and are intertwined and interdependent. We are the ones who create superiority/inferiority—through our own thought processes.

Mr. Wardell tells us "caring types" (we are going to do some categorizing aren't we) "want to start in all the wrong places." There are no wrong places to start. There are many paths towards healing and unity of spirit. We are not the ones who will "fix" anything. No "hot-shot" researcher backed by a large coroporation will "fix" the planet's problems. The planet is not lying on an operating table waiting for superior human wisdom to take care of its needs. The Powers of the Universe are indifferent to our human arrogance. Our egos, which seem so important to us, remain unnoticed by the Powers of the Universe and the Cosmic Mind. Humans play a very small part in the Cosmic Play. That is why hugging a tree, although a trivial act in Mr. Wardell's estimation, sensitizes a person to the energy of the soul. It humbles a person and it helps to remove subject/object duality. You can learn from all things. A stone, a tree, a speck of dust can teach you something if you want to learn and you are open to it. Loving is the only way we can proceed and expect to participate more fully in nature's cycles.

When you go off to begin your long career in business and government, Mike, spread some Love around. They really could use some. Don't try to sell it though, you won't make a lot of dough.

TKE offers reward for missing statue

TO THE EDITOR:

The brothers of Tau Kappa Epsilon have recently become very concerned about the missing pieces of the Seven Generations sculpture, and, consequently, are offering a two-hundred dollar reward for their return, no questions asked. Several members of the house are currently enrolled in Professor Grimm's religion class, and, through him, have come to understand the value and significance of the sculpture. The theft of these pieces has, in effect, neither proven, nor accomplished anything, and the belief that the stealing of these objects is equivalent to making a political statement of some kind is profoundly erroneous. For these reasons, we simply wish for the safe return of the remaining sculptures, either by contacting our president, Dan Hauck at 523-0532 to arrange for its return, or by leaving the pieces on TKE premises. The person who returns the missing objects will then be given the reward without any fear of punishment. We hope that this issue can be resolved as quickly and easily as possible.

Professor believes that faculty is concerned

TO THE EDITOR:

I'm pleased that in your April 17th editorial, "Bucknell gave up too soon on Jan Plan," you address an important issue. Yet I do wish you had been a bit less dismissive of the faculty for the attention it has given to the matter.

Just suppose that, in order to learn the fact of it, you had invested even a fraction of a second for every faculty hour devoted to considering, reconsidering, assessing, reassessing, discussing, and debating the educational efficacy of the January Program, including its possible relationship to the "Foundations for the Future" proposal. I'm thinking of committee work, faculty meetings, open forums, talk over coffee. In view of these you might see why it strikes me as rather thoughtless for you to write: "it seems that these proposals were given little, if any, consideration by the faculty."

In the next continuation of the April meeting of the faculty Mr. Peeler will introduce a substitute proposal for the Committee on Instruction's motion to institute a Winter Study program. (That motion was defeated at the April 13th faculty meeting.) Here is another indication that the faculty continues to devote serious attention to the issue.

Spring weekend hosts pair of a capella groups

So popular that the Terrace Room can no longer hold their Parents' Weekend crowds, The Bison Chips will perform in the Weis Center tonight at 8 p.m. Clockwise from top: Rick Cranford '92, Chris Williams '92, Craig Bitter '92, Eric Hodgson '94, Matthew Daumen '94, Joe LaFalce '95, Peter West '93, Brian Frutchey '95, and Bryan Gess '95.

Some Singers, a seven-member group of Chapel Choir Singers who wanted a chance to experiment with different musical styles, presents their a capella concert Saturday at 10 p.m. in the Bison. Bison Chips

BY BRIAN KING
Bucknellian Staff Writer

They are named after the excretions of a large, woolly animal which once roamed the plains of North America. Their new album is entitled Dare To Be Dung, and they're hosting an a capella concert called Chipfest. No, they are not Bush's staff advisors—they are the Bison Chips, and tonight they will be hosting the annual Chipfest, which will be held at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center.

This year's Chipfest should be an extremely special concert for a number of reasons. The Chips are losing several seniors, including pitchman Chris Williams. Except for the final Coffeehouse on May 13 and Graduation Weekend, Chipfest will be the final concert for the 1991-92 Bison Chips.

Williams looks back on this year with both fondness and fatigue. Five thousand miles of roadtripping to places such as Richmond, Haverford, and Baltimore, as well as the new album, mark this year as a special one. Williams remembers this year as "very productive" and "insane." With all the extra work that the Chips have done, Williams labels his final year as "the biggest year in my four years in terms of the Chips."

The long-awaited new album, Dare To Be Dung, will debut at Chipfest. Making the album was a time-consuming project; cutting it took over two months. Dung contains sixteen tracks, including a number of new songs ranging from More than Words to You Put This Love in My Heart and Uncle John's Band . The album will be available for purchase at tonight's concert.

Also featured in Chipfest will be the University of Pennsylvania Quaker Notes and the University of Richmond Octaves. Tickets for the concert are $3 in advance from a Chip and $5 at the door.

Some Singers

BY CHRIS BIRD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Do-wop, madrigals, barber shop, religious spirituals, and tunes from Sesame Street and The Little Mermaid, are all within the repertoire of Some Singers, a seven-man a capella group who will appear Saturday at 10 p.m. in the Bison.

Some Singers was founded in the spring of 1990 by Alex Bergmann '92 who wanted to form an a capella group that would sing both secular and religious music. Bergmann's founding philosophy was this: a group of men who wanted to unite in song and entertain others while having a great time. It was, essentially, to be a group of some singers.

Beginning with only three members, founded and managed by Bergmann, the group now includes Chris Szara '92, Jon McBurney '92, Brian Wilhour GR, Andrew Hoover '94, Ken Laurora '95, and Jason Spiegelman '95.

Aside from singing together every Sunday as a part of the Rooke Chapel Choir, Some Singers performed their own separate concert in Los Angeles during the West Coast Choir tour this past January. The group also performed during the a capella night at the Coffeehouse in the Bison last semester.

The septet has been invited to vocal invitationals around the country, but have been unable to attend due to their Sunday morning commitments with the Chapel Choir.

Tomorrow night's concert will consist of Some Singers, the Haverford–Bryn Mawr Looney Tunes, a co-ed, 12-member a capella group, and a special guest.

The concert at 10 p.m. in the Bison on Saturday will be free and offers a rare opportunity to catch this group performing outside of Sunday church services.

The next opportunity to see Some Singers will be at the Dance Company Performance May 8 and 9 in the Weis Center. The group will sing a piece commissioned by the Dance Company and written by Wilhour.

Music Department displays variety of talents in PRISM

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN

Perhaps the best way to describe the upcoming concert at the Weis Center on Saturday night is as a festival of music. The music groups of the Music Department will be performing in honor of Parents' Weekend festivities. These groups include the Rooke Chapel Choir, the concert chorale, the symphonic band, the wind ensemble, the Bucknell Opera Company, the Rooke Chapel Ringers, and the Bucknell Orchestra. The concert, entitled PRISM, is close to an hour of continuous music and has been an annual event at Bucknell since its premiere in 1989.

The concert, which is a cooperative effort on the part of several professors in the music department, was organized by Assistant Professor of Music William Kenny. "The concert is exciting," stated Kenny, "because it gets all of the major ensembles together—which is rare—and that is good because it gives parents and family members a chance to hear a variety of music." A concern of the faculty was the length of such a concert, as each of the groups would naturally want to present its best material. For this reason, the ensembles were limited to one selection each.

The works to be performed are as follows: Requiem Aeternam by John Rutter (chapel choir), The Hounds of Spring by Alfred Reed (symphonic band), Zigeunerleben by Robert Schumann (concert chorale), a scene from Hansel and Gretel by Engelbert Humperdinck (opera company), Folk Dances by Dmitri Shostakovich (wind ensemble), Reunir by William Payn (chapel ringers), and Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor by Otto Nicolai (orchestra).

The PRISM concert will mark the first Bucknell performances of Requiem Aeternam and Zigeunerleben. Both are beautiful yet contrasting selections. Reunir, which was recently performed by the Rooke Chapel Ringers during Sunday morning services in Rooke Chapel, was only published three weeks ago. Written by Associate Professor of Music William Payn, it was commissioned by the Capital City Community Ringers of Lansing, Michigan. The title of the piece, which is French for "to reunite," is "based on the concept of all faiths together in music. In laughter, trials, personal conflict, hard work, and dedicated effort, we bring music to our world, through the grace of God who loves us all."

Another concern of the faculty was for those students who will be required to perform in several of the ensembles during the concert. Some are members of two or three groups and will be running to change into the appropriate uniform and to get the proper music assembled. Kenny said, "The audience can have some fun seeing the participation of students in many ensembles running around to get ready for different groups." He did not feel that there would be insufficient time for each performer to be ready for each work, as there is time needed to reset the stage depending on which group is performing.

The PRISM concert is scheduled to begin promptly at 8:30 p.m. It is free of charge and open to the public on a first come, first serve basis.

Svard to perform new music

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Lois Svard, associate professor of music, will perform at the Weis Center at 8 p.m. on Wednesday, April 29. The evening's program, entitled Music for One and Two Pianos and Actress, features music that has been composed in the last two decades.

The first piece on Wednesday night's program is Guy Klucevsek's Monk's Intermezzo. Written in 1990, the work is an arrangement of I Want You (She's So Heavy), which is off the Beatles' Abbey Road album. Monk's Intermezzo was originally commissioned by Japanese pianist Aki Takahashi.

Andrew Frank's Piano Fantasy will be premiered in Wednesday night's concert. This piece was written for Svard in 1990 and is the fourth of Frank's works to be composed for her. Svard often commissions composers to write piano pieces for her to perform. "It is very exciting to work with living composers and to premiere something that no one has ever heard before," Svard commented.

The program's third number is the oldest and probably the most unusual of the evening's selections. Tom Johnson's Scene for Piano and Tape, composed in 1969, is a theatre piece that features Svard and Tom the Loudspeaker. "It's supposedly a piece for pianist and electronic tape, but the loudspeaker takes on an increasingly vocal role," Svard explained, adding, "The loudspeaker becomes a prima donna who wants to take over the performance." Svard does not usually perform theatre pieces, but she has always liked this one and thought that it would be an interesting addition to the program.

Following a brief intermission, Svard will be joined by Genevieve Lee, visiting assistant professor of music, for the final two pieces of the evening. David Lang's Orpheus Over and Under is a two-movement piece that was composed in 1989 and is based on the legend of Orpheus. The final piece in the concert is entitled Boolavogue. This three-movement work was written in 1981 by the late Cornelius Cardew.

Student conducts music forum

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Peter Hill '92, a bachelor of music candidate, will present a lecture on the dance music of Frederic Chopin onApr. 28 at 8 p.m. at Bucknell Hall. This lecture is free and open to the public.

Hill is this year's co-recipient of the Barbara Watson Grever Prize in music performance. Grever was a Bucknell graduate in music who was killed in a car accident. Upon her death, her parents established the prize as a memorial to their daughter. One of the conditions of the prize is that the recipients must give a lecture or recital (in addition to the senior recital that is required of music majors) or work on an extra musical project. Jennifer Walsh '92, who shares this year's prize with Hill, recently directed the Bucknell Opera Company's performance of a scene from Seymour Barab's A Game of Chance .

"The lecture should be pretty interesting," Hill stated. "There hasn't been a student lecture given for a long time." Hill added that he will "try to make the lecture more interesting than a class." During Tuesday night's lecture, Hill will perform and discuss four pieces by Chopin: Opus 17, #4 and Opus 59, #1, both of which are mazurkas in the key of A minor, Waltz in C Sharp Minor, Opus 64, #2, and Polonaise in C Sharp Minor, Opus 26, #1. Hill will speak about Polish history as well as the life of Chopin.

Opera Company sparkles in dynamic performance

The Bucknell Opera Company performed last Saturday night for a capacity crowd at Tustin Studio Theatre. Family, faculty, and friends alike turned out to watch the company in its final performance of the year.

First on the program was a scene from William Schuman's The Mighty Casey, an opera based on Ernest L. Thayer's poem Casey at the Bat. Shelley Gensel '95 gave a fine performance as Merry, Casey's girl.

Concert Review

The confrontation between Umpire Buttonheiser and the Mudville Manager, played by Alex Bergmann '92 and Jason Spiegelman '95, showcased the deep, powerful bass of Bergmann and the commanding attitude of Spiegelman, both newcomers to the opera company this semester. Eric Hodgson '94 provided just the right amount of cockiness as Fireball Snedeker, the winning pitcher. Peter Hill '92 had a silent role as Casey, the tragic hero of Thayer's poem. Eight-year-old Daniel Payn, the son of opera company director Catherine Payn, charmed the audience as an autograph-seeker who shows Casey the true meaning behind the game.

Nancy Henry '92, Rebecca Goldstein '93, and Shannon Morris '94 appeared as the three knitters whose wishes come true in Seymour Barab's A Game of Chance. Joined by Spiegelman as the Representative, the performers exhibited their acting as well as singing talents, especially at the opera's end, when the knitters are just as discontented as they were at the start.

Samuel Barber's A Hand of Bridge gave insight as to what people might really be thinking when they're seemingly immersed in a card game. Wendy Kreitler '93, as Sally, appeared to be unconcerned with the game as she sang of the "hat with peacock feathers" that she longed to buy. Brian Wilhour GR, as Sally's husband Bill, sang soulfully of his mistress as the cards were tossed onto the table. Lori Schoeneman '94 played Geraldine, a woman who fears her mother's impending death. Hodgson returned to the stage as David, a rather perverse businessman who sings of his frustrations, both business-oriented and sexual.

The four performers in Johann Strauss' Die Fledermaus are all to be recognized for their command of the Romantic opera. Melissa Funk '94 gave an excellent performance as Prince Orlofsky, who sings an aria that pokes fun at both Strauss and his famous opera. The part of Adele seemed to be written for Amy Anderson '94, whose beautiful soprano voice and acting abilities brought the character to life. John Caponegro '94 and Karen Losch '93, as Gabriel and Rosalinda von Eisenstein, performed a tenor-soprano duet that was both musically intricate and worthy of the performers' talents.

The final scene of the evening was from Engelbert Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel. Rebecca Lawson '95 and Jeanne Mellish '95 sang beautifully as the brother and sister duo. Both Lawson and Mellish were very convincing as scared children in the clutches of a child-eating witch, played flawlessly by Jennifer Walsh '92. Complete with a hunched back, black fingernails, and gray hair, Walsh moved across the stage with the creeping movements characteristic of witches while singing with a voice equally as impressive as her physical skills. A portion of this scene will be repeated in tomorrow night's PRISM concert at the Weis Center.

The opera company was accompanied in each scene by Bernard Kunkel on piano.

Men's lax beats Lehigh, falls to #15 PSU

After two of the season's most exciting games, Bison (6-5) host Colgate this weekend in their final home game of the year

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The emotional roller-coaster ride which has typified the 1992 men's lacrosse season continued this week. The Bison laxmen came from behind in dramatic fashion to down Patriot League foe Lehigh on Saturday, only to find themselves the victims of an equally dramatic Penn State come-from-behind victory on Wednesday.

Clearly still charged up from their win over Lehigh, the Bison (6-5) took the field on Wednesday and immediately attacked the 15th-ranked Nittany Lions (8-2). In what was quite possibly the team's finest quarter of play this season, the Bison wasted little time building a lead against their opponents, netting three goals in the first 15 minutes of play. This offensive effort was supported at the other end of the field by the defensive unit, anchored by goalie Colin Barker '94, which shut PSU out in the first quarter.

A rejuvenated, and perhaps a more focused Nittany Lion squad came out in the second quarter. Although Bucknell allowed State to fight to within one at 5-4, the team clung desperately to its lead. The furiously paced second quarter, which saw nine goals scored between the two teams, left the score 7-5 in favor of the Bison at halftime.

Knowing that its somewhat slim chance of making the NCAA tournament in May would be all but crushed with a loss to Bucknell, the Nittany Lions put in two solid quarters of play on both the defensive and offensive sides of the field in the second half. Bucknell had numerous scoring opportunities in the second half, but Penn State's outstanding netminder, J.J. Pearl rose to the occasion repeatedly denying Bison offensive threats.

With a good sized crowd cheering from the fieldside hill, Bucknell struggled to stay within striking distance of its opponent. Penn State took its first lead of the game in the third quarter when it fought to tie the score at eight, and later went ahead with the next goal. According to defensive midfielder Fran Casey '93, "It wasn't a case of our team giving up, I just think we started to run out of steam in the second half."

The Nittany Lions outscored the Bison 8-3 in the last 30 minutes of play enroute to a 13-10 win.

Following the game, defenseman Pat Hatcher '92 commented, "When you play a nationally-ranked team and lose in a close game, it's just that much tougher to deal with."

Assessing the team's disposition as a whole, Kevin Roth '92 said, "Everybody was down after the game, but we know our season is not over yet, and we have to stay focused on our remaining two games. We know we played a good game against Penn State."

Justin Zackey '94 led the way for the Bison on the offensive end of the field as he had a hand in six of the team's ten scores, tallying two goals and four assists. Roth lived up to his reputation as the team's top goal-scorer putting four more in for the Bison. Doug DePietro '92 had one and one, while Matt Comyns '92, Chris Pemberton '95, and defenseman Sean Krieg '94 each had goals.

"If we win the next two then our season record will be 8-5, and that will make our season one of the better ones in recent history."
— Kevin Roth '92

In many ways, the Lehigh game last Saturday was similar to the Penn State game, with one exception—Bucknell was on the winning end of that one. Although both teams traded goals in the first quarter, Lehigh managed to outscore the Bison in the second quarter to take a 5-4 halftime lead.

Just as Penn State dominated the second half of Wednesday's game, Bucknell played inspired lacrosse in the final 30 minutes, outscoring the Engineers 9-2. The scoreboard read 13-7 in favor of the Bison, raising their league record to 2-1, good for second-place behind Army.

Barker was clearly the most outstanding of all Bucknell performers, racking up a total of 20 saves in the Bison net.

Comyns had game-high scoring honors registering three goals and an assist. Four players had three points in this one—Zackey (one goal, two assists), Roth (three goals), Depietro (two goals, one assist), and Dan Snyder '93 (two goals, one assist). Junior attackman Todd Streelman added two goals to the Bison cause.

Bucknell will play its last home game of the season on Saturday against Colgate, and will conclude the season next week at Lafayette. According to Roth, "We will win those games if we keep playing like we have been the last few games." Although he did comment that the team would have liked to have been more successful this season, he said, "If we win the next two then our season record will be 8-5, and that will make our season one of the better ones in recent history."

Golf places fifth at League tourney

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell's golf team, which threatened to surprise Navy and finish in third place, slipped to fifth after the final round of the two-day three-round Patriot League Golf Championships held at West Point last weekend.

The host Cadets dominated the field, easily winning their second straight title. They shot a three-round total of 876, 34 shots ahead of runner-up Lehigh (910). Navy (929) finished third, followed by Colgate (936), Bucknell (946), Holy Cross (968), Fordham (982), and Lafayette (1041).

In finishing fifth, the Bison showed quite a bit of promise for such a young team, as Bucknell's six man team was comprised of one junior, three sophomores and two freshmen. In fact, the Bison enjoyed an outstanding opening day as three Bison recorded season-low rounds en route to a fourth-place showing—just three shots out of third after the first 36 holes. But after shooting 316–308 in the first two rounds, Bucknell slipped to 322 in the final round, allowing Colgate, which shot 300 on the final day, to pass the Bison for fourth place.

"I've been pleased with this team's progress all season long," said Head Coach Tommy Thompson. "We showed [in the opening two rounds] what we're capable of doing. Now we know that we need to close out with an equally solid final round to be more competitve."

Bucknell was paced by Doug Dollenberg '94 and Don Hansen '94 who each shot 76–75–80 for three-round totals of 231, good enough for 14th overall.

A major reason for Bucknell's early-round success was the play of David Fries '93, who shot his best round of the season. That second-round 73 tied for the second-best score in the entire round and is the best round by a Bucknell golfer this season. Mark Shafer '95 also broke 80 on the first day and finished with a 253 for the tourney.

Thompson's Puttin' Bison wasted no time in getting back out onto the links. Following an Easter Sunday break, the team travelled down Route 15 for the Susquehanna Invitational. Worried that his team might not be ready mentally after the grueling conference tournament, Thompson was mildly pleased with his team's 401 (this format counted the best of seven scorers from each school).

"I've said all along that we need to crack an 80 average for each golfer," commented Thompson. "But, after a long weekend at West Point, I'm not too disappointed."

While Thompson was taking six golfers to West Point last weekend, former Head Golf Coach Brad Tufts took five Bison with him to Clinton County Golf Club for the Lock Haven Invitational. Glenn Hertzberg '92 shot a team-best 77, second overall, to pace the Bison to first place honors. Fellow senior and team captain Mike Smigie '92 chipped in with an 82.

Tomorrow, the team will wrap its season up at the Princeton Invitational. Woth 12 of his 14 golfers returning, Thompson hopes that the many tournaments worth of experience that his team gained this season will transfer over to next spring. "I'm looking forward to it already," concluded Thompson.

Softball looks to end four–game skid

Lisa Fink '93 named Patriot League's Player of the Week; Colgate comes to Lewisburg

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's softball team has fallen on tough times of late, dropping four more last week, two to Patriot League rival Lehigh and two to UMBC. In the doubleheader at Bethlehem, the Bison were hampered by poor clean-up batting as they left 19 players on base.

In game one of that twin bill, Bucknell faced a quality pitcher in Lehigh's Meri Wall, who allowed only two earned runs while striking out four. The Bison met the challenge and came up strong at the plate, however, amassing 12 hits before falling to the Engineers 9-7.

In that game, co-captain Jen Yuengling '93 was unstoppable offensively. The junior batted a perfect three-for-three, was walked twice, and added an RBI to her accomplishments. Other multiple hitters included Ellen Gabriel '93 (two-for-four) and Devany Kerr '94 (two-for-four, one RBI), both of whom have been performing well in the batter's box for the Bison. Yuengling and Kerr both had successful stolen base attempts as well, marking a perfect record for both players—15-for-15 and four-for-four respectively. Kelly Corr '95 also added a double in the first game.

Game two was much the same story for the Bucknell women, who did not catch a break all day. The Bison again played solid softball but unfortunately came up on the short end of a 5-4 final score.

In the one-run battle, the bats of Lisa Fink '93, Carol Gesler '93, and Gabriel were hot, as each garnered two hits. Fink and Gabriel knocked in one RBI apiece, and Gabriel smashed out a double. Jill Spatzer '93 also helped out the Bucknell offense with a double.

Against UMBC, the Bison were hurt by the same poor defense that plagued them last week. This time around, 10 Bucknell errors led to identical 5-4 losses on the day.

The Bucknell women seemed to have the opener in hand, as they were leading 4-0 until the top of the seventh inning. In that inning,

Track falls to Ship, heads to Penn Relays

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"No team result really matters until Conference Championships" has been Head Women's and Men's Track and Field Coach Art Gulden's stand all season long. "All we want to do is stay healthy and prepare ourselves to do as well as we can when it counts."

Gulden seemed very pleased with the individual performances turned in thus far by his two squads as he headed off to the University of Pennsylvania's Franklin Field for the Penn Relays. Last Friday's meet with Shippensburg in Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium provided "the ultimate practice" for two teams two weeks away from defending their conference titles.

Despite coming up on the short end of both scores, both the women and men posted impressive results in several different events. Tricia Plasko '92 dominated the women's meet with first place finishes in the 100 and 200-meter dashes, as well as the 400-meter relay. Her time of 12.0 seconds in the former two events qualified her for ECAC Championships.

Julie Diercks '93 and Audra Wilson '94 finished second and third, respectively, in the 200. The two of them joined Plasko and Sharon Shilling '95 on the victorious relay team. Diercks also placed second in the 100. Gina Abraham '93 and Kristen Opdyke '93 combined for three firsts and a second place finish. Abraham won the 1500-meter run and placed second in the 800-meter run. Opdyke earned gold in the 3,000 and 5,000-meter runs.

Gulden's women jumped well also. Jenny Thomas '94, Wilson, and Ella Episcapo '92 recorded eighth through tenth best All-Time Bucknell marks in the long jump. Thomas and Episcapo entered the Bison record books in the triple jump.

Jim Bock '92 and Tom Eagleson '93 gathered four firsts for the Bison. Bock captured the 100 and 200-meter dashes, while Eagleson took first in the 800 and 1500-meter runs. Bucknell's 400-meter relay team qualified for the IC4A Championships with a time of 42.1 seconds.

Sam Bijelic '94 and Pete Gregory '93 took one and two, respectively, in the hammer throw. Bijelic's toss was good enough to crack Bucknell's top five list. Tom Wuchenich '92 continues to dominate the steeplechase with yet another first place finish ahead of teammates Judd Jarden '93 and John Lewis '93. John Plante '94 tied for sixth on the All-Time charts with his high jump of 6'4".

Almost as important as who finished where is who didn't run. Tameka Hinton '95 and Blaine Fawcett '93 sat out along with the majority of the strong distance contingant. Had this been a championship meet, Gulden would've employed their services, as well as pushed some of his other athletes.

"The only important thing is that we're as healthy as we've ever been and I've seen some encouraging results," said Gulden. "It's good to see that the freshmen's hard work and experience are beginning to show. By this point in the year they're almost sophomores."

This week the relay teams will compete at the prestigous Penn Relays in preparation for the upcoming Patriot League Championships.

Rollerblading glides onto campus

BY DOUG LLEWELLYN

Winter is behind us and the ice has melted, but the blades are still moving. I am talking about rollerblades and they are the trendiest new thing on Bucknell's campus. On a sunny day (which are few and far between in Lewisburg) it is hard not to see someone swooping by on rollerblades.

The sport of rollerblading is relatively new, but has been rapidly growing in the past couple of years. Rollerblades are very versatile and used for pure recreation as well as serious athletic training. Many professional athletic teams use rollerblades as an ideal cross-training tool. They are great for keeping fit, both cardiovascularly, and in terms of muscle tone in the legs and back.

Students here at Bucknell use rollerblades primarily to keep in shape, but many people use them recreationally as well. Kate Fink '93 says, "Rollerblades have opened up opportunities, beyond exercise, I did not even realize were there." On any given day you can see people blading all over campus and beyond. Rollerblading is commonly used as a substitute for jogging because it is much more of a low-impact sport and still offers a good workout. The ever-popular golf course jogging route is now becoming a track filled with rollerblades.

A new look to rollerblading on campus this spring is the sport of rollerblade hockey. Now that winter is behind us, the Seventh Street tennis courts have frequently turned into a rink for fast blading action. All one needs is a stick, a pair of blades, and the thirst for some good, or not so good, hockey. The talent of the players ranges from very experienced all the way to novices. The point is, everyone has a good time and it is a great way to improve your skating ability. Although there have been some problems competing for court time with the tennis players, the popularity of the sport is growing so much, perhaps a permanent place will be found in order to assure safe play.

If any of you have yet to try rollerblading, but would like to experiment, a great place to go is W.L: Donehower Sporting Goods on Market Street. They rent rollerblades for $3/hour which includes the skates and all of the protective gear needed for that first day on blades. If you are hooked after a few days of renting, Donehower also has a wide range of new models from which to choose. Prices range from about $150 all the way above the $300 mark. Once outfitted with a new pair of blades, you can use them for endless hours of fun.

Tennis prepares for title defense

BY JOHN BLUMBERGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell men's tennis team has been preparing all season for this weekend's Patriot League Tournament. Winning four out of the last six matches, the team will enter this weekend's tournament, to be held here at Bucknell, with its players at their peak in match performance and with a tremendous amount of confidence.

The team began to step up its play a notch when they faced Loyola College in mid-April. The match was very one-sided, with Bucknell winning 7-2. In singles competition, Cris Stenstrom '94, after winning his first set 6-2, and then losing the next 1-6, came through to win the match 6-3 in the third. Mark McGuire '95 dominated at second singles by winning his match 6-1, 6-2. At third and fourth singles, Andrew Cantor '92 and Chris Rimpel '93 both won decisively with a score of 6-3, 6-1. At fifth singles, Mike Price '95 pulled out a competitive three set match 6-3, 4-6, 6-3. Bucknell also won two out of its three doubles matches. Winning both its singles matches and its doubles matches, the team of Stenstrom-McGuire won 8-6, and Cantor-Rimpel won 8-3.

The team was equally as destructive against Patriot-league rival Fordham. Stenstrom played a commanding match at first singles, winning 6-3, 6-1. At second singles, McGuire played tough, winning 6-4, 7-5. Cantor displayed patience and intensity winning at third by a score of 7-6 (8-6), 6-3. Rimpel was equally as competitive, winning the fourth singles position 6-4, 6-4. Rick Zeoli '95, played a steady, concentrated match, winning it 7-6 (8-6), 7-5. With little surprise, the doubles team of Stenstrom-McGuire won 8-6, and the team of Cantor-Rimpel won 8-4. At this point in the season the team had a record of 5-5.

Bucknell faced University of Maryland-Baltimore County next, winning overall with a score of 5-4. Captain Cantor said this was an important match for the team since Bucknell's players lifted their games another notch, helping the team's confidence level entering the Patriot League Tournament this weekend. The only two Bison singles wins against UMBC were Stenstrom at first with a score of 7-6, 6-3, and Rimpel very decisively 6-1, 6-0. Bucknell had to win all of its doubles matches in order to be victorious, and it did just that. The team of Stenstrom-McGuire, who have been very dependable throughout the season, won 6-4, 7-6. Greg Downing '93 teamed up with Price to dominate their doubles match with a score of 6-1, 6-4. The match was left up to the team of Cantor-Rimpel.

Originally, they were up in the match 4-6, 6-2, 5-3. However, the retrievers quickly caught up to 5-5, and then went ahead 6-5. Bucknell fought hard and never gave up, once again tying the match at 6-6. With spectators and teammates on the sideline looking on, adding pressure to pull Bucknell through, the doubles team won an exhausting match with a final score of 7-6 (7-5) in the third. Cantor says it is a rare situation when the team is down 2-4, and then pulls it out by winning all of the doubles matches. Hopefully, the strength of Bucknell's doubles team will lead it to victories in this weekend's Patriot League Tournament. The team has really come together and hopes to have a good showing at this important competition.

Bucknell demolished Franklin and Marshall on Wednesday with an overall score of 8-1, bringing the team's record to 7-7. Stenstrom crushed his opponent at first 6-0, 6-1. McGuire was fearless at second singles, winning 6-1, 6-3. Cantor played a close match at third singles, winning it 3-6, 6-3, 6-3. Rimpel also faced some competition at fourth singles, winning his match 7-5, 4-6, 7-5. Zeoli had an extremely close match at sixth singles, coming out ahead with a score of 3-6, 7-5, 7-6 (8-6). In doubles competition, the team of Stenstrom-McGuire brought their overall record to 8-4, winning with a score of 8-3. The teams of Cantor-Rimpel and Price-Downing won 8-6.

Major League Preview: N.L. West

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

I was wondering a few days ago whether my N.L. West preview was going to be a difficult task or not. One one hand, this division is filled with good young teams whose rosters are filled with many excellent players of all ages. On the other hand, unless you stay up late to watch ESPN's Hotel California, you will rarely get to see all of the teams in this division. That means if my predictions are wrong, you may not even notice. After all, how many times in the last four years do you recall watching the San Diego Padres? What about the Houston Astros? That's what I thought.

For the first time in this series, I'm drastically going out on a limb as I am picking the San Francisco Giants (Yes, to finish first, smart aleck). Losing Kevin Mitchell means losing 25-40 homers a year, but there are many positives. The three pitchers they acquired from Seattle—Bill Swift, Mike Jackson, and Dave Burba—will all improve the Giants' pitching, which has been a weak spot recently. Mitchell's departure will make for a much happier clubhouse, as most of his former teammates despised him. Darren Lewis, his replacement, has an excellent eye and good speed, and will add excitement hitting in the leadoff spot. This team still has power in Will Clark, Matt Williams, and maybe Steve Decker, if he ever gets his head screwed on straight. If Robby Thompson can repeat his 1991 19-homer performance, and if rookie shortstop Royce Clayton is as good as he looks, the Giants will have the best infield in the league.

The Cincinnati Reds have traditionally been a tough team to figure out, especially in the Marge Schott era. Sometimes management turmoil gets in the way of the talent on the field, which is always very good, and prevents the Reds from having a good year. Injuries were the problem last year. Barry Larkin, Eric Davis, Jose Rijo, Norm Charlton, Glenn Braggs, and Bill Doran—all pretty good players—missed significant time last year. This year the Reds will struggle to stay healthy again, as Rob Dibble and Chris Sabo began the year on the Disabled List. However, there is a lot of good news to report from Cincinnati in 1992. The starting pitching is now awesome, maybe even as good as the Mets' staff of the late 1980s. Greg Swindell and Tim Belcher join Rijo, Tom Browning, and either Chris Hammond or Charlton in the rotation. The bullpen, assuming Dibble gets back soon, is not bad. Another newcomer, Bip Roberts, will hit leadoff, allowing Larkin to move back to the three-spot, where his talents will be better utilized.

Mitchell's departure will make for a much happier clubhouse, as most of his former teammates despised him.

The Atlanta Braves had a year that dreams are made of in 1991. But you must remember that this club is only two years removed from being the laughing stock of baseball. Traditionally bad teams that show sudden, drastic improvement will drop off some the following year. Look at the number of players that had career years last year: Terry Pendleton, Otis Nixon, Jeff Treadway, Greg Olson, and Jeff Blauser. These are guys who have always been marginal players, and will likely drop off a bit this year. However, this is still a great team. From top to bottom, the Braves have the best pitching in the division, and they still have Dave Justice, Ron Gant, Brian Hunter, and Mark Lemke (October only) to drive in runs.

A friend of mine told me that there is a baseball team called the San Diego Padres. Oh yeah, didn't they play in the World Series a few years ago? I'm just kidding, this team does exist and is actually pretty good. It's been eight years since Kurt Bevaqua and company got obliterated by the Tigers in the Series, and the Padres have never really threatened since then. This year they will be looking to improve their offense which had some bright spots last year, but also had several glaring weaknesses. Fred McGriff is one of the top five hitters in baseball. (Don't ask me who the other four are. There are about a dozen players who I'd like to put on this list.) Tony Gwynn is so good that if you could throw him a golf ball at 200 mph, he would still probably single to left. Darrin Jackson hit 21 homers last year, and he may improve on that. Gary Sheffield was picked up in a trade, and he will play third base. Last year Padre third sackers were absolutely pathetic. The starting pitching is excellent three out of every five days. Andy Benes went 11-1 in the second half of 1991. Bruce Hurst and Greg W. Harris were also solid. Randy Myers is the newest member of the bullpen, which was poor last year. Myers can be brilliant at times, and I think he will be this year. Last year he didn't really have a defined role with the Reds. Lou Piniella made Dibble his closer, leaving Myers in limbo. He even started at the end of the year. The Padres may improve even more if they can trade Benito Santiago, who is very overrated, for a good pitcher and a decent catcher.

What ever happened to the Dodger Blue? The Los Angeles Dodgers, who used to pride themselves on developing their own prospects who would always turn out to be stars, are now made up of high-priced free agents with egos as big as the houses they live in. Basically, this is the New York Yankees of 1992. The only difference is that manager Tommy Lasorda won't get fired. In fact, the Dodger organization may be trying to buy Lasorda one last pennant before he retires. If only Darryl Strawberry, Eric Davis, Kal Daniels, Tom Candiotti, and Juan Samuel cared. Brett Butler, a free agent who does care, is the best player on the team. It will be up to Butler and the home-grown boys—Ramon Martinez, Orel Hershiser, Mike Scioscia, and maybe Jose Offerman—to see to it that Lasorda goes out like he deserves—in style.

The Houston Astros will get to wear their road uniforms quite a bit this summer. Thanks to the Republican Convention taking over the Astrodome, Houston will spend more than a month on the road. Of course, it also means that they will play almost all home games in April and September. So if they can get off to a good start, finish well, and simply survive the road trip, the 'Stros may win a bunch of games. Last year, Houston decided to rebuild the organization, and their roster was filled with young players with little experience but big hearts. Those who thought they would be among the all-time worst teams were surprised to see that their season was not at all a disaster. They only won 65 games, but they learned that guys like Steve Finley, Jeff Bagwell, Luis Gonzales, Craig Biggio, and Adujar Cedeno have a lot of potential. Their pitchers, supported by the huge stadium, for the most part proved that they were not overmatched at the major league level. Pete Harnisch was dominating last year (opponents hit only .212 against him), and Darryl Kile, Al Osuna, and Jeff Juden had their moments.

Now I'll walk farther out on the plank and briefly tell you my postseason picks. In the American League, the Chicago/Toronto series will be a classic, with Jack Morris leading the Jays to a seven-game win. In the National League, Pittsburgh has been the victim of upsets by Cinderella teams the last two years, but it won't happen a third straight time. The Bucs will take the Giants in six. In the World Series, I think the Pirates will use their superior depth to knock off Toronto in six games.

One man's opinion on the NBA's second season

BY MIKE SWANSON

Yes, the NBA playoffs are here again and in the words of a famous cartoon cat, "Happy, Happy, Happy, Joy, Joy, Joy." I have heard rumors that the playoff season in the NBA will end early this year if Michael Jordan feels he needs extra rest for the sure-to-be-physically-draining Olympics this summer, with the Bulls being rewarded the crown again because Michael plays for Chicago. Watch for this possible occurrence. Actually, a shorter playoff season for the NBA would be fantastic because it would then free up more prime-time space on NBC for reruns of Matlock. As I'm sure you recall, I predicted the Bulls to win the championship last year, and they obviously did just that. Who will go all the way this year? Read on to find out one man's opinion.

EASTERN CONFERENCE FIRST ROUND

CHICAGO BULLS V. MIAMI HEAT:

This series should not even be played. The NBA would save a few thousand dollars on air fare if the Bulls were just given a bye to the second round and allow Miami their rightful place in the "Shaq" Sweepstakes. If Chicago doesn't sweep the series 3-0 and win every game by at least twenty points they should remove themselves from the race and allow the Heat to advance to next level. Miami has a better climate than Chicago and that's about it.

NEW YORK KNICKS V. DETROIT PISTONS:

My wish is for both teams to lose every game they play. However, since they play each other, I must grin and bear it and pick a winner. The Knicks should have won the Atlantic Division title, but the Celtics overtook them with a late charge. New York's confidence has to be shattered. Patrick Ewing should attempt to steal every pass intended for teammates Charles Oakley and Xavier McDaniel so those two never touch the ball. The Knicks would be a much better team in that situation.

The last game played between these teams was a high scoring 72–61 masterpiece with the Pistons on top. Expect five truly awful basketball games in this series with Detroit winning three and advancing to the second round.

BOSTON CELTICS V. INDIANA PACERS:

Last year Boston won a grueling five-game series with the Pacers. Larry Bird led the Celtics on the floor and not from the trainer's room, where he has spent the majority of this year. The Celts have played extremely well of late without Bird and have won about 40 games in a row over the last two weeks. Robert Parish and Kevin McHale have played as well as their Geritol tablets have allowed, which is pretty good.

Meanwhile, Indiana has had quite a disappointing year on the court, but if trash-talking were a sport only the Michigan Wolverines would outdue the Pacers. Indiana talks more than Geraldo Rivera. Against my better judgment, I am going to pick the Pacers to win this series for only one reason. I hate the Celtics. Boston is a better team and has the home-court advantage, but it's about time that the mystique of the Boston Garden be put to rest and the Pacers will tell everyone all about it.

CLEVELAND CAVALIERS V. NEW JERSEY NETS:

I could not drive the last time that New Jersey was a playoff participant, and Sam Bowie had only broken his right leg four times. I don't understand all the commotion about Derrick Coleman not listening to Coach Bill Fitch's instructions during a recent game because Coleman never listened to Jim Boeheim at Syracuse. Add the enigmatic Chris Morris and whining of rookie Kenny Anderson and it's amazing the Nets are in the NBA and not a preschool league.

As for the Cavs, they are an extremely solid club. The return of guard Mark Price makes them a serious contender for the title. The frontcourt of the amazing leaper Larry Nance and Brad "Don't call me Soft" Daugherty is exceptional and will lead Cleveland to a series victory over New Jersey in four games.

SECOND ROUND

CHICAGO V. DETROIT:

The only serious question that is posed in this series is how many times there will be fisticuffs. My best guess is five with Bill Laimbeer involved in three, Dennis Rodman in two, Scottie Pippen in two and Michael Jordan's ego in all of them. I can only hope that the fights will be closer than the actual games because the Bulls will win easily in four straight games.

Last year, the Pistons walked off the court after being beaten by the Bulls without even shaking the adversaries' hands. This year expect the Detroit players to leave after halftime of the fourth game and force Chicago to play against themselves in the second half.

CLEVELAND V. INDIANA:

Indiana's vocal chords and bodies will be worn out after the tense Boston series, making life difficult for them in the second round. Their only chance of beating Cleveland will be having to play New Jersey instead of Cleveland. This will not happen. Reggie Miller and Chuck Person are great scorers, but the Pacers are undermanned up front. The fuzzy foreigner duo of Detlef Schrempf and Rik Smits will be no match for the Cavs. Cleveland should win this series in six games and end Indiana's season with a whimper.

EASTERN CONFERENCE FINALS

CHICAGO V. CLEVELAND:

How many times has the highlight of Michael Jordan hitting a quadruple-pump last-second jumper against Cleveland to beat the Cavs been shown? Is countless millions too conservative an estimate? Relax, Bulls fans, this series will not rest on a last second jumper in the last game because it won't last that long. The Chicago juggernaut will dismantle Cleveland in five games, thereby ending all dreams of a Moses Malone-like three, four, four, four sweep.

WESTERN CONFERENCE FIRST ROUND

PORTLAND TRAIL BLAZERS V. LOS ANGELES LAKERS:

For about the past three or four years, every NBA "expert" in the world has been predicting great things for Portland, and every year those experts have been wrong. Granted, they had the second-best record in the league this year and feature the planet's best Non-Olympian in "Glide" Drexler, but is the supporting cast of championship caliber? First round, yes. Championship, no.

For all of you who just came back to Earth with the Russian cosmonaut last month, Magic Johnson attained the HIV virus and retired from the Lakers. Although the Lakers no longer have any magic, they still have pride. That and the play of guard Sedale Threatt and the hustling play of A.C. Green will allow them to push the Blazers to the brink of playoff elimination. However, Portland's talent and deeper bench will drown the Lakers in five games in the most exciting first-round series.

PHOENIX SUNS V. SAN ANTONIO SPURS:

Every year I pick the Suns to do extremely well in the playoffs and every year Tom Chambers' shooting percentage looks like a decent batting average and I look stupid. Not to worry, because this year Kevin Johnson and Dan Majerle won't pass the ball to Chambers and I'll look like the genius that my mod-mate truly is.

David Robinson is injured and isn't playing for the Spurs. This is the equivalent of not getting a parking ticket on campus. Life just is not the same. San Antonio will limp out in three straight games against Phoenix and await the arrival of the Shark to the underachieving waters of the Alamo.

GOLDEN STATE WARRIORS V. SEATTLE SUPER SONICS:

The Warriors are clearly the most pleasurable team to watch play if you are a fan of great offense, as evidenced by their league-leading points- per-game total. Add Tim Hardaway, Chris Mullin and Billy Owens plus the NBA's best coach in Don Nelson and the answer is a great season by the bay. Golden State is now a power and not just a curiosity in the basketball world.

When I think of Seattle (which I don't do often), I think of rain and Nirvana, not the Super Sonics. To their credit, the Sonics have improved tremendously under new coach George Karl and Shawn Kemp is a great player for someone who is younger than I am. However, Seattle just doesn't have enough weapons to keep with the Warriors and will lose in four games.

UTAH JAZZ V. LOS ANGELES CLIPPERS:

This is the most intriguing of the first-round series. Utah always chokes in the playoffs and the Clippers have never been in the playoffs to choke. Gerald Ford was President the last time the Clip Joint made the dance. But new Coach Larry Brown has the Clips playing great basketball at the right time, and they are ready to make the move to the big time. Not this year, though.

I have three reasons as to why I'm picking the Jazz to win the series in five tough games. Karl Malone, the NBA's best-home court record, and the fact that I saw them play live during my Spring Break skiing vacation.

SECOND ROUND

PORTLAND V. PHOENIX:

After reading what I have written about both teams already, it should come as no surprise that I am picking Phoenix to win in six games. Portland did have a better record, but I don't like them at all and I like do like Phoenix a little.

GOLDEN STATE V. UTAH:

My loyalty to Utah only goes so far and the Warriors will beat up on the Jazz in a six-game series.

WESTERN CONFERENCE FINALS

GOLDEN STATE V. PHOENIX:

This is a tough decision. Which bandwagon do I want to keep riding? I have a feeling about Golden State and expect them to win in seven thrilling games.

NBA FINALS

CHICAGO V. GOLDEN STATE:

As much as I hate to do this, I must. Chicago is the far superior team and will win their second consecutive championship in five .

SOFTBALL From page 13

UMBC's Kim Glaze hit a two-run RBI triple to score the winning run.

Keying the Bison offense were Kerr, who enjoyed another two-hit game, and Heather Hoehn '94. Hoehn returned to form after a cold stint against Lehigh with a two-RBI double in the initial UMBC contest.

The second UMBC game saw excellent pitching by Heidi Dawson '95, who allowed only one earned run, which came in the top of the ninth inning.

Bucknell took an early lead in game two as well, led by Fink who was three-for-five. Fink also scored two runs, tripled, and came home a third time on a wild pitch. Soon after the Bison established a lead, their opponents scored three unearned runs to take a 4-1 lead. The Bucknell women did not give up, however, and eventually tied the score in the fifth inning, a tie which eventually led to extra innings.

Hoehn had another big game with a two-for-four, one double and one RBI offensive performance.

Fink, who was Bucknell's lone solid performer last week, was honored as Patriot League Player of the Week for her four-game, 10-for-12 performance at the plate. The center fielder had a double in every game on the week, while stealing five bases, driving in six runs, and scoring eight. The junior is fifth in the league in batting average, with .365, second in doubles, and first in stolen bases. Nationally, Fink is eighth in doubles and 14th in stolen bases.

Last week's contests brought the pitching records of freshmen Dawson and Allison Love to 8-7 and 8-4, respectively. This season both rookies have come through for the Bucknell team, which has looked to each to take on an important leadership role. They are third and fourth in the Patriot League in ERA with 2.04 and 2.13 respectively, and Love is second in strikeouts.

The Bison are now 16-13, 3-5 in the Patriot League and will attempt to bring their league record up tomorrow when they take on Colgate at 1 p.m. at the mod field. The softball team is also scheduled to travel to New York to take on Hofstra on Sunday.

LESLIE WHY '92

Women's lacrosse player Leslie Why '92 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of April 18-24.

Yesterday, Why registered two assists against Georgetown University to become Bucknell's All-Time assists leader. The Bison went 2-1 last week with victories coming against Villanova and the Hoyas.

Earlier this season, Why surpassed the 100-point plateau for her career.

the Bison and surrendered five earned runs before being relieved by sophomore Jim Stevens in the fifth inning. The hero was Sniegocki, who pitched two shutout innings for his first save.

Kennedy was the hitting star, as he hit his third homer of the year and had four RBI. Bill Rinker also drove in four runs in a game which saw seven Bison starters collect multiple hits.

Going into this weekend's three-game set with Colgate, the Bison have several players doing well statistically. Matt Sniegocki has taken advantage of his huge ballpark as he leads the nation in triples with an average of .318 per game. Mark Kennedy is leading the Patriot League in RBI, and he is tied with Larry Trout for the conference lead in home runs. Jack Kazanjian is third in the league with an outstanding 2.14 ERA, and he is second in the league in wins with five. Kurt Waldner is atop the conference in strikeouts, averaging 9.31 per game.

Bo knows Bison Sports Info Office

Department responsible not only for statistics, but also promotion of Bucknell athletics

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Four years ago, Bo Smolka '88 never thought that he would return to Bucknell for any extended stay. Maybe he would come back for Homecoming or a few basketball games, but he certainly would never return to live in Lewisburg. He and his co-workers in the school's Sports Information Office would joke about who would eventually replace their director, Brad Tufts, who seemed as permanent to the athletic department as the Bison logo. Instead of going on to become a sports writer or spending the seemingly mandatory ten years as an assistant, Smolka has returned to Bucknell and is currently finishing his second year as its Sports Information Director.

Working at a thankless, demanding job, as Sports Information Director he is responsible for promoting Bucknell's athletes and athletics, as well as the school. Regarding the position, Smolka analyzes that "you get to write features and Associated Press stories that are sent and used all over the nation, but you never get a by-line and you can't convince anyone that you actually wrote it. You have to have no ego to see your exact words in The New York Times and The Philadelphia Inquirer and not get any credit."

Leaving high school in the Washington, D.C. area, Smolka had already done some work as a newspaper reporter and had decided that he wanted to become a sports writer upon his collegiate graduation. After looking at well-known journalism schools such as Syracuse University, Smolka eventually decided on coming to Bucknell because of the diversity of its liberal arts program. "I decided that if I came here as opposed to a journalism school, I could get involved with the paper and writing right away. It also provided a good opportunity if I changed my mind."

Upon his arrival in Lewisburg, he wasted no time in getting involved in sports writing, but it was not until late in his college years that his career goals changed direction. He started writing for The Bucknellian during his first semester on campus and was given the position of head sports editor during his second. Through his work with the paper, Smolka was required to spend time in the Sports Information Office, where he displayed a talent to Tufts, who offered him a job at the end of his sophomore year.

Smolka worked in the office for three of his four remaining semesters, taking one term off to act as the Editor in Chief of the school's paper. During those last two years, he doubled his English courses in order to add that discipline to his mathematics major.

Nearing graduation, Smolka and the others blanketed the nation's colleges and newspapers with resumes and letters, yet they did not receive any offers right away. The Naval Academy kept his resume, and soon a spot opened as an assistant S.I.D.

Recalls Tufts, "Navy called about Bo filling their position, which was unusual in that most places usually want someone who has at least worked part-time or had an internship. But he went down there and must have impressed them in the interview. When they called I guaranteed that he was hard-working and they offered the job."

During his second year at Annapolis, Smolka visited his old boss at a Breakin' Bison basketball game at U.M.B.C. where he heard news of a shake-up in the Bucknell Athletic Department. At the end of 1990's spring semester, Senior Associate Athletic Director Bob Latour would be retiring and Tufts had been offered the position, forcing the school to seek a new Sports Information Director.

"I didn't think that it would happen so soon, but I decided to apply anyway. I thought that my age would work against me. I wasn't looking to leave Navy and if I didn't get the job, I probably would have stayed there a couple more years."

"I was thrilled when I got it. I thought 'I can't believe that I'm in charge. I'm the next Brad.'"

Despite his replacement's relatively young age, Tufts claims that he had no doubts that Smolka could replace him. "It's not as unusual as it sounds. I was 21 when I started here. He had experience and knew the people and the school."

Smolka soon showed that his age was not an issue in not only undergoing the transition smoothly, but advancing the department into the computer age. "He added a new dimension by bringing in in-house publishing and becoming more efficient in product and money," said Tufts. "Before him, most of the money was in typesetting the programs and guides, but he's cut all most all of that."

While a Sports Information Director rarely has any free time year-round, Smolka's busiest time comes in September and early October. In addition to a football game every weekend and other fall sports throughout the week, he also must prepare for the upcoming basketball season. During this time, he estimates that his hours can reach nearly 80 per week.

During football season, he is expected to prepare for the onslaught of reporters and broadcasters who descend on the press box every home Saturday. After the games he must fill out the NCAA's forms as well as dictate an Associated Press story over the phone. While football calls for the most extensive media coverage, Smolka knows that every sport deserves proper coverage. The Sports Information Office must develop recruiting brochures and media guides as well as keeping the updated statistics for each of Bucknell's varsity sports.

> "It is a very, very irregular lifestyle and not for everybody, but it is for me."
> — Bo Smolka, Sports Information Director

Tufts describes the position that he passed on. "Everybody wants a part of you all of the time, and there is no way that you can give everyone what they want, so you try to please all of the people some of the time." Adds Smolka, "We don't want to slight any of the teams, but how much we are required to provide is related to the media's coverage."

Even when the work may slow down, the Sports Information Office rarely gets a break. Unlike the school's coaches, who can relax after the end of a season, Sports Information continues throughout the year. As soon as one season ends, another is always beginning, with Bucknell's 26 varsity sports active from Mid-August until the end of May.

While there is always preparation work to be done between May and August, this is the only time that Smolka can take an extended break. This summer he plans to take a three week leave to visit his brother, a Peace Corps Supervisor in Kenya.

Says Smolka, "It is a very, very irregular lifestyle and not for everybody, but it is for me. When I interview people for our internship, I tell them that the hours are crazy, not overwhelming, but irregular. It's not nine-to-five, but I like that."

Amy Clare–The Bucknellian
Bo Smolka '88 heads the talented and hard-working campus Sports Information Department.

Despite the constant time pressures, Smolka claims that he is not looking for a career change. "I've thought about going into reporting, but from this end of it you hear stories of scandals, vicious competition among papers, raking people through the mud. Reporters have to dig up dirt. Here I get to accentuate the positives in sports."

Smolka also shows a preference for college as apposed to professional sports. "I've thought of getting involved with the pros, but I like college because there's always a new season, and a variety. Every year we have new seniors and a new optimism."

As for working in Lewisburg, Smolka knows that the region is limited in its media resources. "We are isolated here, and it's particularly hard for T.V. coverage, but we try to generate as much interest about the sports as we can."

While few people had any doubts about his abilities when he returned to Lewisburg, Smolka's work at Bucknell may have exceeded expectations. Concludes Tufts, "Bo has done a great job here. He has brought a new energy, and he's a great writer. Thirty-five years ago just about everyone could write well, but these days its rare. He has a real flare for the job."

Smolka knows that his dual degrees from Bucknell have the potential to earn him a larger salary in a different profession or at a different institution, but he claims that he is not ready to leave his alma mater. "I'd much rather be happy than rich. I like to write about sports and college in particular and I'm not actively looking to leave. I'm happy here, and I love being around these students, and I love my job."

Cyclists place fifth

BY GREG TALL

The cycling team traveled to Ithaca this weekend to compete in the Cornell stage race. The stage race consisted of three grueling events occurring over Saturday and Sunday. Saturday began with an early morning team time trial. Bucknell sent riders Lee Lefkowitz '93, Tim Peterson '93 and Greg Tall '93 to begin the race against the clock. The team sorely missed freshman Chris Neumann, as he was "misinformed" of the start time. Despite this hardship the team managed to place a respectable fifth against the much larger squads from other schools.

Saturday afternoon brought dismal weather and stage two, the circuit race. The course was a 4.1-mile circuit consisting of a 500-vertical-foot hill climb and a dangerous 120-degree turn. The men's A field did not produce any finishers for Bucknell, but did manage to grab important prime (preem) points for the team. Lee Lefkowitz and a Cornell rider broke away from the field at the start. Lefkowitz then earned seven points as he passed through the start-finish right on the wheel of the Cornell rider. In the men's C division, Greg Tall battled with a scattered and uncooperative field to place eleventh for the Bison.

On Sunday the team headed to Greek Peak to compete in the road race. Disaster struck the men's A team, as Lefkowitz was faced with an unavoidable road hazard. Lefkowitz went down, and brought Peterson, Neumann and other members of the field down with him. Neumann and Lefkowitz were injured and unable to continue the race. Peterson managed to get back on his bike, but the crash had left him too far behind to catch the field. During the C race, the Cornell team, Penn State team and Tall broke away from the field early in the race. Having no other teammates to help him, Tall managed to place a respectable eleventh amongst the contesting lead pack. Mike Maestas '92 led the charge up the hill for the second pack. Maestas dropped a number of riders on this hill and ended up 25th for the Bison.

Baseball: America's uncontested national pastime

As I walked back to my mod after history class yesterday afternoon, I saw the baseball team taking infield practice and realized why baseball is, has been, and always will be our national pastime. What other team sport could do that kind of weather justice?

The players don't wear any cumbersome shoulder pads or have any game clocks to worry about; just button-down shirts and nine innings. Football, basketball and countless other sports rely on clocks to end them. Only three things end a pick-up baseball game: sundown, mom's law of "be home for dinner," and hitting the ball through your neighbor's window. There are several other aspects of this sport that separate it from the others.

The traditional after-school ritual of stopping at the candy store to buy a pack of cards and trading a few Red Sox for Yankees before that afternoon's pick-up game has no equal. Football and basketball cards don't allow you to identify with your favorite players because they're either hidden by a facemask or are over seven feet tall. The stats on the back are easy to understand and invite countless debates as to who's the better player.

After two captains pick teams and finish arguing over who's up first, the exact same game that the pros play begins. "The Oak tree is one foul line and the tool shed's the other." "We can use my books as bases." The fields don't need to be symmetrical (see Fenway Park or Camden Yards) like the other sports. You can't truly re-create a pro basketball game without a shot-clock. Two-hand touch with three completions for a first down just doesn't do it either.

The rules of baseball have gone virtually unchanged over the past eighty years. Umpires have never called on video replay to do their jobs for them. The reason you've never a seen a well officiated basketball game is because the referees are asked to make so many judgement calls that its nearly impossible to be consistent. The commissioner hasn't altered the game with a special scoring system, such as the three-point shot in basketball.

It's also the ultimate game of offense and defense. You can't loose possession or forfeit your turn up for something like a fumble or traveling. The defensive team must get the offensive team out three times before they can get the opportunity to score themselves. No interceptions in this sport.

I can't wait until the day when I'll be able to take a son to a ball game or play a pick-up game with his friends. Just "Be home by dark for dinner."

Bison hold off Eagles; face Patriot League rival Colgate Red Raiders this weekend in a three-game series

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell baseball team took three of four games against fairly poor competition this week. Last weekend the Bison won two of three from Lehigh, who are traditional residents of the Patriot League's second division. Yesterday the Bison whipped Niagara in a non-league game to improve their record to 13-12, 5-4 in the conference. The win evened the lifetime Bucknell-Niagara series at 1-1. The Eagles took the first game of the not-so-traditional series back in 1906.

In yesterday's affair, starting pitcher Denis Maguire '93 picked up his second win of the year as Bucknell rolled to a 7-3 win. Maguire, whose recent ineffectiveness knocked him out of the conference-game rotation, struck out four and allowed no runs on five hits in five and a third innings. Rich Heller '94 got his first save, despite allowing three runs.

Offensively, Bill Rinker '92 drove in two runs, including the first run of the game on a bases loaded walk in the second inning. Niagara starter Aaron Golda's wildness also led to three more runs in the fourth. After issuing two of his five walks to the first two batters of the inning, Golda was burned by Brian Walter '94, who singled in two runs. After an error and another walk, Dave Koerner '92 hit a sac fly to score Walter.

Niagara got two in the second on an RBI triple by Dan DeMonte and an infield ground out. The Bison quickly put the game out of reach in the eighth, as Matt Sniegocki '93 doubled in a run, and Jim Zervanos '92 singled home another. The Bison would score three in the inning and then hold on for the victory.

Last Friday the team travelled to Bethlehem to face Lehigh. In the opening game of the three-game series, the Bison pounded out 13 hits on their way to to a 5-3 win. Jack Kazanjian '93, who has been by far the best pitcher on the staff this season, tossed another complete game to run his record to 5-1. Actually the game was shortened to eight innings due to rain. Lehigh was in a charitable mood as third baseman Jon Lehberger made two key errors, and their pitchers threw two wild pitches to force in runs. Kennedy had a big day at the plate, collecting three hits and driving in two runs. Sniegocki, Mike Kearns '93, and Scott Sutfin '94 had two hits apiece.

Mike Kearns '92, shown here stealing second in a game played earlier this season, has done a solid job in the leadoff spot for the Bison. The secondbaseman is currently hitting .312, with a team-high eight stolen bases.

Bill Rinker '92, pictured here in last season's home game against Franklin and Marshall, had a four RBI game in the three-game series against Lehigh earlier this week.

Rain pushed Saturday's doubleheader back to Monday, and the Bison were fortunate to get out of town with a split. Lehigh pounded Bucknell starter Kurt Waldner '93 for six runs and nine hits in five and two-thirds innings on their way to a 6-4 win. Trailing 3-0 in the top of the sixth, the Bison scored for runs to take the lead. Kennedy and Larry Trout '93 drove in runs with singles, and two of Lehigh's six errors for the game also led to runs in the inning. The 4-3 lead was short-lived however, as Waldner surrendered three in the bottom of the sixth. Lehigh designated hitter Eric Schmitz had a huge day, going three for three with five RBI and two runs scored.

In the nightcap, Bucknell jumped out to an 11-3 lead by the fifth inning. The Bison are so used to coming from behind this year that they really did not know what to do with a big lead. By the seventh the score was 11-10. Dave Scranton (2-2) started for

Golf course fees tee off student body

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Golf anyone? Only if you treat.

If your checkbook is singing those Recession Blues, one of the things you won't be doing much of this spring is playing golf. To play 18 holes this year means forking over $15 for green fees, $18 on weekends and holidays when you most likely can't even get a tee time.

A student membership will run you $120 for the semester. If you are going to be here this summer, get ready to shell out another $120. Those of you who were members just two springs ago will undoubtedly recognize that the membership fee has gone up about 25 percent in that time.

These prices are actually fairly competitive with other similarly-maintained private clubs in this region, but most Bucknellians have a major problem when shelling out that kind of cash to play at the Bucknell Golf Club. After all, the word "Bucknell" is right on the sign.

Unfortunately for the students, the golf course is not an entity of the athletic department. Thus the argument, "If I can play basketball for free in the fieldhouse and tennis for free outside, why can't I play golf for free?" does not hold up, even if all of those activities take place on Bucknell property.

While the University owns the land, the club is run by a special board of directors. Any operating and maintenance costs are covered by membership and green fees. Since Bucknell does not help finance the club, or put another way, since the club does not receive any of your tuition money, they feel they need to significantly charge students for use of their golf course. Maintenance costs for golf courses are astronomical—a single fairway mower runs about $90,000—so one can understand why golf is a universally expensive sport.

The club does have several working agreements with the University. For example, if the course is in need of landscaping, the University will loan them the equipment, and the club pays the labor costs. Also, while a few groundskeepers work year round, some employees work at the course during the golf season and for the Physical Plant in the winter. This helps the club cut a few costs. In exchange, the University receives some benefits as well. For example, the Bucknell golf team plays for free, and the club allows the University to schedule special events, such as the Parents' Weekend Tournament.

This brings us to another minor controversy. Normally, students, even if they are members, are not given tee times before 2 p.m. on Saturdays and Sundays. These preferred times are reserved for members. Often this causes such logjams that unless you reserve a time a week or so in advance, you may not get to play until late afternoon, when you most likely will not be able to get in 18 holes anyway.

"We are a member-oriented club," says Head Pro Wendell Bertram. In addition to their financial support, Bertram also notes that "members usually take better care of the course than a green fee player who might only play here once."

This may lead one to believe that since the club gives such preference to its members that it may actually discourage walk-in players intentionally. Many students who are not members often feel that they are treated rudely by the members, and thus it is not worth shelling out all of that cash to play. One student recalls a situation when, while waiting for some time to tee off on the first hole, the foursome in front of them (all members) allowed four of their friends to slip in front of them. Then that foursome split themselves into two twosomes for competitive reasons. When the student (one of a group of three) complained, one member explained to him that, "You guys don't have to play here." While most members certainly exhibit better behavior than that, many students find it hard to play a round of golf without some sort of unpleasant event.

Seven fraternities hit as theft wave continues

BY JOHN GODBOUT AND BOB RITTER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Stereos and other audio and video equipment have been stolen from seven fraternity houses in two-week string of thefts which continued last night.

Five uphill fraternities were robbed in the early morning hours of Friday, April 24, prompting investigations by both Bucknell Public Safety and the East Buffalo Township Police Department.

The crime wave continued last night at two downhill houses, bringing Lewisburg Police into the investigation.

The perpetrators looted thousands of dollars worth of equipment from the Tau Kappa Epsilon, Theta Chi, Sigma Chi, Sigma Phi Epsilon, and Kappa Delta Rho houses between the hours of 3 a.m. and 6 a.m.

Last night several compact discs and a television were stolen by someone who broke into student rooms at Kappa Sigma and Sigma Alpha Mu. Public Safety Captain Mike Amarante said the most recent thefts may be related to last week's crime spree, since the time frame and the methods are similar.

Although leads are few, Vince DeCerchio, director of public safety, tends to think that the perpetrators were not of the Bucknell community, but were probably guests who had visited the houses before.

"These people were probably guests at another time when they cased the houses, then they came back during an activity and blended in," said DeCerchio.

Members of the fraternities have little idea of who the thieves were, but believe that most likely at least one of the perpetrators was somehow connected with the Bucknell community.

"I know that Sigma Chi had things stolen from places that only a person from Bucknell would know about, but I don't see how anyone from Bucknell would have access to any sort of an organization that could operate on that large scale," said Scott Brown '93, president of Kappa Delta Rho.

Barry Geisler '93, president of Sigma Chi, agrees. "I think it was probably a combination of the two. There had to be someone from outside Bucknell who had the resources to get rid of the stuff. But someone from Bucknell had to know where the stuff was," said Geisler.

The officer in charge of the East Buffalo Township investigation was unable to be reached for comment.

Fraternity presidents are concerned that the incidents went unnoticed by Public Safety officers, and think that the thefts should have been stopped before five houses were looted.

"Public Safety is here to protect the property of Bucknell students. They should have noticed a big truck parked outside the houses. It had to take a long time because the stuff they stole was bulky and heavy, and the truck had to be big because they stole a lot of stuff," said Scott Dietrich '93, president of Sigma Phi Epsilon.

Upon first hearing of the case, DeCerchio reacted in the same way as the students, but after meeting with all of the Public Safety officers, he has decided that his staff did all they could be expected to, given the circumstances of the evening.

Officers claim that larger than normal crowds that night made observing anything out of the ordinary difficult, but most of the fraternities said there were no parties at their houses. Public Safety officers say fraternities are elusive about the increased traffic they have monitored of late.

The security report noted that larger crowds were noticed after 2 a.m. on Friday mornings after the bars close in town. The number of increased numbers of escorts to fraternity houses has increased lately, suggesting increased attendance at fraternity functions.

"It's almost impossible to monitor the flow of cars and persons in and out of the houses on a busy night. The numbers are in the hundreds," said DeCerchio.

The only solution, DeCerchio says, is to station a Public Safety officer at the foot of each entrance to the houses to check the I.D.'s and license plates of any person or car who enters.

"I don't think that is the kind of campus that anyone wants," said DeCerchio.

Security officers addressed each of the fraternities after the incidents to discuss causes and possible solutions, but the houses have reacted differently to the thefts.

Brown says that KDR has fixed door locks and is attempt-

Sexual harassment—myth or reality?

"Take Back the Night" March gives hope to survivors of harassment and assault

BY MARIA GLOD, TARA GILLIGAN, AND SUE BASALLA
Bucknellian Staff Writers

With lit candles in hands, a mass of students and faculty marched around campus, past fraternity houses, and through town, crying out to all who would listen: "Take back the night."

The march, held each year to protest violence against women, is a request to create a society in which women, as well as other oppressed groups, can feel safe to walk alone at night.

Prior to the march, students and faculty gathered at Rooke Chapel for a "Speak-Out." Through singing and reading survivor testimonies and poetry, individuals shared their own experiences and set the tone for the march.

Reading the prepared words of a woman who had been abused by her father and husband, one individual spoke: "I am a survivor, and I know I'm not alone here tonight. I know that one in three of you out there were, are, or will be victim or will know a survivor of a sexual assault. I ask you to join me tonight in speaking out, to break through this conspiracy of silence."

DIVERSE GROUP OF MARCHERS

Some of the marchers were the victims of sexual abuse; others were friends of victims. But many of the individuals who came to march or cheered from sidelines simply want to stop all violence against women. Sexual assault and harassment "is extremely wide-spread all over society and all over every university campus, and I think that [pro- test marches] are just wonderful; they're expressions of resistance. That's why I'm here," said Charles Sackrey, associate professor of economics and member of the sexual assault task force.

Kim Moyer '95, a member of Feminist Outreach, which co-sponsored the march, said that it is an important form of support for victims. "The march provides hope for some people who are victimized and lets them know that there is support behind them," she said.

Far from a homogenous crowd, the group of marchers included more than an occasional male. Concerned about a general lack of understanding, Eric Hodgson '94 said he joined the marchers because "I think that it's important to make people aware of things that they don't normally think about." Too often, people dismiss issues such as sexual assault and harrassment because it doesn't face them daily, he said.

FRATERNITY REACTIONS

As the march proceeded along fraternity row, brothers of Kappa Delta Rho stood outside their house clapping in clear support of the protesters. Brothers of several other fraternities watched from inside.

"There are a lot of men who understand and who are sensitive to the problem but are not willing to come out and participate and be active in the spirit of the whole thing and I think if anything's going to change it's going to take more active support from men, and that's the way it's going to turn around," said Mike Malusis '93, vice president of the Inter-Fraternity Council, as he stood outside the KDR house.

Keith Mann '93, president-elect of KDR, spoke of a need to make Greek men more aware of violence against women. "I think that the Greek system as a whole should show support for marches like this because a lot of males aren't aware of the problems that occur," he said.

Of the downhill fraternities, only Sigma Alpha Epsilon brothers gathered to support the marchers. Marchers filed past the house, which was Over 100 students, faculty, administrators and staff joined forces on the Chapel steps last night to participate in "Take back the night," an annual march calling for an end to the victimization of women.

Harassment on campus: two women's stories; posters show range of viewpoints

Editor's Note: Several students have given personal accounts of sexual harassment which have occurred both on and off campus. These students have been identified by fictitious names.

Bucknellian Staff Writers

What are your thoughts on sexual harassment?

"It is a form of subtle violence and should be acted against by both men and women."

"It's life, so suck it up. I'm tired of hearing about it."

These are just two responses found on the "graffiti boards" posted around campus by the Sexual Assault Task Force (SATF).

According to Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center and chairperson of the SATF, the posters were intended "to raise awareness of the problem of sexual harassment by giving people a chance to express their thoughts and opinions on the subject."

The 100 posters were hung in residence halls and other campus buildings for a two-week period and then displayed outside of the ELC forum.

"The posters gave students the opportunity to really say what they thought about sexual harassment, even down to the most blatant demonstrations of anger concerning the issue," said Kathy Mendelsohn '92, SATF member.

"There has to be a better understanding of what is and is not acceptable. It's all gray right now, no black or white," wrote one member of the Bucknell community. According to Butler, comments such

Final plans established in Taylor Hall renovations

BY TARA G. GILLIGAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Once the home of the entire University at Lewisburg, the soon-to-be renovated Taylor Hall will house three related departments: economics, the Office of International Education, and the Multicultural Center (MCC).

After a year and a half of discussions, the committee decided that moving these three departments to Taylor Hall would be the "most cogent" solution to a general overcrowding of departments on campus, according to Jackson Hill, former chair of the space committee.

—Jackson Hill
Former chair, space committee

Recognizing the historical significance of Taylor Hall the space committee decided against relocating departments such as music or art, which would have required massive renovations to the structure.

The committee also considered allocating the building to the department of modern languages, but decided against this option because members of that department frowned at moving away from Coleman Hall. Additionally, the department is too large to comfortably fit into Taylor.

According to Hill, the committee eventually decided that the economics department, Office of International Education, and the MCC would best fit into the building which, when renovated, will include six classrooms, two seminar rooms, offices, computer rooms, and lounges.

He also stressed that these three departments relate to each other and to an increased effort by the University to focus on international education. Housing the three departments together, he said, will "give a very clear focus to the building."

In addition, Hill said that this move reflects the same concerns that have been voiced by the General Education Council and that appear in Foundations for the Future.

The move from the Taylor Street House, behind Smith Hall, will be a welcome change to members of the Office of International Education. "I've been asking for better space for a number of years," said Barbara Rowe, director. "I love the location."

While the move to Taylor will provide for the economics department more spacious, up-to-date facilities, it will also free up sections of Coleman Hall, which has become overcrowded in recent years.

The committee has not decided what departments will move into space vacated by the allocation of Taylor Hall. But one of the committee's goals, according to Hill, is to remove all administrative offices from the Taylor Street House, current home of the Office of International Education. Once all of the offices have been relocated, the building could be turned into student housing.

Taylor Hall, the oldest on campus, was constructed in the late 1840s. At that time, it was called the Academy Building and housed classrooms for male students. The architect, Thomas U. Walter, con-

"I don't know how any male on Bucknell's campus could possibly not want to stand in favor of stopping battered women and stopping rapes. I think that's a pretty commonly-held belief with any sensitive human being," said Dave Skena '92, a member of SAE.

Before proceeding into town, the march passed near Carey House, where several curious observers looked on. One onlooker, Whitney Keen '92, noted that this year's "Take Back the Night" march was "the biggest I've seen. I think people have just become more conscious of women's issues than they were."

Having participated in past marches, Keen could compare his differing perspectives. "From the stand-point of the people who just watch it on the street, it's something that they can't really relate to right off. I think being in it is very different from watching it," he said.

structed "quite a few college buildings in America" and may have designed the dome in Washington, according to Hill.

Renovations will restore the exterior to its original state. Hill said that rebuilding the original door will not be difficult: the cornice and pediment are still in place. Architects will try to match the interior as closely as possible to the nineteenth century design while still creating up-to-date facilities.

According to Bob Naugle, director of the Physical Plant, renovations should begin by mid-fall. Though no figures have been officially provided, Naugle estimates that renovation costs will run between $1 million and $1.5 million.

The committee is still in the process of hiring an architect to design the project. Beginning in May, the committee will contact references of the five architect firms it is considering.

ing to develop a policy concerning when the house should be locked at night.

Sigma Chi brothers replaced their stereo with insurance money and have improved stereo security but do not plan to lock doors.

"We're locking doors and bolting down anything we can in the house, but it's impossible to keep it locked all the time because we'd be locking out brothers sometimes," said Dietrich of SPE.

The investigation continues as both Public Safety officers and East Buffalo Township Police pursue the leads that they have.

Public Safety officials are asking witnesses or anyone with possible leads or other information to contact the office. DeCerchio also reminded all residents to lock their doors and take other percautions against theft.

Student phon-a-thon callers boost last year's donations by $140,000

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In the midst of a devastating economic depression, Bucknell's Annual Giving program has not only held its own, it has improved. Much of this year's success can be attributed to Sarah Brown McAskill, the assistant director of annual giving.

McAskill's responsibilities include the Senior Gift Drive and the Phone-A-Thons. The Phone-A-Thons are held three times a year (fall, January and spring) and will contribute greatly toward reaching this year's goal of $3.25 million.

McAskill's résumé includes working as an assistant and caller at Harvard University's annual giving drive. Although some of that experience carries over into her work at Bucknell, the atmosphere is "very different" here in that alumni are generally eager for news of their alma mater.

She points out that the students who work as callers each night of the Phone-A-Thons are the ones who have made the difference in donor contributions.

Callers are given formalized training in areas such as negotiating a gift and encouraging past donors to increase their annual gift. McAskill thinks the "professional, but fun" atmosphere that has been generated is key to the success of this year's program.

Students compete each session for "Caller of the Night," who is awarded with a small prize like a bag of candy or a few extra minutes on break.

"Enthusiasm is contagious," McAskill said, and commends the students for their attitude and pride in their work.

The professional attitude taken by the managers has also been crucial to the success of the program. Student training was more formalized and specific and the goals were definite from the start of each night of the Phone-A-Thons.

The response of the people that were called has also been different this year, McAskill commented. Callers contact members of Reunion classes, past donors, non-donors, parents and alumni and everyone is generally eager to hear news from the school, the athletic teams, and the Greek system.

"The fraternity and sorority situation has settled down and the alumni are happy with it," said McAskill.

Student callers were educated that the participation rate at Bucknell is not as high as the participation rate of other frame of reference schools. If a potential donor hears that Lehigh, for example, has a participation rate of 57% but Bucknell's is only 31%, it might provide more incentive for donors to match or increase their donations. McAskill and Cooley Hall anticipate this year's participation rate to increase significantly to 38%.

Women in ROTC: at a crossroads

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Of the 46 students enrolled in Bucknell's Reserve Officer Training Corps program, only three are women, but five more first-year women will likely join the Bison Batallion next semester. These women begin their army trajining at a time when debate on the role of women in the military may alter the course of their future careers.

Opponents to the program argue that the Army does not offer equal employment opportunities for women. According to Lieutenant Colonel Thomas MacIver, director of Bucknell ROTC, the laws prohibiting women to hold certain military positions were initiated in the late 1970's, when Congress implemented the "combat probability code." This code listed jobs in the Air Force and Navy that were most likely to involve heavy military combat or had a high rate of casualties. Also as a result of this combat probability code, the positions that women were permitted to hold in the Army branch became limited. Women are not permitted to hold positions as infantrymen (who serve on the actual front lines or "battle lines" during combat) or as a member of a tank crew.

The Women's Resource Advisory Board, comprised in February of 1991 of staff, faculty and students, submitted this statement in reference to the Defense Department policy:

"[We] oppose the Armed Services policy of denying women equal access to all military employment opportunities. Such policies are unjust. They are contrary to the University's educational objectives which seek to develop 'new experiences that will enable students to grow in moral sensitivity and in respect for other persons.' These practices are obstacles to Bucknell's goal for students to engage in 'institutional programs and practices that exemplify compassion, civility, and a sense of justice.'"

Bucknell's R.O.T.C. program enrolled three female cadets this year. All three women denied ever feeling discriminated against during their time at R.O.T.C. Christena Johnston '94 stated that her male counterparts are "very supportive" of her and the fact that there are only three women only adds to the male encouragement. Jenn Smith '95 feels she is "treated just as equally as the guys. We all do the same exercises and learn the same things." Desiree Ream '93 feels that the staff and other cadets have been "like big brothers" to her.

Her male counterparts agree. Many cadets feel that among all the negative aspects being pointed out, it is easy to forget the positive impact the R.O.T.C. has made.

MacIver considers the program to be a unique opportunity for Bucknell students to learn essential leadership skills that most University students do not have access to. Cadets are evaluated on their levels of physical fitness and military bearing, leadership skills, training, competence, responsibility and ac-

A lot of campus rapes start here.

Whenever there's drinking or drugs, things can get out of hand. So it's no surprise that many campus rapes involve alcohol.

But you should know that under any circumstances, sex without the other person's consent is considered rape. A felony, punishable by prison. And drinking is no excuse.

That's why, when you party, it's good to know what your limits are. You see, a little sobering thought now can save you from a big problem later.

as this "document the need for more education on campus."

But while the issue may be gray and undefined, the posters reinforced the harsh reality that sexual harassment does occur with alarming frequency. After reading comments on the posters, one student, Judi, decided it was time to press charges against a professor who had in the past sexually harassed her. "The sexual harassment posters brought it into my mind again," she said.

Judi said she felt uncomfortable when one of her chemistry professors told her, "You're looking good," and "You've lost a lot of weight." Comments such as these continued, and the professor once pinched Judi in the behind.

This type of discourse is not uncommon, and often when students talk to each other in this manner, they feel they are being complimentary rather than harassing. According to Judi, "Some comments are meant to be complimentary, but it depends on how the woman feels about the comments." When an individual—a professor, a student, an employer, or anyone else—"steps over the boundary of what is proper and what is not," he may be unknowingly harassing.

When she finally decided to confront the department chair, he "had no idea of what to do. He was upset because he didn't have any training and didn't know what the policy was," she said. She has since met with SATF members.

One other student, Christy, spoke of sexual harassment in the workplace. "I worked in a restaurant over the summer, and the manager continually harassed the waitresses. I never reported him, but I learned to simply ignore him. Still, I watched him treat other women terribly, asking them personal questions and making it clear that he was sexually interested in them," she said.

Working for an abusive boss can be a very precarious situation. "I'd had a difficult time finding a job that summer and quitting really wasn't an option."

Echoing a sentiment reflected in the posters now on display, Christy noted that the line between compliments and harassment is vague. "One of the waitresses I worked with seemed to be flattered by our manager's sleazy comments. Behind his back, she joined in with all the other waitresses in complaining about him. But to his face, she was a flirt. It's funny, the other waitresses hated her, and often, instead of complaining about how awful he was, they'd talk about her. I think this illustrates just how confused men and women are about this issue."

Several of the individuals who participated in yesterday's "Take Back the Night" March discussed issues revolving around sexual harassment. A few noted the crass tone of some of the comments on the posters. "I thought it was surprising that there are so many crass people here at this school, and I think that a lot of people just took it as a joke. It was kind of sad," said Eric Hodgson '94.

David Soll '92 said that people who wrote rude comments on the posters "are really insecure, and they feel like they get some sort of power by doing that."

Kristin Skarie, director of student activities and SATF member, noted that the posters displayed were many "verbally violent comments which serve to confirm that sexual harassment occurs on campus and to bring the issue up front." Skarie also said, however, that many comments "were not representative of overall campus opinion and, instead, expressed the views of the vocal minority."

"I feel the controversy and discussion that the displays generated helped to further our goals," said Butler. According to Skarie, the posters provided concrete student opinions concerning sexual harassment that can be useful in planning future workshops.

countability. These are lessons that cadets feel can never be taught in the classroom.

A requirement of R.O.T.C. student is to enroll each year in Military Science classes. As well as adding to the benefits of a liberal arts education, MacIver argues that the courses, contrary to popular belief, do not instruct students on "better ways to kill someone."

The classes do educate student on military tactics, but the tactics only serve as a vehicle to arrive at R.O.T.C. goals. Students are instructed in military tactics to get a better understanding of organization and, more importantly, to learn and implement leadership skills. Reim is an engineering major, and points out that she does not have the room in her schedule to take management classes or to learn the leadership skills that she learns from R.O.T.C.

MacIver thinks that the Deserts Storm incident might be the catalyst that propels Congress into changing the Defense Department policy against women. The issue has created enough public interest for MacIver to foresee Congress acting to reverse its current policy. He thinks that, after the election, "Congress will take the easy way out and let [all] the branches make their own policy."

The University of Iowa has announced a new way to study American culture with a course entitled "American Popular Arts : Elvis as Anthology." The course will focus on Elvis' impact on music and culture in the U.S.

Peter Nazareth, a professor at UI, believes that there is much to be learned from the late king of rock 'n' roll. "America is energy. You hear a lot of that energy in Elvis - the energy to dare, the energy to try."

Student Gina Armbruster said the course has taught her to regard Elvis "as more of a musician than a fat guy of the 70's who never had a prime."

Amherst studs compete for date

An Amherst College club called Impossible Deme sponsored a local variety of the hit game show "Studs", in which men and women compete for prize vacations and romance.

The event's organizer, Yuchong Yi, said the Amherst rendition followed a similar format to the real show, except the grand prize was an all-expenses paid date.

The winning stud, Deac Manning '95, said he had won before the game began. "There was no doubt about it. The whole thing was just a formality. I guess I was just more studly," said Manning.

Two or three students in each of fifteen classes meet with their professors every week in order to discuss how the class is going, and suggest any improvements. In return, the students receive $100.

The dean of the college began this program after faculty members told him they would like to see a program in which students could make suggestions and complaints, in order to help the professors develop their courses.

Pitt students see through hoax

The University of Pittsburgh at Johnstown hosted two speakers to lecture on their experiences with the paranormal, but some students feel their Student Activity Fund money was wasted on what they called "a joke."

The alleged hoaxers, Ed and Lorraine Warren, introduced photographs, audio recordings, and video materials as evidence of ghosts, demons, and satanic possessions, but students said they saw the photos as double-exposed, and the sounds could be made on any cheap tape recorder.

Mrs. Warren warned students not to use Ouija boards, because "once these doors to evil are opened, they are very hard to close."

Women in ROTC: the freshman year

Jenn Smith '95, has survived her first year as the only female in her class; next year's frosh class will include at least four women

Adjusting to the first year of college can be a huge adjustment. Many freshman students are away from home for the first time, sometimes thousands of miles from the friends and family who are so familiar. Often students must get used to a different landscape and climate, especially if they are not used to all this rain!

Freshmen often have to adjust to a more rigorous academic environment than they are used to, while at the same time meeting new people and attempting to make friends.

This adjustment to the first year of college becomes tougher if you also have to adjust to your first year of military life as an ROTC cadet. If you are only one of three women in the Bucknell ROTC program, and the only freshman woman, you might be a bit apprehensive about this first year.

Though she was a bit apprehensive in the beginning, Jenn Smith '95 didn't have too much trouble adjusting from the life she knew in Colorado and has almost completed her first year as the lone female freshman in ROTC. While next year the number of women in ROTC will more than double with the addition of at least four more freshmen women, these women will still be out-numbered by men by a ratio of six to one.

Japanese executives come to sample rural life of PA

BY ROBIN STUTMAN

Did you ever wonder about the brain behind your Walkman every time you insert a cassette? This mystery can be solved if you happen to be around Lewisburg in July. The President of Sony Corporation is just one of the many prominent business executives visiting Bucknell this summer.

From Saturday, July 4th until Friday, July 10th, Bucknell will be hosting an IBM summer institute for Japanese executives. Approximately 15 companies will be attending the conference organized by Dr. David Lu, a Japanese and East Asian Studies professor here at Bucknell. A few include IBM in Japan, NTT, Mitsubishi International Corporation, Daichi banking, Bridgestone Firestone, Matsushita, CITOA, and Sony.

The goal of this program is not only to bring the executives together for meetings, but also to give the Japanese executives a slice of American life. Lu, the chief organizer, states, "we wanted Bucknell University to be known better to the Japanese community." Dr. Lu is not only known on this campus, but in Japan as well. His prominence and big connections helped make this program a success in previous years.

Takeo Shiina, a graduate of Bucknell, will be opening the conference with a welcome speech. Shiina is currently the President and Chief Executive Officer of the IBM branch in Japan. The remainder of the week will consist of various meetings for the executives, and recreational and tourist attractions for the families. There will be approximately 15 Bucknell students, ranging from first-year to senior status, serving as interns for the summer institute. The students accepted for the program had to undergo a competitive application process in which they were each interviewed by both Dr. Lu and a Japanese representative.

The job of an intern entails taking care of the executive and his or her family. Each student is assigned to a respective Japanese family and is expected to dine with them, entertain them, and basically share his/her American experience with them throughout the week. Last year both the interns and families were housed in the Gateways, but this year they will be in the Mods. Tony Massaro, an intern from last summer, thinks "it was nice the way the institute housed the Japanese. We held our own separate community away from the rest of Bucknell."

Many of the Japanese families will come from all over the United States, presently stationed here for two to four years as a part of the executive's job requirements. Still, some will fly directly from Japan. The families are eager to learn about American history and culture. Some activities include a walking tour of Lewisburg, golf, a trip to Knoebels Grove, swimming at Half-way Dam, and hiking at Ricketts Glen.

The interns do not need to know the Japanese language for the position, although most have had experience. Upon arrival, Tony Massaro had no prior Japanese language skills but still had "a positive and rewarding experience." In fact, many of the Japanese families and executives hardly speak any English. Last year, Massaro said, "the intern staff started out as separate individuals that did not know each other well and ended as a group of close friends." In addition, connections were made for many of the interns with promising Japanese companies. Bill Farrell '92, who will serve as the Captain of the interns this summer, will not have a host-family himself. The connections Farrell made were maintained throughout the year.

Night life during the summer institute will most likely consist of frequent visits to the bar. Business deals in Japan are often executed in drinking establishments, so the executives may wish to continue their rituals in the United States. In fact, last summer, a Japanese executive was seen drinking at the bar wearing only his pajamas and slippers! Look out Bull Run, the men of IBM will soon be on their way.

Have you seen these ducks?

Elizabeth Danneberg—The Bucknellian

This campus is full of all kinds of critters. We expect dogs, cats, squirrels, etc. to be roaming freely through the streets and sidewalks of the community, but ducks? Now we all know that there are several bodies of water that justify their presence, but what's curious is that they seem to like the concrete around here just as well.

I'm sure many of you have noticed the handsome couple pictured waddling around campus—perhaps they were hanging around the cross section of 6th and St.Catherine Streets, or the Swartz Hall parking lot, or maybe even the LC. Obviously these ducks have little fear of cars, people, or anything else that you would expect to appear threatening to them. They just like to get around.

But the question is—is this the same pair of ducks we see all around campus, or are there several pairs? And when are we going to see the rest of the family?

The Modern Butler

A three part short story

PART TWO: The First Supper

An attractive young woman with splendid red hair and a handsome figure opened the door and fainted. This struck me as quite unusual because I had been informed that the household was already in possession of an elderly maid named Irma, and of course I assumed that it was she who would be greeting me. I was to discover later that Irma was an extremely difficult woman to locate. I would spend several hours searching for her, with no success. Not that I had anything improper in mind when and if I did meet her. I just felt that the household servants should establish some sort of working communication. And when I inquired as to her schedule, I was told that Irma was exceedingly remote and preferred to complete her tasks unwatched. And yet the house was immaculate and the cooking was exquisite. As time went on, I became increasingly impressed and intrigued by the elderly maid's subtlety.

As I set down my bag and rummaged for my smelling salts, the young lady arose and quickly pulled me inside. I must say that her fingers were soft and delicate against my lapel, and they smelled clean and soapy with a minty edge. She rested her hands against my shoulders and slowly opened her mouth.

"Do you find my gums attractive?"

Only the words weren't enunciated quite so clearly because her mouth was open exceptionally wide.

"Tell me the truth. Do you find my gums attractive?"

Before I could respond, an elegant middle-aged lady in a yellow sun dress and black sandals buzzed and hummed down the stairs.

"Now, Silver, honey. You know what I've told you about immediate dental inquiry. It's just plain wrong, that's what it is. Now away with you and get ready for supper, it'll be a good one. Irma told me so. Go on now."

The young woman pursed her lips. "But, mother..."

I was to discover later that Silvermissy spoke those two words quite frequently and they did not necessarily imply that she found her mother's orders especially objectionable. Occasionally, she would use the words as a greeting or as a vocalized pause. At times she would speak the phrase when her mother was not even present.

The young woman squeezed my hand and leaned towards my ear.

"Daddy told me I'm doomed to die an old maid and I think it's because of my gums." Then she hurried upstairs in a streak of flaming hair. Lovely.

Mrs. Wildes flew over to me and spoke quite quickly.

"Welcome, welcome, honey. My name is Eve, pronounced E.V. Like the initials, not the woman who ate that apple and got into big trouble. Don't let my daughter sting you, she's really a rose and my husband is the real genius. You can call me anything you like but only call me Eve if you say it like E.V. not like that woman who ate that apple from the snake and got into big, big trouble. I've never really known what to do with these butlers they send us because it's my husband who is the real genius. He calls me his little Queenie, if you can imagine that. You can call me that too if you'd like. Isn't my daughter just a riot. She mostly calls me mother, as you might have guessed..."

We chatted like this for the better part of an hour and I think, for the interests of my story, I will delete the rest of our conversation, although I assure you I found it quite delightful. Her hair was done up in what I believe is called the "beehive" hairdo, which she wore quite well, despite the fact that it is thought to be somewhat outdated. As she spoke, she was continually groping the braided crown with her hands, as if shaping or molding.

Our chatter ceased when a shaggy-looking boy, slightly scarred by the awkward ills of puberty, bounded through the door cradling a rather small dog. He gazed at me for a moment as he deposited the animal on the floor. Then he ran to hug Mrs. Wildes.

"Can I keep him? Please, please, can I keep him?"

I smiled to myself. The scene was indeed a familiar one.

"Can I? Can I? I found him all alone, tied up on the Freidman's lawn."

"Now, Sparky, honey. You know what I've told you about bringing home strays. It's just plain wrong, that's what it is. "

I was to discover later that Sparky brought home "strays" quite frequently and would spend hours feeding and stroking them. Sometimes he dressed them in special outfits or pomaded their fur. After which he attempted to establish communication. He would sprawl out on the rug, staring at the poor creature, a small tape recorder by his side as he yapped and growled and drooled a bit. Yet for some reason, the dogs always remained silent. The smaller ones might tremble slightly, but that was all. Eventually, the poor beast would threaten to do away with itself by jumping off the second floor landing. And when this happened, young Sparky would be forced to release the animal with much sobbing and sniffles. As he opened the door and teared a goodbye, the dog would frantically bolt towards the street, barking for joy.

In the midst of debate between Mrs. Wildes and her whining Sparky, an odd presence made its way down the stairs. A lumpy, dumpy... thing in a black bathrobe. They could have been the sagging breasts of an unhealthy woman or those of an obese man. Its hair was neutered into medium-length curls and the fuzz on its upper lip was just marginal enough to lack any definite indication. Its cracking voice was frustratingly ambiguous.

"Hello, New Butler. I'm Churchill. The middle child. I'm named after the playwright, not the political leader. Stay away from my matches. And batteries. And I will always speak the truth. Matches and batteries, that's all I ask. Matches and batteries. Matches and batteries."

Churchill oafed back up the stairs, mumbling the word-sounds under its breath, squeaking the syllables into a tuneless chant. The middle child reached the top of the landing and faded from view. It was the most that Churchill would ever say to me.

Sparky turned from Mrs. Wildes and victoriously hugged his new pet. Like his older brother/sister, he also rushed up the stairs, to ferret an outfit for the tiny dog.

Mrs. Wildes turned to me and mothered up a smile. She may have been getting ready to explain her petwise defeat when a key in the lock destroyed the words. A tether-ball set exploded through the door. It was clutched by a gasping man. He stumbled the equipment into the sitting room and crashed the tether-ball set to the floor. The spike part, which enabled you to secure the pole to the ground, appeared suspiciously dirty. As if this wheezing man had simply liberated the game from a neighbor's yard.

"We're playing tether-ball tonight, Queenie," he assured Mrs. Wildes with a kiss.

He turned to me and smiled and offered a hand. I accepted it and put it in my pocket for later.

"You must be the new butler. I'm Ernest. Ernest Wildes. But you could call me Al if you wish. You could call me Adam or Jacob or Mary or Omhar Hakim Nunushuba Flak Flak Goony Tu Shu or Lenny, also. I just won't answer. Contrary to what you may have heard, I'm a poet. Not a scientist. And I only work on Sundays. Now come join us for supper before the soup gets cold."

I felt obliged to explain to Master Wildes that the proper place for a butler to eat was in the kitchen with the other servant or servants, but he would have none of it.

"How can you watch us if you don't eat with us? Where do they come up with these crazy rules anyway? You'll sit at the head of the table, that's where you'll sit. At the head of the table. We'll show them."

Then, he huffed into a door at the far corner of the drawing room, followed closely by his Queenie. I was left alone.

It has just occurred to me that I should probably present a brief description of this drawing room, as it seems to be a central location for a number of family occasions. Perhaps, I should have described it even earlier in the tale. To "set the stage," if you will. It might have been more proper. It's too late now, though. The drawing room was large and echoey, yet profoundly tidy with a tight rug and an elegant fireplace. Mahogany furniture circled a crystal coffee table, and somber portraits of stiff-lipped men stared pompously ahead. Resting on the mantle, above the fireplace, next to a faded copy of Uncle Vania was a stuffed dove and a loaded musket. I pushed open the corner door and began the first supper.

Take a breather to enjoy the scenery

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As warm days dawn upon us and we dig for our sandals and barbecue grills, it is time also to relish in the beauty of our environment, before it's too late. There are scads of state parks and forests in the region, offering everything from picnic tables to bridle trails, waiting to be appreciated. Here are some of the best:

Yes, paradise is within reach, and it's only about an hour away from Lewisburg. The place is called Ricketts Glen State Park, comprised of 13,050 acres extending through three counties (Luzerne, Sullivan and Columbia). The Glens Natural Area is the highlight of the park.

How would you like to hike down a trail which is surrounded by thick, lush greenery and cascading waters? Well, this utopian-like scenery is a reality for the three-mile triangular trail around the area. The waterfalls are where two branches of Kitchen Creek meet, having cut through the deep gorges of Ganoga Glen and Glen Leigh, then flowing through Ricketts Glen amongst the giant pines, hemlocks, and oaks. Many of the trees in the park are over 500 years old, which is obvious as you walk along and find quite a few of them fallen across the waters.

If you're going for the long haul, there are other trails which cover a total of about seven miles of ground, but the three-mile trail is ideal, for it ends exactly where you begin, and allows you to see a majority of the falls.

There are over 22 named waterfalls in the park, but the largest of all is the Ganoga falls, which towers 94 feet in height. Although it's no Niagara, 94 feet is quite a towering height to look up to. Each one of the waterfalls is unique, owing to their names, which are all of Colonel Robert Ricketts' friends and relatives. The Colonel was a Civil War veteran who purchased 80,000 acres of the park's land in the 19th century from his father and uncle. Since then the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has purchased the area for the state park.

The falls are perfect to visit on a sizzling hot day because they are easily accessible by walking on rocks through the water. Lying on the rocks under gently flowing waters seems the epitome of relaxation and a great way to stay cool.

In addition to the falls, Ricketts Glen offers many other recreational opportunities. There is a 245-acre lake on which sailboats and motorboats may roam. During the summer, you can even rent rowboats and canoes. Not a bad idea! Those who like to fish will also find a delight in the warm water game fish and panfish available.

And of course Ricketts Glen State Park offers campsites with cabins and tents for year-round use. Let's hear it for living in the wilderness!

To enjoy the captivating beauty of this park, and especially its falls, take Route 45 east out of Lewisburg to Route 147 north. Exit at Hughesville, where you will find Route 118. Take Route 118 until it leads into Route 487, then after three miles, make a left into the park. The trip is approximately 50 miles, but well worth the ride.

However, if you are in dire need to escape Bucknell and cannot wait a whole hour, R.B. Winter State Park will do the trick. A mere 18 miles away from Lewisburg, R.B. Winter is situated on 695 acres within the Bald Eagle State Forest. The park is in a narrow valley which is surrounded by oak forests on steep mountain ridges.

Although the park has no waterfalls to offer, it does have a beach, which is more than adequate for central PA. Halfway Lake is extremely cold to dip into, but then again, if you've been lying on the beach for hours, it will make no difference. Fishing enthusiasts will also appreciate the seven-acre lake for its brown, rainbow and brook trout.

R.B. Winter offers excellent camping facilities with 60 sites available for tents, trailers, and motor homes. Although trailers and motor homes may be out of the reach of college students, tents may be rented through Bucknell's Outing Club for a very small fee.

So if you're in the mood for a long and rigorous hike up a steep mountain, or just want to sack out by the beach, R.B. Winter is the closest alternative available. Just take Route 15 until it meets Route 192 (at the Uni Mart), take a left onto 192, and after a gorgeous 18 mile stretch, you're there. So go take a break by the beach—you probably need one.

Murray Reynolds Falls is one of over 22 captivating waterfalls to be enjoyed at Ricketts Glen State Park. It is located along the "Falls Trail," which extends three miles around in a triangle.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Halfway lake lies nestled amongst the oak, pine, and hemlock trees in a narrow valley. The area offers an abundance of recreational opportunities for those who wish to take advantage of them. Hiking, swimming, camping, fishing, and even hunting are just some of the possibilities.

Woodward Cave is worth the exploration

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you can handle the monotony of a 60-minute, over-rehearsed speech from Pete the tour guide and a 30-minute drive up route 45, a visit to Woodward Cave is a fabulous way to spend a day communing with nature. The cave, approximately 400,000,000 years old (yes, four hundred million), is Central Pennsylvania's largest live cavern and houses one of the largest stalagmites in the U.S.

The adventure, naturally, begins at the entrance of the cave, where Pete, the oh-so-eager-to-amuse tour guide explains the history of the cave and area once called the Valley of the Beech Tree. The cave, legend has it, was at one time a site for the religious ceremonies of the Seneca Indians. In the days of the early settler, the cave was known as Red Panther Cave, because the Seneca Chief's son, Red Panther, is said to have been buried somewhere in the cave after he was struck down by lightning for cutting down a sacred Beech tree. (Pete said no bodies have been found yet. "But maybe if we're lucky, we'll find one!" he smiles.)

Later, the cave gained another bit of interesting history by providing a shelter/hideout for a band of robbers. In 1925, the cave was opened to the public after years of digging, uncovering several cave rooms, and re-routing a small creek that ran through the cave.

Upon entering the cave, Pete notes that the temperature remains 48 degrees all year. ("BRRR," Pete shivers, "don't forget your jackets!") The Ballroom, the first room you will enter, Pete explains, is one of the five uncovered rooms that Woodward Cave boasts. The Ballroom is the area where the Indian ceremonials were held and is still used for square dances and banquets. Before entering the room, however, Pete excitedly points out Woodward Caves very own celebrity: The Kneeling Camel. The camel, once a feature for Ripley's Believe It or Not!, is a truly magnificent stalagmite that ironically resembles a life-size kneeling camel. Noting that it takes about 1000 years to build up one cubic inch of any stalagmite formation, Pete points out that it probably took 200,000,000 years for the Kneeling Camel to assume its shape.

Moving from the first room to the second, Pete absent-mindedly mentions the rather large population of hibernating bats that are stuck in clusters on the ceiling of the cave. Clumps of motionless bats are nestled in corners throughout the cave and the occasional early-to-rise-from-hibernation bat can be seen as well.

The second room, or, the Square room, is yet another feature of the cave. In this room, Pete points out the rare cave coral that adorns the walls. The third room is called the Hanging Forest because it features the largest collection of stalactites (or cone-shaped formations of limestone attached to the roof a cavern, for us non-cave people) in the cave.

At the point between the Hanging Forest and the much anticipated fourth room, Pete turns out every light in the cave to make a clever observation. The darkness that falls over the cave is undescribable. At no time will the eye adjust to the darkness, because it is so complete. On a lighter note, Pete explains that within a year, a person would go blind because of the excessive strain on the eye.

The fourth room, the Hall of Statues, is perhaps the most interesting room in the cave because it contains one of the largest stalagmites (formation of limestone on the floor of a cave) in the U.S. The "Tower of Babel" is approximately 20 feet tall and five feet wide, making the formation almost as old as the cave itself. The name of the structure, taken from the biblical tower, appropriately reflects a pathway that seems to ascend heavenward. The Upper Room, the fifth and final room of the cave, marks the end of the tour. In this last room, a cathedral-like ceiling rises 60 feet from the floor below.

After the tour, visitors are free to wander in the 19-acre campground area or browse through Woodward Cave's very own gift shop. To make reservations or for more information about the cave, call (814) 349-9800. Be sure to get Pete, the tour guide.

The Collegiate Perspective (and other fairy tales)

Peter Lalos

According to the most recently added section of Bucknell University's academic core requirement handbook (part five, article IV, subsection F, Vitamin A), each student enrolled at the institution is required to re-qualify for admission by passing a comprehensive examination covering topics and concepts of which the administration, faculty, and board of trustees believes every student should be knowledgeable. This ordinance, which has been in effect since the fall 1990 semester, outlines that only a perfect score on this exam will qualify students for re-admittance to the University for the following year.

Testing time: 15 minutes
Number of questions: Six

1) The source of controversy surrounding the Davis Gym facilities this past basketball season was which of the following?

a) That the word "Bisons" painted across the baseline of each end of the court is grammatically incorrect, since the plural form doesn't need an "s."

b) The fear that, when we faced off against Georgetown in the regional semi-final round of the NCAAs, there would be a lack of ample room for the CBS and ESPN television crews, as well as for the foreign press.

c) What was the name of the song that they played over the loudspeaker system during warm ups, right before Public Enemy's Can't Truss It? What a slammin' beat!

d) The fire marshall couldn't find a seat.

e) Two of the above.

2) The number "18" represents:

a) Celebrity status, if it's a senior room pick.

b) The percentage of males on campus who do not have a phobia of being caught unloading some female's underwear from the dryer so that he can use it.

c) The last day of exams for the spring semester next year if the Jan Plan is indeed abolished

d) The number of guys on campus who still have goatees since that big fad broke out last year after "New Jack City" was released.

e) Either A, B, C, or D.

3) The major complaint regarding next year's expected housing situation at the University is which of the following?

a) The Office of Residential Life is bragging too much about how well the off-campus requirements worked out.

b) The fraternities are too happy with the set-up.

c) Wasn't the enrollment here supposed to go down because of the recession? I guess I just don't understand America's economic infrastructure.

d) If you're living in a Swartz double next year and your roommate dies, does the 4.0 rule still apply even if the room was converted from a single due to the housing crunch?

e) Not enough of the above.

4) Which of the following curriculum changes passed by the University this past semester affects students the most?

a) The eradication of the January Plan, and the losses in revenue that local beer distributors are expected to sustain as a result.

b) The addition of several courses to the University's list of academic core requirements, because it will give us less time to watch television and do crossword puzzles.

c) When professors get so far behind schedule in their lecture syllabus that they eventually just decide to hold a plebiscite amongst the class members to decide what they're going to do for the remainder of the semester.

d) Visiting professors who use their classes here as guinea pigs for funky teaching techniques and grading systems

e) B and D— No, B and C... No, wait— ah, I just can't make up my mind. Whatever.

5) The perceived reason for the recent theft of parts of the "Seven Generations" display is which of the following?

a) A political statement about how far some college-age individuals still have to go before they reach full maturity

b) The action was that of an anti-abortion proponent— even though the display has nothing to do with this issue! Duh!

c) The perpetrator could only count up to four, and so he or she had to get the number of pieces in the display down to a workable number in order to feel comfortable with it

d) To make certain that the Bucknellian's "Letters to the Editor" pages would not be hurting for material this semester

e) 73% of the aforementioned

6) The question most commonly asked of student tour guides by perspectives visiting Bucknell is which of the following?

a) "How do they figure out what number is assigned to a course name?"

b) "Where do all the squirrels go at night?"

c) "How can some students claim an inability to read their own writing? What's up with that?"

d) "How could you allow a basketball team as obviously annoying as Fordham beat you in the Patriot League championships? Which ref was paid off?"

e) "Is that old guy standing over there at Vaughan Lit, like, a hobo or what?"

Extra Credit: Anybody who can get a job which does not involve food services or hauling mulch on your back this summer gets fifty bonus points.

When you have completed this examination and have turned it in to either the admissions office or a recycling bin, you may leave campus for the semester. So, happy trails, and remember— "Batman Returns" comes out June 19th.

Why is verbal harassment so misunderstood?

The men sitting in the classrooms of Bucknell look innocent enough. Many of them actually are. Some, though, once they've left the more formalized, equalized classroom setting, turn offensive. These men may not realize that their comments, gestures, and actions are harassing, but yet they are.

Women enter into group projects wondering if their opinions and capabilities will be respected or if they will be called "a typical woman," or worse upon expressing their ideas. Women who walk home alone from places like the library see the same men who sit next to them in class and discover that they do not look so innocent after dark. Light changes everything, and mindsets come into question.

Everyone arrives at Bucknell with a different perception of what is right and wrong to say. What some women will perceive as a joke or flirtation, others will find offensive. The meaning of sexual harassment is thus a hard one to define. If a classmate or colleague makes a sexual play on words to "lighten the mood" of a serious, but already uncomfortable discussion, are you the type of person who would appreciate the attempt to make everyone laugh and feel more at ease, or would you be offended? Should you be offended or complimented if someone asks you out because you're "a great girl" or "irresistible?" The comments on the sexual harassment quote boards placed around campus illustrate this confusion over the issue.

One person blamed the rise of the issue on "whiney feminists." Obviously this person believes that if women want to be treated equally then they must be equal in all ways and able to "be one of the boys" and to "joke like a man." Does this include being degraded or shown disrespect by way of irresponsible, unthinking comments? Surely no female or male should have to tolerate someone degrading her or his worth as a person. Essentially that is what sexual harassment is all about.

Education, in the form of lectures, roundtable discussions, quote boards, hall programs, and radio talk shows, has tried to erase the confusion over the issue. While many may think that they now know the definition of sexual harassment, they still think of the problem, except in extreme obvious cases, as a pseudo one, brought about by a small group of overly assertive women. As one man who called into WVBU's talk show on Sunday night said, "I don't hear any complaints."

This attitude is the crux of the problem. Few people, male or female, know how to address "casual" sexual harassment, even if they do recognize it. Responding to an insult, especially a sexual one, is difficult. Do you laugh it off? That solution hardly solves the problem and worse yet, often promotes continued comments. Do you speak your mind? Yes, but rationally. Raging does nothing more than cause misdirected anger and more misconceptions to occur about harassment.

A lot of times "harassers" are not conscious about what they are saying. They've blurted their words out without thinking of the meaning that they might convey. A calm explanation of why the comment is offensive to you promotes understanding and leaves the relationship intact. Both parties, female and male, will hopefully walk away from the situation with their pride and a heightened sense of responsibility about the words they choose to use. Of course, if repeated abuse continues, then there is a more deep-rooted problem and more serious action must be sought.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Writer wants campus to remember the victims

To the Editor:

When students here tell me they are tired of hearing about rape and harassment, I'd like to say, "You're not as tired as I am." Repeatedly women come to my office, one after another reporting incidents which leave them feeling humiliated, frightened, and traumatized. Many are afraid to take action fearing retaliation and many remain silent about their abuse. Sometimes it feels a little like a M*A*S*H unit here, where all we can do is triage; treat the wounded, prop them up, and send them back out to the battle zone of our current society. Maybe next time the blow will be shattering, maybe it will only graze them. Some will be able to laugh off these incidents with a "War is hell" attitude and others will never be the same.

This is National Victims' Rights Awareness Week, and I encourage everyone in the community to reflect on the escalating violence that has become a national disgrace. The backlash against women and other disenfranchised groups we are currently experiencing around the country and on this campus goes beyond finger-pointing and name-calling. When honest ideological disagreement turns into harassment, hate crimes, and violence, I fear we are headed for grave danger.

In difficult economic times, many who are insecure or feel their way of life is threatened need someone to blame for their anxiety. Others feeling angry and betrayed by the myth of the American dream strike out with violence. Women and children are unfortunately those who suffer most when hostilities arise, because in this society, they are seen as expendable. Consider, for example, the recent report from Washington that indicates nearly an 8% increase in violent crimes in this country last year, but a 59% increase in attempted and completed rapes. According to the Justice Department survey of 95,000 people in 48,000 representative households, 207,610 rapes or rape attempts were reported by crime victims in 1991. In Pennsylvania alone, 10,917 adult sexual assault victims and survivors were served by the Coalition Against Rape during the 1990-91 fiscal year, representing a 15.1% increase over the previous year. In the same period, 7,951 children were abused in this state.

When you consider that all of these victims will live with the scars of sexual assault and abuse for a lifetime, giving a few hours of your time as a Bucknell student or staff member to understand and prevent this epidemic seems a small sacrifice. Please think about what you can do to educate yourself and the community about these critical issues.

Yet some tell me, it's not their problem. They never experience discrimination. They don't treat women badly. They don't harass. They don't rape. But you do know those who do. What have you done to challenge their behavior, to stop them from mistreating and exploiting women? If the answer is nothing, then you, too, are part of the problem. You are allowing this epidemic to go unchecked. And you, too, whether you're male or female, will suffer the consequences of a misogynistic culture. A woman is beaten every 16 seconds, a rape occurs every six minutes in this nation and one in three women will suffer sexual abuse sometime during her life. Given these statistics, sooner or later, someone you know will be affected by male violence against women.

Yesterday, men and women from the campus and community participated in a Speakout for Sexual Assault Survivors and Take Back the Night March. The symbolic gesture of making a journey around campus to highlight the fact that women do not feel safe here, especially alone at night, was another of many efforts to raise awareness about the victimization of women. Those who participated represent a caring and active minority. You can join us by reporting incidents of harassment and assault, by speaking out against inappropriate behavior, by writing to our legislators for a more effective judicial system, by boycotting places and products that exploit women, by learning more about the problem and sharing that information with others.

If you couldn't be with us last night in taking a stand against violence directed at women, consider joining us at 7 p.m., Monday, May 4, in Room G208 Carnegie for "He Said, She Said," a program on harassment and assault organized by KDR and co-sponsored by the Sexual Harassment Task Force. Or attend the Mock Rape Trial, 7 p.m. Thursday, May 7, in the Forum, a program about the judicial process sponsored by Feminist Outreach. Think about it. Think about the 207,610 individuals, their friends, and family, who last year never imagined they'd have to deal with rape. Then think about who's next.

IVCF letter assumes religious homogenity

To the Editor:

We would like to personally thank the IVCF for explaining the meaning of the crucifixion and helping to clarify their interpretation to the Bucknell community in their letter to the editor. However, there were several points which were ambiguous. Their letter has two underlying assumptions: 1) The IVCF feels that everyone shares their beliefs, and 2) They have a firm grasp on the truth.

Our concern stems from the IVCF's constant reference to what they believe as the only "truth" and "fact" and the lack of acknowledgement of the validity of different religious beliefs.

The letter states "it is you and I who are directly responsible for the death of Jesus Christ." We find this offensive. We assert that we had absolutely nothing to do with the death of Jesus Christ, and we doubt that any other members of the Bucknell community did either. Basic logic indicates that one can have no complicity in an act committed before birth. Of course, the argument may be expanded to suggest that the "you and I" symbolizes society, implying that any society is responsible for the past deeds of its members. For example, we as 20th century Americans have a responsibility for injustices done to native Americans since such past action indeed affects today's society. Since Jesus died in 33 C.E., under a society ruled by the Romans, how then are 20th century Americans responsible for this? This blanket declaration of responsibility for Jesus' death makes theological implications with which many people do not agree.

Now we have no problem with the members of the IVCF holding their particular beliefs. It was very moving for this student group to share their holiday observances with Bucknell. Thankfully we live in a society that allows for freedom of religion. Our concern stems from the IVCF's constant reference to what they believe as the only "truth" and "fact" and the lack of acknowledgement of the validity of different religious beliefs. Their letter expresses that we are all in a state of sin until we accept Jesus Christ in a manner acceptable to them. Perhaps this paternalistic condescendence is best illustrated with their statement "that whether we wish to admit it or not, the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ affects us all in an intensely personal way" (emphasis added.) Such statements assert that all humans are in a state of sinfulness and Jesus is the sole means of absolution. Since these statements are not universal beliefs, such assumptions as referring to all we find to be in error.

We are not advocating that the IVCF change its own religious tenets. We are advocating that they neither transpose what they believe to be true onto the entire Bucknell community, nor assume that the Bucknell community is religiously homogeneous.

Reward offered

To the Editor:

The Bucknell InterFraternity Council, in light of the recent thefts from five of the fraternity houses, is offering a $200 reward for information leading to the apprehension of the criminals. With a combined estimated value of over $6000, the fraternities involved have been placed in a situation that jeopardizes their financial standing. We are hopeful that an act like this will not occur again and we feel that the apprehension of the criminals is the best possible deterrent. Please send any information to Pete Brady, Box C-770 or call me at 523-6831. Thank you.

Political is personal

By Jessen Havill

Over the past four years I have grown increasingly upset with a group of Bucknellian contributors who insist on treating politics as an abstract game. Political dialogue needs to become much more than a tournament of wit in which multiple sides volley ideas back and forth hoping to outsmart each other. The players of this game do not seem to realize that the ideas they are volleying contain much more than hot air. It is crucial that we all understand that when we engage in political conversation we are playing with intimate sources of meaning in people's lives. The political is personal.

Many people on this campus seem to find tremendous gratification in espousing meaningless academic political jargon which serves to invalidate the personal experiences of women, minorities and any other oppressed group to which the writers do not belong. They are dealing in abstractions as if none of the popular political issues of our time have anything to do with human beings at all. An example is the claim by some that offensive sexual graffiti, verbal abuse, and obscene gestures are merely examples of "free expression." It scares me to death that people can take these violent acts completely out of a human context. If there is to be any degree of change in this troubled world, everyone must nurture the capacity to empathize with others and develop corresponding political agendas. Solely espousing political doctrine one has learned from books without understanding its application to the lives of one's neighbors is a big mistake.

Solely espousing political doctrine one has learned from books without understanding its application to the lives of one's neighbors is a big mistake.

This breed of political discourse is considerably foreign to myself and other progressive voices who have entered political discourse out of anger at an oppressive system, a personal experience of discrimination, or empathy for our friends who have been damaged by a very real system of oppression. I personally didn't even know what politics was before I came to Bucknell. But through close friendships with individuals who had already acquired a sensitivity to progressive issues and others who were currently being seriously injured by discrimination, oppression and violence, my eyes were opened to the reality of struggle. I got involved because I loved these people who were being hurt and wanted to do everything I could to help them. And then I realized that by helping them I was helping everyone and things came into focus on a systemic level. But none of my ideas originated in a textbook. Since then I have read a great deal of theory to understand these problems systemically, but the passion began through love.

This is the wonderful thing about grassroots political movements. They are organized out of a local concern for something of value in a community. They are not abstract. A grass-roots movement is a very real manifestation of love for the people of a community. These movements should be the true model for our political systems. For anyone who thinks grass-roots organizers are unqualified for "important" offices, I offer the example of my grandfather who went straight from grass-roots organizing in Delaware to become that state's governor.

A well-known feminist belief is that the personal is political is sprititual. This orientation is of utmost importance if what we have to say in political forums is to be effective. We must get in touch with the human side of politics because none of the subjects of political debate are abstract. Each of us has a stake in every political decision that is made in the great shrines of Washington. And every political decision we make in our daily lives affects the people around us. So the next time you write an article or shout out a political statement, take the time to think about its ramifications rather than concentrating on how popular it will make you.

Reader questions the need for gay, lesbian, bisexual advisor

To the Editor:

I want to express my surprise that in these hard economic times Bucknell University has the necessary excess funds to hire a part-time "gay/lesbian/bisexual" advisor, Mr. Matthew Frericks.

I would be curious to know how many students feel they need a gay/etc. advisor, because I believe that gays are a small segment of the population, and I would be surprised if Bucknell University has a larger number of gays, etc. than the general public.

In a Bucknellian article, one of the reasons noted for Mr. Frericks's hiring was to promote tolerance for gays/etc. Maybe I missed it in The Daily Item, but I haven't read about any criminal acts perpetrated against gays/etc. in Lewisburg. If a student is busy getting an education, no one should harass him/her unless that person tries to persuade others to join his lifestyle against their will.

As for the argument that gays/etc. are excluded, I find that hard to believe. If a person is at Bucknell University, that person should be interested first and foremost in getting an education. If a student shows up for class, no professor would have the insensitivity to question any student on his sexuality or grade him/her according to the answer.

Gays/etc. must realize that not everyone agrees with their lifestyle. Especially we are offended by some militant gay groups like Queer Nation and Act Up. I, for one, could care less what a person's sexual preference is. As long as that person does not infringe on my rights of privacy, I accord that person the same rights.

I am just afraid that by allowing one minority group their "advisor" many other minority students like the Chinese, Indian, deaf, blind, etc. will feel that they also deserve an advisor. Bucknell University may have opened a can of worms.

The brothers of Delta Upsilon will present the seventy-seventh annual Demie Play this weekend.

BY MEGAN BLAMBLE

Believe it or not, that time of year has crept up on us once again. That is, the long-awaited spring weekend when Delta Upsilon entertains Bucknell's campus with its annual Demie Play. This Friday and Saturday, at 8 p.m. in Coleman Theater, Delta Upsilon will present The Grail, a delightful take-off on the infamous Holy Grail.

This year's production was collaboratively written and directed by Alexander Lyras '92, Jim Zervanos '92, and Lee Guzofski '93, with the intention of offering a production different from those of years past. The Grail has not only a comedic script geared toward the amusement of college students, but also conveys a deep and thought-provoking message. Guzofski, one of the playwrights, claims, "It's a play that anyone can appreciate because it's about life and assessing what's most important."

Depicting the life of six college buddies post graduation, the play incorporates numerous college themes. In addition, witty scenes based on the medieval quest for the Holy Grail are cleverly interspersed to parallel the six characters' quests for the meaning of life.

This year marks the seventy-seventh annual Demie Play to be performed by Delta Upsilon. The performance is a result of a cooperative effort by all members of the fraternity and has become a tradition enjoyed not only by the audience, but the brothers who participate as well.

Tickets will be sold at the door for $5. All proceeds from the performance will go to the March of Dimes.

Chorale presents final concert

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell University Concert Chorale, under the direction of William Payn, associate professor of music and director of choral studies, will present its final concert of the season tonight at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center. Accompanying the chorale will be David Cover on piano.

Tonight's concert is divided into four sections. Part I consists of three numbers: Coelos Ascendit Hodie, Opus 38 by Charles Villiers Stanford; Canzona Bergamasca by Samuel Scheidt; and The Spirit of the Lord by Barrie Cabena. Joining the 47-member chorale on Canzona Bergamasca and The Spirit of the Lord will be the Commonwealth Brass Ensemble. This five-member ensemble includes William Kenny, assistant professor of music, on French horn.

The second portion of the concert will include the performance of Mozart's Missa Brevis in C Major, K. 259. Written in 1776 when the composer was only twenty years of age, Missa Brevis is a religious work done in six movements: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus.

Part III of tonight's performance will open with Zigeunerleben, Opus 29, No. 3 by Robert Schumann. The concert chorale recently performed this piece in last Saturday's PRISM concert. Zigeunerleben will be followed by Kirke Mechem's Island in Space, Opus 54 (Dona Nobis Pacem). This piece contains a text by Russell Schweickart, who was the first astronaut to make an unattached space walk, and the writer Archibald MacLeish.

The final portion of tonight's concert will have a lighthearted tone. Little David, arranged by Norman Luboff, will start Part IV of the concert. Chorale member Karen Losch '93 will join David Cover at the piano for this number. The performance will continue with a rendition of George Gershwin's Embraceable You, followed by Soon-Ah Will Be Done, arranged by William Dawson. The final selection of the evening will be Lee Hoiby's Hymn to the New Age. This piece has become a staple in the repertoire of the concert chorale. The group first performed it early last semester in an all-Hoiby performance. Since then Hymn to the New Age has been performed several times by both the Concert Chorale and the Rooke Chapel Choir.

Tonight's performance is free of charge and open to the public. Seating is unreserved.

Some Singers sing some songs

BY CHRIS BIRD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Some Singers Spring Jamboree was exactly that: a jamboree, full of entertainment, music, and fun. The concert, which took place last Saturday in a Bison filled to capacity with students and parents alike, was an energetic and extremely well-done event. Some Singers, along with special guests, the Haverford/Bryn Mawr Looney Tunes, performed for over an hour and all left the Langone Center with smiles on their faces.

Concert Review

Some Singers began in the spring of 1990 as a quartet made up of Alex Bergmann '92, Chris Szara '92, Jon McBurney '92, and Mike Baittinger '93. The four guys came together in order to sing a capella music from religious works to modern a capella by artists like the Nylons and the Manhattan Transfer. Five semesters later, the group is made up of Bergmann, who also manages Some Singers, Szara, McBurney, Andrew Hoover '94, Ken Laurora '95, Jason Spiegelman '95, and Brian Wilhour GR, who is also the musical director.

The septet opened the show with Where Everybody Knows Your Name from the NBC comedy Cheers. They then went on to bring back some childhood memories with The L-Y Song by Tom Lehrer. The song, originally performed on The Electric Company, allowed each member of the group to showcase their individual talents.

Some Singers then gave up the stage for the Haverford/Bryn Mawr Looney Tunes, a 12-member, co-ed a capella group. They opened the show with the spiritual Elijah Rock and continued with the Creedence Clearwater Revival favorite, Down on the Corner. The group offered a wonderful mix of singing plus "body percussion," snapping their fingers, slapping their chests, and imitating drum solos and beats. The Looney Tunes' performance was designed to raise social awareness with pieces such as African Skies. They debuted a version of James Taylor's Mexico and ended their portion of the program with Sweet Dreams Are Made Of This by the Eurhythmics. Sweet Dreams, by far their best piece, offered an incredible blend of voices and really left the audience wanting more.

The audience got what they wanted when the Some Singers returned for their part of the show. The guys began with One Fine Day by the Nylons, which was arranged by and featured Jason Spiegelman. The group then went on to do two pieces by P.D.Q. Bach, Who Oh Who and Please, Kind Sir. Somes (as they call themselves) went on to do an excellent job on Kiss The Girl from the smash Disney film The Little Mermaid. The group made you feel like you were in the lagoon with the animated characters and Spiegelman again did a great job as the featured vocalist.

After the King's Singers version of the Beatles' Can't Buy Me Love, the septet, who are all members of the Rooke Chapel Choir, sang Little Red Riding Hood, led by the powerful bass of Alex Bergmann. The group sang The Philosopher's Song from Monty Python's Flying Circus and a beautiful barber shop lullaby, Tell Me Why. Some Singers went on to end their show with their signature piece, the Java Jive by the Manhattan Transfer, and Lonesome Road, as a tribute to the Harmonics, the recently disbanded co-ed a capella group of Bucknell. The crowd applauded enthusiastically enough to pull an encore out of the seven guys, and what an encore it was. Zombie Jamboree, by Rockapella, was fully choreographed and allowed Brian Wilhour demonstrate his vocal talents. This "impromptu" encore was filled with clapping, sound effects, and an ominous coffin opening in the introduction. The group definitely saved their best for last.

The singers' final performances of the year will be on May 8 and 9 at the Bucknell Dance Company concert in the Weis Center. The septet will be singing a piece commissioned by the dance company and written by Some Singers musical director Brian Wilhour. Wilhour wrote a piece that is a reaction to death. The work, written in Latin, utilizes extended vocal and compositional techniques. Wilhour commented, "I am really excited about having my work premiered at the Weis Center."

With the end of the year comes graduation, and Some Singers will be losing some excellent members. Wilhour, who will attend Westminster Choir College next fall, said this about the group: "Working with Some Singers has been an exceptional experience. It has required much time and energy, writing, arranging and rehearsing music, but not without great reward. Some of my best friends are in the group, and I am certainly proud to have been a part of it."

Sentiments such as this are felt throughout the group. "Singing with this group is one of the things I enjoy most about being at Bucknell," said Bergmann. "We [Some Singers] want to thank our advisor, Dr. Catherine Payn, and the Music Department for their enthusiastic support. Without them, we would not be able to maintain this ensemble."

Some Singers are recruiting male vocalists for the 1992-1993 season. If you have some singing experience and would like to audition, please contact Alex Bergmann at X5047. If you are interested in the Bucknell Dance Company performance, contact the Weis Center box office at X1000 during normal business hours.

Music series closes with style

Violinist Pinchas Zukerman and pianist Mark Neikrug will close out the Weis Center Reverberations Series with their performance tomorrow night. Tickets are available through the Weis Center Box Office.

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN

Tomorrow night will be a monumental date for classical music lovers from miles around. Appearing at the Weis Center will the a world-renowned violinist Pinchas Zukerman, along with pianist Mark Neikrug.

Zukerman, whose intelligent interpretations of some of the most beautiful compositions, both famous and obscure, has performed with the world's most famous symphonies, including the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the London Philharmonic Orchestra, the Cleveland Orchestra, and many others.

The one-time conductor and music director of the St. Paul's Chamber Orchestra in St. Paul, Minnesota, Zukerman has an exclusive recording contract with BMG Classics, and his RCA recordings are soon to be re-released. He has recorded several hundred pieces in a style that makes listeners close their eyes and envision a picture to fit the music. Reviewing a recent recital, the Chicago Tribune reported, "Zukerman and his exceptionally congruent and committed pianist Marc Neikrug presented a memorable recital. Violin and piano functioned throughout in inspired dialogue, continually sparking the best of what each was capable of producing."

A world-class violinist, 43-year-old Zukerman has performed with some of the most famous musicians in the world, including Itzhak Pearlman, Yo-Yo Ma, and Isaac Stern. His performances with various symphonies have seen him play next to some of the greatest conductors of the time, including Lorin Mazel, Zubin Mehta, and Leonard Bernstein. His talent allows him to play next to other musicians without dwarfing their efforts, as reviewed by The New York Times' Robert Schwartz: "Mr. Zukerman refuses to be a showman, and thus gets shunted out of the limelight. He comes out on top, where it counts, however, not in easy, visceral thrills, but in purely musical rewards."

Zukerman and Neikrug will be joined on stage by Bucknell junior David Chrzanowski, who has been selected to turn pages for the duo. When asked about the forthcoming honor, Chrzanowski responded, "I am looking forward to the opportunity of seeing a musician of the caliber of Mr. Zukerman first-hand. It should be a lot of fun to see him do his stuff." Chrzanowski, a music major, is a member of the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Bucknell Concert Chorale, and is the assistant student organist for Sunday morning services in Rooke Chapel.

Tickets for the concert are still available, cost $20 ($10 with a B.U. ID), and are sold on a first-come first-serve basis. Any questions can be directed to the Weis Center box office at 523-1000 during normal hours. The concert starts at 8 p.m., and is part of the Reverberations ticket series.

In the shadow of the spotlight

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As this year's graduating class advances from the ranks of the student body to the status of alumni, the Department of Theatre and Dance especially regrets the passage of one senior in particular. Kristen Feeney '92 has occupied the position as stage manager for the Bucknell Dance Company since her freshman year.

Student Profile

Graduating as a theatre major, Feeney has maintained a fascination with the performing arts since grammar school. A native of Brooklyn, New York, she points to her close proximity to Manhattan as a key factor in supporting her interest, stating, "My family grew up on Broadway."

Feeney's entrance into the department came when the department was desperate for a dance company stage manager. "She came to us when no one else would," explained Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance. Feeney added that before she even knew what the position required, she was hired. "I went to a production meeting and the decision was made for me. I was it."

Since then, Feeney has compiled an impressive resume. Stage managing most of the dance concerts in the last four years, she has worked in all three Bucknell theatres and has accompanied the Bucknell Dance Company to Franklin and Marshall and Dickinson Colleges.

Stage management is perhaps the most straining of all performing arts jobs. The responsibilities are endless, and the position usually goes unrecognized by the audience. Entering the show during tech week, the week before opening night, the stage manager gains complete control of the production through closing night. Learning cues, moments in the production when there is a change in lights, sound, or images; watching out for the safety of the dancers; and overseeing the crew are just a fraction of the tasks a stage manager has to be aware of at all times.

Why would anyone want to stay with a job like that for four years? It's simple, according to Feeney. "I get a rush out of it. Each show is about an hour and a half long, and it's an intensive hour and a half of pressure. Nothing happens until I say go." But at the same time, she is quick to point out, "If something goes wrong, it's my fault." During a dance show that could be any number of things—a dancer injuring herself or himself because the floor wasn't swept, lights not coming up on time, or dancers making late entrances.

Extending her experience beyond dance, Feeney has worked in the theatre as well, stage managing The Latin American Project and Live at Bucknell at Bucknell and assistant stage managing 42nd Street and Jesus Christ Superstar at a theatre company in New York. In addition, she has acted in Godspell with Catholic Campus Ministry and in Cabaret and History of American Film at Bucknell. Although she has enjoyed both being in the spotlight and working the behind the scenes, Feeney admits, "I love performing, but stage management is steadier work. As a stage manager, when the show is done, you're the one who is in control."

Following graduation, Feeney hopes to attempt a career in professional theatre, possibly live television shows. "Live performances are the closest thing to stage managing. It's a fast-paced, down-to-the-second type thing." Feeney credits the dance company with preparing her for a job in the performing arts. "Danna [Frangione] gave me the opportunity. She really believed in me. She pushed me and then she pushed the technical aspects of the dance company because she saw I had the potential. I'm very confident of my skills."

Feeney will call (read) the cues for the Bucknell Dance Company's final performance next Friday and Saturday May 8 and 9 at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center. Tickets are $4 and available through the Weis Center Box Office.

Track seeks to defend titles at Holy Cross

Men's and women's teams take on the role of underdog for the first time in a number of years as Army is expected to sweep

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

No more preparation meets. This one's for all the marbles. Every member of the men's and women's track and field teams will finally come together to defend their Patriot League Outdoor Championships. It's what the track season is all about.

"It's what you work for all year," said head coach Art Gulden. "We finally get to test ourselves to find out if all the training and preparation we did has gotten us ready."

For the first time since anyone on the team can remember, neither the men nor the women are favored to win. Army will bring two strong and heavily favored squads to Holy Cross this weekend to try to take home the trophy in its first Patriot League competition.

"You could put together an All-Star team of throwers from the other schools and not touch Army," commented Gulden. "Without those events, it would be one hell of a track meet."

The one-day format, which the coaches voted against but the athletic directors eventually decided upon, is going to tax the great number of multi-event participants of each school. "It's not abusive, but it certainly is tough," reacted Gulden. The format will be voted on again this week.

No matter what the format, the Bison appear physically healthy, with two notable exceptions. Tom Wuchenich '92 fractured his elbow this past weekend at the Penn Relays steeplechase. He will wear a soft cast and run in the 5,000-meter race, but will not enter the steeplechase—an event most people expected him to win. "Anytime a senior is hindered by an injury it's tough, especially when it keeps him out of his favorite event," said Gulden. "Our loss in the steeplechase turns into our gain in the 5,000-meters." The other injured Bison is sprinter Dana Harbst '93. She also got hurt at the Penn Relays last weekend.

Other than the two injuries, Penn Relays and the Millersville Metrics provided the teams with some valuable last minute preparation for the Championships. Matt Deardorff '92 placed tenth in the 10,000-meter run in 29:44.30—good for ninth on Bucknell's all-time list and an IC4A bid. Bob Kelly '92 also qualified for IC4As in that event by virtue of his 18th place time of 30:01.37.

However, the highlight of the meet was the women's 4x200-meter relay team, which set a new school record with a time of 1:43.68. The quartet responsible was Bridget Dean '95, Audra Wilson '94, Tricia Plasko '92, and Tameka Hinton '95.

At Millersville, Rick Van Emburgh '95 took third in the 400-meter hurdles. Ella Episcapo '92 notched her second straight career-best performance in as many weeks in the long jump with a 34'-7" mark.

Tomorrow's championship hasn't been handed over to the Cadets just yet. "If you look at the potential scoring charts, Army wins easily, but you don't had out trophies for potential," stated Gulden. "You still have to perform on that day."

Other than Army, the Lehigh men could give the Bison trouble. On the women's side, Lafayette will pose a threat, and Fordham will show the effects of several key losses due to injury or sickness.

"Beating Army's going to be a bear. I'm anxious to see how we react to be an underdog at the conference level," said Gulden.

Freshman Lisa Young's four goals propelled the women's lacrosse team to an 8-7 win over UMBC on Wednesday in the team's final game of 1992. The win was the third for the Bison in their last five games. Tri-captain goalkeeper Kahra Foster '92, who is second on Bucknell's all-time save list, stopped 13 shots in the see-saw battle. Tri-captain Dorie Lynn Ellwood '92 scored a goal in the second half, giving her 100 points for her career.

Ellwood has now recorded a goal or an assist in 13 straight games this year, and has only been held scoreless once. She finishes her career fifth on the school's all-time scoring list. Head coach Jen Averill said, "Dorie Lynn is one of the most effective and versatile players that I have had the pleasure of coaching."

Tri-captain Leslie Why '92 looks to pass during last weekend's game against the Drexel Dragons.

On Monday the Bison pummelled Shippensburg 10-1. Foster was brilliant in goal, as she turned away a season-high 22 shots. It is the second time this year that Foster has allowed just one goal, and her team now has a record of 5-1 when she allows fewer than eight goals in a game.

In the win over Shippensburg, Ellwood and Tracey Freeman '95 had two goals apiece. Six other Bison scored in the rout.

On Saturday, Bucknell was defeated by Drexel 13-7, despite hat-tricks by Ellwood and Leigh Owens '95. Drexel jumped out to a 7-3 lead in the first half, and the Bison could not recover. Lee Mullray-Rowen netted four goals for Drexel.

Janelle Brown '95 finished the season strongly, as she scored goals in four of her last six games for a season total of seven goals and two assists. Tri-captain Leslie Why '92 also had a remarkable season. Why, who recently reached the 100-point mark for her career, finished the year second on the squad behind Ellwood in scoring with 15 goals and seven assists. Why is among the all-time scoring leaders at Bucknell, with 71 goals and 41 assists. Averill speaks highly of her senior forward, saying, "Leslie is one of the most tenacious and skilled players I have coached, and she is a great all-around player."

Goalkeeper Kahra Foster '92 makes one of her 12 saves against Drexel during last Saturday afternoon's 13–7 home loss. She is second on Bucknell's all-time career saves list with 660. The team is 5–1 when Foster allows less than eight goals.

Discs start to take flight on campus

Students take advantage of recent spring weather to play "Mud Shark"

BY DOUG LLEWELLYN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This is the third in a series of recreational sports stories by Doug Llewellyn

Our academic quad is transformed every spring into an outdoor study area, a "beach" for catching those intense Lewisburg rays, and an arena for hours of frisbee throwing. Now that warm sunny days have become a little more frequent and class attendance a little less popular, more and more people are picking up discs and having fun. Students on Bucknell's campus are throwing their discs both recreationally and competitively.

Ever since I can remember, people have been throwing frisbees or , as many people now call them, discs.

Whether it be on a beach, in a park, in your own backyard, or on a college campus, frisbee throwing can be seen and done anywhere.

It is easy, inexpensive, and it only takes two people and a small plastic disc. Large numbers of students on Bucknell's campus havebeen playing disc since I have beenhere, and the numbers appear to begrowing. It takes relatively no advanced planning, except maybe some help from Mother Nature.

As you have probably already noticed, people play disc on the quad, Freas lawn, Swartz field, fraternity lawns, and even sometimes fraternity hallways. Any place on campus with some unoccupied air is a good place to relax and toss a disc.

Competitive frisbee playing has also grown in popularity here at Bucknell. There are both men's and women's teams that compete with other schools in the demanding sport of ultimate frisbee. The men's team competes both in the fall and the spring in an intercollegiate league. The teams are not sanctioned by the NCAA, but they are all members of the UPA, Ultimate Players Association. The men's record was a bit disappointing this season finishing just under .500, but Steve Guenther '92 says, "We have a strong class of freshmen so the team will be improving."

On the women's side, The Peace Frogs, as their team is called, have been working hard all season despite not having an adequate practice field. A limited number of interested women and a field next to the cemetery has hindered the development of the team, but they are starting to win.

"Our first win this weekend at Haverford has given the team confidence and hope for a positive future," says Sharon Friedman '92.

As you can see the competitive side of frisbee throwing is up and flying here at Bucknell. If people are interested, it sounds like both teams are always looking for more players.

Whether you are interested in relieving stress or creating some on a playing field, throwing a disc can do both. It is not hard to pick up a frisbee and have a toss, and if you really like it, try ultimate.

Crew rows to third–place finish at Patriot Leagues

The men's and women's crew teams combined to place third in the Patriot League rowing Championships. Fordham University won, and Army placed second.

The varsity women's eight (Melanie Muehe '94, Jen Criss '94, Gretchen Maton '92, Megan Buehler '94, Tina Pinto '94, Kathy Kolasheski '92, Kristin Gundersen '92, Shannon Owens '92, and coxswain Erin Burns '93) had the "best race they've had all season," according to women's coach Anne Shapiro. The women were easily able to defeat Lafayette College and Fordham. Army's varsity women prevailed.

Bucknell's varsity women began the race at a 45 rating off the start. After their high 20 they settled to a rating of 35 strokes per minute for the majority of the 2,000 meter race. Bucknell's women had a strong sprint, bringing the rating up to a 37. Kolasheski was excited with the boats performance, stating that, "We pulled hard as a boat and came through."

Tennis takes fifth at league championships

Bison (7–7) host second annual Patriot League Tournament by virtue of their championship last season, but fail to defend title

BY JON BLUMBERGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This past weekend the men's tennis team ended its season with the Patriot League men's tennis Championships. Eight Patriot League teams competed: Army, Bucknell, Colgate, Fordham, Holy Cross, Lafayette, Lehigh, and Navy. Bucknell, with nearly half of its squad comprised of freshmen, was looking to make a good showing at the tournament.

Each of the singles players competed to win points for the team. Cris Stenstrom '94 competed in the number one position for Bucknell. Stenstrom convincingly won his first round match against Lafayette's Tom O'Conner by a score of 6-3, 6-0. In the second round, Stenstrom faced Army's Jamie Malakoff, but was defeated by the eventual bracket one singles champion of the 1992 tournament. Stenstrom earned Bucknell two team points in singles competition.

At the number two singles position, Mark McGuire '95 drew an unlucky draw, facing Army's Mike Haight in the first round. Haight went all the way to the finals of the Championships. * However, McGuire won the consolation tournament by defeating Holy Cross's Chris Callanan (6-1, 6-4) and Lafayette's Vikram Swamy (6-4, 6-1). McGuire earned one point for the team in singles competition.

Playing number three for Bucknell in his last Patriot League Championship appearance was captain Andrew Cantor '92. Cantor defeated Holy Cross's John Hancir by a score of 6-2, 6-1. Cantor was then defeated by Navy's Frank Bronson, the eventual third singles champion. In singles competition, Cantor earned two points for Bucknell . Cantor feels the team could have performed better as a whole, but that there were some strong individual performances.

Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian

Chris Rimpel '93 advanced to the second round before falling to Lafayette's number four singles player in three sets.

At the number four singles position, Chris Rimpel '93 defeated Lafayette's Steve Solomon by a score of 2-6, 6-2, 6-4. In the second round, Rimpel was defeated by Colgate's Peter Reiss 7-6 (10-8), 6-2. Rimpel earned two points for the Bison in singles competition.

In the number five singles position, Mike Price '95 was defeated by Colgate's Rob Vassel. In the consolation tournament, Price defeated Holy Cross's Brian Brandt by a score of 6-4, 6-1. Price won the consolation tournament after Lafayette's Brad Pursel had to default. Price earned Bucknell a point with his singles performance.

At the sixth singles position, Rick Zeoli '95 was defeated by Lafayette's Todd Smith in the first round. Zeoli won his first consolation round, defeating Fordham's Justin DeSantis 6-2,6-3. Colgate's Doug Scipione defeated Zeoli in the finals of the consolation tournament. Zeoli's play earned a half point for the Bucknell team.

Playing number one doubles for Bucknell was the team of Stenstrom-McGuire. They dominated their first round by defeating Colgate's Adam Gooze and Jeff Fivecoat by a score of 6-2, 6-1. Stenstrom and McGuire were defeated by Army's Mike Haight and Chris Waters, the eventual winners of the number one doubles bracket. Stenstrom and McGuire earned two team points in doubles competition.

The doubles team of Cantor-Rimpel competed at the number two doubles position for Bucknell. Cantor and Rimpel were defeated by Navy's Dan Gordon and Quinn Fionda. The doubles team of Price-Greg Downing '94 was defeated by Army's Jamie Malakoff and Marty Whalen, the eventual champions of the number three doubles bracket.

The final results of the tournament put Bucknell in fifth place with a total of 10.5 points. Army dominated the tournament with 48 points.

Athlete of the Week

Bill Rinker '92

Baseball player Bill Rinker '92 has been selected as The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of Apr. 24-30.

Rinker earned Co-Patriot League Player of the Week, an honor that he shared with Fordham secondbaseman Santy Gallone. The senior was a hitting powerhouse last week. He batted .500, eight-for-16, on the week. In addition, Rinker picked up nine runs batted in and scored four times. The shortstop also performed well defensively, recording seven putouts and 17 assists and turning four double plays.

Rinker came into last week hitting just .172. Last week's impressive play raised his batting average 65 points, up to .237.

Women's H_2O polo goes to nationals

Victoria Gorman '93 leads team to fourth place at Eastern Championships

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's water polo team enjoyed a stroke of luck in last week's bid for a spot at Nationals. After placing fourth at the Eastern Championship Tournament, the Bucknell women believed their season to be over. That sense of disappointment did not last long, however, as the Harvard team gave up its spot at the national competition because of financial problems. The water polo coaches' association decided to offer the seventh seed at Nationals to the Bison, who had so narrowly missed on the chance the prior weekend.

Last weekend's tournament at Brown was a frustrating one for the Bucknell women, who came away with a 2-3 record. The team played one of its two best games just after its arrival in Providence, RI on Friday evening.

The game, against Massachusetts Institute of Technology, was close from the get-go. The Bison went up 3-0 early in the first quarter and were ahead 5-3 at the end of the period. Lisa Bell '94 enjoyed an action-filled first period, throwing in three of her team's five goals.

Virtually the entire second quarter belonged to the MIT players. They played to a 5-5 tie before Victoria Gorman '93, a member of the U.S. Senior National "B" team, scored at the 2:19 mark.

The following period saw much more action, with Gorman taking control offensively for the Bison. The junior scored three more during that time frame. MIT then battled to another tie with 2:47 left in the quarter, and the scored flip-flopped from there. The Bison looked to be down by one after three when MIT scored with a mere six seconds left on the clock. At the buzzer, however, Bell took matters into her own hands, scoring off the change of possession to create a 10-10 tie.

> "We want to play our best to show the California teams that East Coast water polo teams can play up to their level."
> — Victoria Gorman '93

In the final period of regulation play, it was a defensive battle. MIT tossed in two more, and Bucknell had yet to light up the scoreboard with four minutes left to play. Then, it was all Bell and Gorman, each of whom scored one. Bell's goal came at 3:54, while Gorman saved the day with 17 ticks left on the clock. Her sixth goal served to tie the score and bring the game to overtime.

In the post-regulation play, Bucknell went up 13-12 on yet another Gorman toss-in, and the team never looked back. Wendy Sheldon '93 turned it on during the two 5:00 overtime periods, and credit must be given to her for the eventual outcome. Sheldon, a co-captain of next year's varsity swim team, powered her way into three goals, and Gorman added another to render the final score 17-14 in Bucknell's favor.

The following day, Bucknell met Wesleyan, Maryland, and Slippery Rock. The Bison beat the first team, but lost to each of the other two. Both Maryland and Slippery Rock boast many U.S. Senior National teammates of Gorman's and are the top two teams in the East. Against Wesleyan, Gorman racked up an impressive 11 of Bucknell's 18 goals.

On Sunday, the Bison met Harvard in a game that would determine the coveted third-place spot, that which would yield a space at the National competition. In that contest, Bucknell tenaciously battled back from a 3-8 deficit to bring the score to 11-11 with 2:23 left to play. Harvard then had one last surge to score at the 2:15 mark. Unfortunately, the Bison could not set up an answering play with which to score, and they suffered a disappointing 11-12 loss.

Goal scorers for the Bison against Harvard included: Bell (4), Gorman (4), Anne Marie Nielsen '94 (2), and Jen Reeb '92 (1).

The Bucknell women's water polo team will travel to Virginia the weekend of May 15-17 for Nationals. The Bison are scheduled to take on Slippery Rock and University of California-Davis in their openers. "We hope to get things together to prove that we deserve to be at Nationals. We want to play our best to show the California teams [who dominate in water polo] that East Coast water polo teams can play up to their level," says Gorman.

in the league in doubles with eight on the season. Nationally, these two Bucknell players rank among the best, as well. Hoehn is an impressive seventh in RBI, while Fink is 14th in doubles and 15th in steals.

As a team, Bucknell is second in the Patriot League in batting average (.298), average runs scored (5.48/game), and ERA (2.44). The Bison are also tied for first in fielding percentage (.934) with the number one team in the league, Army.

The Bucknell women have clinched the third seed at the championship tournament in Bethlehem, PA this weekend. They are scheduled to take on number six seed Lafayette at 4 p.m. today. Unless they suffer an upset, the Bison will move on in the "winners bracket" to take on the victor of the Lehigh (#2)/Holy Cross (#7) game. Who knows? Maybe the Bison will have a chance to avenge last year's overtime championship loss to Army. Bucknell fans sure hope so.

weather to help start the games earlier. Therefore, all of the athletes who have games this weekend would also have exams this coming week to worry about.

Lisa Fink '93, who starts for both the basketball and softball teams, was thankful for the Jan Plan. "It gave me a chance to recover from a stressful couple of weeks of studying," said Fink. "I wouldn't want to worry about Championships and final exams the same weekend, which would be the case this weekend if there weren't a Jan Plan."

Gulden, whose teams have always enjoyed tremendous success both on the track and in the classroom, said, "If you're prepared it shouldn't be that big a deal. It might even stop kids from putting things off until the last week."

Head softball coach Terrie Grieb will be glad to see Jan Plan end. "We'll have everybody back on campus sooner so we can start workouts," said Grieb. "The whole key will be where spring break falls on the school calendar."

Indeed, all of the coaches will be able to schedule trips to warmer climates much easier if the break comes earlier than it does now. The southern schools start their conference seasons earlier and don't want to face too many out-of-conference opponents. Baseball players who have been begging to go south every break may now get the chance.

Colgate dropped its Jan Plan format two years ago and now has to petition a board for permission to play during reading period. Colgate Associate Athletic Director Brad Houston said that "petitions for Patriot League events are almost always granted, but other events can run into some problems." Colgate's track team competed without all of its members at last spring's Championships because they were studying for exams.

Tufts mentioned the possibility of splitting the baseball and softball seasons into fall and spring seasons. Half of the schedule could be played in the fall and the league schedule could be played in the spring. Naturally, enough people would have to agree so that you'd have someone to play, but the proposal made sense to Grieb. "As long as we have sufficient time to get our team determined without having to bring people back before school started, I'd like it," commented Greib. "I think it's important to play in the fall because it prepares you for league play and helps cut your roster down."

There are several pros and cons to such a major decision. A part of the entire college experience will be lost when January internships are taken away from the future Mike Kearnses and Bo Smolkas. It will be some time before even Colgate realizes what effect the changes in the calendar will have on their athletic department. If the weather cooperates in the spring so that games don't have to be rescheduled, and if the Patriot League slides its schedule up a week, there shouldn't be that much of a problem.

However, since over one quarter of the student body is directly involved in athletics, the faculty who voted on the proposal to abolish Jan Plan should have consulted someone in the department.

ning, he approached his bench again, and the umpire declared the game a forfeit, and the Bison 9-0 winners.

It was later determined that all stats from the game would count, which means that Zervanos and DenBleyker would get to keep their two hits apiece, and those two, along with Kennedy, Morris, and Scott Sutfin '94 would keep their RBI's.

During the 4-1 week, the Bison improved their team batting average for the season to .303. Ten players with 10 or more at-bats are hitting at least .297, with Dave Koerner '92 (.387) the highest among the regulars.

This weekend Bucknell hosts Lafayette in a pivotal three-game series. Assuming that Fordham, who is atop the Patriot League, can beat lowly Colgate in a make-up game, the team that can take two-out-of-three this weekend will finish in second place. Bucknell is 8-4 in league play, while Lafayette is 9-3. The Leopards beat Colgate 19-1 and 20-1 in a doubleheader earlier this week.

Last year Bucknell had a chance to tie for first in the Patriot League if they would have swept Lafayette in the season's last weekend. As it turned out, the Bison got swept themselves, losing 7-0, 3-0, and 9-4. In fact, the Leopards have beaten Bucknell 11 straight times, dating back to 1986.

How no Jan Plan will effect sports

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Since none of those omniscient people who voted to have the trustees abolish the January Program bothered to consult any members of the Athletic Department, I decided to solicit the reactions of coaches, administrators, and student-athletes myself.

The consensus among the coaches depends upon which season their teams compete in. Not surprisingly, the fall sports won't have any aspect of their game calendar affected because all of the changes will come after Christmas break. One aspect that should improve for these coaches is recruiting. Presently, any recruit brought on campus during January doesn't have an opportunity to see a totally populated campus. However, head football coach Lou Maranzana regrets the loss of a unique Jan Plan that he believes has proven to be "very valuable to our student-athletes." All the freshman football players remain on campus over January to help them become more comfortable with college life and the university's resource services. When you think of winter sports at Bucknell, you have to start with basketball. As it stands now, the team only misses a handful of classes. However, with the new NCAA rule which prohibits any games before December 1 and the potential abolition of Jan Plan, the team is more likely to suffer several class absences.

"We [the men's basketball coaches] can't schedule any games during reading period, exam time, or before December, yet we have to get 26 games in somehow," said head men's basketball coach Charlie Woollum. "We've always prided ourselves on not missing many classes relative to other competitive Division I programs. It'll be tough and probably force us to play three games a week during the semester, which is something we've always tried hard to avoid."

While football may benefit in terms of recruiting, Woollum feels that that's where his team will be hurt the most. No longer will he be able to schedule an early afternoon practice and then travel to scout a prospective student-athlete at night. "I believe that my team comes first and I don't want to have to leave or miss a practice to go watch someone play," said Woollum. "We'll all just have to adjust."

Some of the other winter sports, such as swimming, will undoubtedly suffer because of the increased number of practice hours that they put into their January schedules. NCAA rules prohibit more than a certain number of hours of practice per week during school; the Jan Plan allows such sports teams to get in the extra practice time that they need. Also, returning from a Wednesday meet at Lehigh around 2 a.m. and having to wake-up for classes the next morning won't be fun.

Sports Information Director Bo Smolka believes that those who have internships will suffer the most. Bucknell itself would have suffered if Smolka hadn't been able to serve as a Sports Information Intern here at Bucknell for two years. Mike Kearns '93, one of the premier players on the baseball team and a 3.9 accounting major, managed to land a highly competitive internship with Arthur Anderson this past January. Head cross country and track and field coach Art Gulden's teams compete in each of the three seasons and he too mourns the loss of internships. "Personally and from an educational standpoint, I liked the Jan Plan," said Gulden. "It gave the people who were here an opportunity to get some valuable intern experiences in Education and Pre-Med, along with several other courses."

One positive response to the potential abolishment of Jan Plan that was consistent among most everyone I asked was that the atmosphere became "stale" towards the end of January. Associate Athletic Director Brad Tufts said, "Most of the athletes can't wait to start classes by the end of January because the routine has become somewhat humdrum."

If the second semester were not to start until January 15th, the best of both worlds would happen. Athletes and coaches could still enjoy over two weeks of "schoolless" competition. Yet, school would start before the routine could grow old.

Without a doubt, the spring sports will suffer the most simply because of scheduling. The seasons will all be cut by two weeks and you can't improve the

Hot–hitting Bison sweep Colgate

Winners of six out of their last seven, baseball battles Lafayette in three-game series for second place

If you like strange and unusual baseball games, then you definitely want to catch Bucknell's team. Not a week seems to go by without some sort of freak play that sends the fans home with something to talk about. This week's craziness included a forfeit and a blown call by an umpire.

The blown call came in Tuesday's game at Mt. St. Mary's. The Bison, who came into this affair riding a six-game winning streak, scored twice in the top of the first on an error and a sac fly by Mark Kennedy '92. However, Bucknell starter Denis Maguire '93 quickly surrendered five runs in his first two innings. After rallying in the middle innings to take a 7-5 lead, the pitching again faltered, allowing Mt. St. Mary's to take an 11-7 lead after eight innings. Then in the ninth, manager Gene Depew called on his bench to deliver another late miracle.

Centerfielder Matt Sniegocki '93 strokes a single during Bucknell's first of three victories over Colgate last weekend at the mods. He leads the team in triples (7), stolen bases (10), hits (35), and runs scored (26) to go along with a .318 batting average.

The inning started off great as Tom Chiacchio '95 and Kyle Morris '95 each delivered pinch-hit singles. Then came the controversy. Don DenBleyker '94 came up as a pinch-hitter, and he singled home Chiacchio. However, the plate umpire ruled DenBleyker out for not announcing himself as a replacement. The umpire blew the call, though, since in college, a pinch-hitter is not required to announce himself. Then, just to prove that his first mistake was not a fluke, the ump messed up again. After calling DenBleyker out, he allowed the run to count, and Morris to advance to second. If this was truly an illegal substitution, the runners would have to be sent back to their original bases.

Pitcher Jack Kazanjian '93 delivers a strike in Saturday's opening win over Colgate. He is 6–1 with a 2.20 ERA.

Anyway, this call took the wind out of the Bison's sails, and the rally fell short. Rich Heller '94 (0-2) was the losing pitcher in the 11-8 loss.

The week did start out considerably better for the Bison, however. A Parents' Weekend sweep of lowly Colgate kept the team alive for a second-place finish in the Patriot League and a Wild Card berth into the ECAC championships. In the first game of Saturday's doubleheader, Jack Kazanjian '93 (6-1) was brilliant as usual, as the Bison routed the Red Raiders 11-2. Kazanjian went all the way, allowing just two hits while striking out six, and he lowered his season ERA to 2.20. Kazanjian needs just one more win to tie the single-season record for most wins in Bucknell history. Ironically, the first Bison pitcher to record seven wins in a season was Don Richards '55, who accomplished the feat 37 years ago. It was Richards who recently donated the scoreboard located beyond the outfield fence.

Jim Zervanos '92 went two-for-two with three RBI and three runs scored to pace the offense. Mike Kearns '93, Matt Sniegocki '93, and Bill Rinker '92 also had two hits for the Bison.

The second game was a bit more tense, but thanks to starter Kurt Waldner '93 (3-4), the Bison were 2-0 winners. Waldner tossed a complete-game masterpiece, allowing just four singles. Waldner, who missed most of last season with an arm injury, turned in by far his most impressive performance of the season.

Bucknell scored both their runs in the second inning, as Larry Trout '93 and Rinker produced RBI singles.

On Sunday, Dave Scranton '95 (3-2) turned in the third consecutive brilliant pitching performance in Bucknell's 5-1 win. Scranton took a shutout into the ninth inning, but after giving up up a hit and a walk with one out, Depew went to the bullpen. Sniegocki came in and walked the first two batters he faced, but then settled down to get the final two outs.

Kearns was again the offensive star, as he collected three hits, scored two runs, drove in a run, and stole a base. In the sweep over Colgate, Kearns hit .556. Rinker also had a tremendous series, as he hit .625 with three RBI. The senior shortstop was also named Co-Player of the Week in the Patriot League.

Overall, the Bison hit .369 (31 for 84) in the three-game series, and the pitching staff had an ERA of 1.17.

On Monday, the Bison had revenge on their minds as they took on Bloomsburg. Earlier in the season, Bucknell bowed to Bloomsburg, 7-6. This game turned out to be even wilder than the first meeting. Bucknell led 6-3 into the ninth inning, but Bloomsburg rallied furiously against Morris. Two hits, an error, and a sac fly tied the score at six with two outs. With a runner on third, Bloomsburg's Matt Croyle attempted to bunt, but he popped it up into foul ground. Bison catcher Mark Kennedy '92 sprinted over to make the play, but was bumped into by the Bloomsburg player in the on-deck circle. The umpire ruled interference, and Croyle was declared out, ending the inning. This prompted a wild argument, which resulted in Bloomsburg's manager being thrown out of the game.

The Bison would fail to score in the bottom of the ninth. In the inning, the Bloomsburg manager wandered back near his dugout, resulting in a warning from the umpire. Before the start of the tenth in-

Bison travel to Allentown as the third seed in the Patriot League Tournament; open against Holy Cross

Last week proved to be a turning point for the Bucknell softball team, which had been the victim of tough opposition and poor defensive play as of late. The Bison improved their league record to 7-5 by sweeping doubleheaders against Colgate and Lafayette before succumbing to Bloomsburg twice. Last Tuesday's game at Bloomsburg was Bucknell's final regular season game; the team's season record stands at 20-15.

Game one against Colgate was a blowout for Bucknell, lasting only five innings, with the Bison clinching the game 11-0. Allison Love '95 was outstanding on the mound for Bucknell as she pitched a three-hit shutout for her team. The Colgate game also marked the first time in her collegiate career that the rookie walked no batters.

Offensively, the Bison were on fire in the game one victory. Every Bucknell batter reached base at least once, and all but one scored a run. Co-captain Jen Yuengling '93 sparked the offensive onslaught with a three-for-four (one double), three RBI performance at the plate.

Devaney Kerr '94 continued her late-season surge as Bucknell's other multiple-hitter (two-for-three), while adding a stolen base to her accomplishments. Carol Gesler '93, who is one of three Bucknell players hitting over the .300 mark, has also proven herself as an offensive threat. The junior drove in two runs and smacked a double in the first Colgate contest.

After getting a force out, thirdbaseman Carol Gesler '93 throws to try and complete the double play during last weekend's victory over Patriot League rival Colgate. Gesler boasts a .301 batting average, third best on the team.

Later in the day, Colgate put up more of a fight against the home team, but to no avail. Bucknell took the second game by a score of 5-3 behind the pitching of Heidi Dawson '95.

In game two, it was three juniors who came up big for the Bison in the batter's box. Ellen Gabriel went three-for-four at the plate and drove in one run. Yuengling followed suit with a two-for-four, 2 RBI performance, while Gesler went two-for-three.

On the 27th, Bucknell traveled to Easton, PA to take on league rival Lafayette. It turned out to be a great day for the Bison, as they enjoyed not one, but two, shutout victories. Love began the trend with her fourth shutout of the season; she allowed only four hits, walked just one, and added three strikeouts.

In the 6-0 victory, Lisa Fink '93 went a perfect two-for-two at the plate, reached base on balls once, and batted in one run. Heather Hoehn '94 got back into her offensive groove with a two-for-three, one RBI performance. Defensively, Hoehn owned the field, amassing an impressive 15 putouts at first base.

Dawson then followed Love's example with an even more impressive stint at the plate in the second Lafayette game. In that game, the rookie stayed consistent, pitching a one-hitter while allowing only one batter to reach base on balls. Lafayette is the first team that Dawson has shutout in her collegiate career.

Yuengling and Hoehn both led the Bison at the plate, each with a two-for-four day. Hoehn powered out a double and added three RBI to her team and league-leading total. Lafayette also saw a base stealing-frenzy on the part of the Bison, as Fink, Kerr, Kelly Corr '95, and Jill Spatzer '93 each stole one.

Unfortunately, Bucknell's trip to Bloomsburg was disheartening, as the team suffered 4-0 and 5-1 losses. The Bison could muster a total of only seven hits on the day against their opponent's talented pitching staff.

Jill Spatzer '93 coasts into foul territory to make the catch during last Saturday's home win against Colgate.

Dawson and Love take to this weekend's Patriot League Tournament records of 10-5 and 10-8 respectively. Their pitching should pose a challenge at the championships, as Dawson ranks second in the league in both victories and earned run average (1.84). The only pitcher ahead of Dawson in ERA is Colgate's Liz Carr, a pitcher whom the Bison handily beat last week. Love is second in the Patriot League in strikeouts, with 58, and third in ERA.

Bucknell also boasts league-leaders in two offensive categories and a runner-up in one. Hoehn is tops in runs batted in with a .930 average per game, and Fink heads the stolen base list with 20. Fink is also second

Faculty votes to delay calendar restructuring until fall meeting

Peeler's motion for academic credit in January voted down on Monday

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A motion by Vice President of Academic Affairs Larry Shinn to table until October the decision on how to restructure the University calendar in light of the elimination of the January program was passed at Monday's special meeting of the faculty.

Shinn cited his desire that the Committee on Instruction have opportunity to "provide a rationale for the whole package including the issues of how many days there should be within each semester and how many days should be retained between semesters" as the reason for proposing a delay in the calendar decision.

A motion to extend the regular semester to fourteen weeks with the first semester beginning between the 24th and the 30th of August and the second semester beginning in mid-January was led by Associate Professor of Geography and Committee on Instruction Chair Ben Marsh. Marsh noted that such a calendar change would actually constitute a re-lengthening of the semester since the semester had been shortened during the 1969-70 academic year with the introduction of the January Program.

> The Committee on Instruction should "provide a rationale for the whole package including the issues of how many days there should be within each semester and how many days should be retained between semesters."
> — Larry Shinn
> Vice President for Academic Affairs

Response to Marsh's original motion had been mixed as some faculty expressed concern over such issues as the necessity of requiring that Residence and Orientation Assistants arrive on campus as early as the middle of August as well as the problem of sufficient faculty participation in freshman orientation activities. "My concern is that orientation would start so early," noted Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Maureen Murphy.

"Even now, when orientation starts on the 29th, two out of three faculty will not participate," said Murphy.

Discussion concerning the issue of restructuring the calendar was followed by the defeat of a motion by Professor of Political Science and Department Chair John Peeler who proposed a substitute motion that would have replaced the motion to restructure the calendar with one that would modify the current January program, allowing students to receive course credit for classes taken during January.

Under this program, students would have had the option to either adopt a ninth course for the academic year during the month of January or to choose a January course as an eighth course for the year, making it possible for them to take a lighter course load during one of the regular semesters.

The faculty will continue deliberations on the issue of calendar restructuring at the October faculty meeting. This will allow them to vote on the matter in time to present a report to the Trustees in November.

Campus speaks out against King verdict

BY MARIA GLOD, DAVID MURRAY, AND TARA GILLIGAN

"There is no justice in this world," lamented Marc Harrison '92 at a speak-out last Friday. He and scores of other Bucknell students gathered downhill of the Langone Center to vent their dissatisfaction with the acquittal of Rodney King's assailants. Harrison continued, "If people can not get convicted with videotape, what is my word going to do?"

Rochelle Fisher '94 and Tameka Brooks '94 organized the speak-out in an attempt to make students aware of the incident and to allow them to voice their own fears and frustrations. "We were listening to the jurors, and we wanted to let Bucknell know what was going on," said Fischer.

The rally garnered support from administrators as well. "I was impressed with the organizers and participants," said Dean of Students John Dunlop. "The speak-out served an important purpose for concerned students."

Two separate issues were addressed by the participants: the verdict itself and the rioting that followed. "When I heard the verdict, I was very angry," said Saabirah Warthen '93. "It hurt my civil being." Fisher concurred: "The verdict left me with feelings of anger, frustration, and fear."

Other speakers expressed similar sentiments.

> "By the jury passing a not guilty verdict it is allowing any person to use whatever force he deems necessary to abuse the individual human rights of others."
> —Rebecca Goldstein '93

"By the jury passing a not guilty verdict it is allowing any person to use whatever force he deems necessary to abuse the individual human rights of others," said Rebecca Goldstein '93.

More important to some students was the issue of Los Angeles rioting. While many speakers were bothered by the violence and looting, others said they might condone the bloodshed if it can produce a substantive change. "I don't mind the buildings burning," said one student. "Maybe it's time for some kind of rebellion."

A more popular view, though, was one of disgust at both the violence of the beating and the violence of the rioting. "If people can only vent their anger with mob violence," said Joe Kubofcik '92, "we are in bad shape." Goldstein agreed: "Any form of violence against any person because of his race or sex is wrong."

"People are so blood hungry they will totally forget to ask the question 'Why?' And I think that that's what needs to be asked," said Brooks.

Regis Bingham '94, of Bucknell's African American Cultural Society, warned, "People are focusing on the riots as opposed to the incident that sparked them." He continued, "I hope people don't think of this as an isolated incident. This has been going on for a long time."

"It has reinforced the notion I have that black America has a legitimate reason to fear the white race. African Americans can't even call the police for protection if someone violates them," Bingham concluded.

Senior perspectives: outlook for the future

BY MICHAEL MCLEAN

News Feature
Third in a Series

What began four years ago as a Bucknell education for the class of 1992 will end in just three weeks, and today's seniors will find themsleves thrust into the "real world." The question of what to do next is necessarily linked to perspectives on how well a Bucknell education has prepared its seniors for future study, service, or work.

It comes as no surprise that seniors and alumni blame the depressed economy for the lack of job offers rather than their university. On the whole, seniors feel as qualified and prepared to enter the job market as any of their competitors. However, due to the downturn of the economy and its job market, many seniors and alumni will just have to practice some patience, waiting who knows how long, for that "right" job.

> "...Bucknell has not really provided me with the skills to go out and land a job. There is no opportunity here to take the education out of the classroom and into the real world."
> —Jim Burritt '92

Capturing the views of most seniors and recent alumni, management major Greg George '92, says, "The preparation received at Bucknell is more than adequate. There are simply no jobs out there." In agreement with George is accounting major Dave Cooperson '92. "Without a doubt it is the outside economic forces that are keeping some Bucknellians out of the job market. Businesses recognize that Bucknell prepares its students well, however, they can't hire when they are cutting positions."

Although most students feel that Bucknell has done everything in its power to help them get jobs, civil engineer and college major Jim Burritt '92, begs to differ. "At least in regards to my major, Bucknell has not really provided me with the skills to go out and land a job. There is no opportunity here to take the education out of the classroom and into the real world. The real world is not like the ideal conditions of Bucknell's classrooms." Burritt further elaborated on Bucknell's preparation of students, saying that students should get an education that teaches them to not only be technical, but managers and marketers of their skills. "If Bucknell prepared me well to find a job, then I wouldn't be looking into other fields of employment like I'm doing now."

> "Businesses recognize that Bucknell prepares its students well. However, they can't hire when they are cutting positions."
> —Dave Cooperson '92

In light of these difficult times, patience and persistence seem to stand out as the necessary job search qualities. Interdepartmental major Jill Schaeffer '92, who has recently landed a desired job, remarks that even though companies are offering significantly less positions than last year, it is key to remain unrelenting in pursuing employment. "Through a job expo set up by the Career Development Center, I made early and continual contact with the same company rep-

Students go "Into the Streets"

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Early next November, Bucknell students will move into the streets, volunteering their time to help local agencies conduct an afternoon of community service activities.

"Into the Streets is a national program designed to introduce students to community service with the hope that their day of participation will encourage them to volunteer on a regular basis throughout the year," said Deb Manasse '93, co-chair.

Next November will mark the second year Bucknell participates in the Into the Streets program. The planning committee is student-run and receives support from a coalition composed of administrators and members of the Lewisburg community.

"We had a good start last year," said Keith Mann '93, co-chair. "We hope that this year we will have the opportunity to strengthen certain areas of the program."

According to Manasse, one goal of the committee is to increase student participation. Last year, Into the Streets was held on a Saturday afternoon, and students volunteered at various agencies including Sunflower Day Care Center, Danville State Hospital, and the Area Agency on Aging. This year the program will expand to two days, both Friday and Saturday, allowing more student participation and involvement from agencies that are not open on weekends.

The program in the fall will begin with a week-long series of lectures and discussions focusing on national and local problems such as homelessness and hunger, and culminate with two days of community service activities. Students will sign up in groups of five, and two groups wil be assigned to each volunteering site.

"The jobs students do on those days will undoubtedly be valuable to the community, but on a more global scale, Into the Streets gives students a chance to continue their volunteering," said Burnam.

A general interest meeting will be held on Monday, May 11 at 7 p.m. in the ELC Forum.

The Bucknellian announces new staff for fall 1992

Susan Smith '93 has been named the Editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian for the fall 1992 semester. Smith is an English/Political Science double-major, and has served as editor of the features section for the entire year, as well as working for Pittsburgh Magazine. Smith said her goal is "to make working and writing for The Bucknellian open to students of all majors, thus making it the voice of students as well as the official source of campus news."

Jamie Diaferia '94, former sports editor and contributing news editor, was named Managing Editor for the upcoming semester. Incoming section editors include: Deb Manasse '93 and Maria Glod '93, news editors; Peter Lalos '93 and Lamie Booker '93, sports editors; Colleen Rush '95, features editor; Matthew Garnett '94, opinions editor; Kristie Robson '95 and returning editor Nicole Cobban '95, arts and entertainment editors.

Corey Hutchings '95 will be taking over as sports statistician, while former opinions editor David Barry '94 will assume the position of associate editor. Kate Fink '93 will be senior copy editor, while Brian Sipes '94 and Traci Mellinger '95 will be returning as photo editors. Sheila Pretti '94 has been named the new business manager.

From September to April I interviewed and corresponded with that company before they offered me the job this past April. Personal initiative seemed to be the difference."

Other than persistence, luck or a very high class ranking, many seniors feel that connections make the difference in gaining employment. "It's now a numbers game," says management major Sherry Leach '92. "At this point, it's coming down to who you know rather than what you know and where you went to school."

Many of the interviewed alumni agree with Leach that connections make the difference. Having been graduated for two years, economics major Jim Elliott '90, feels that Bucknell should stress networking more than it does. "Bucknell and the Career Development Center should push students to begin networking earlier. Internships offer some of the best connections for future employment possibilities." Elliott explained that Bucknell should stress internships more and extracurricular activities less, since the latter does not really make the difference in the job search.

In light of the potential benefits of internships, alumna Lisa Spickler '90 comes in close agreement with Elliott's claims. As a psychology major that varied her electives in many fields, Spickler contends that it was her internships at Bucknell that opened the doors to her first job. "Through the Career Development Center and Bucknell's psychology department, I was able to get internships both during school year and in my free time. There is no doubt that my internships got me my first job as a social worker and case manager." Now, completing her first year at the University of Richmond Law School, Spickler additionally commented on how Bucknell has faired in preparing her for the work world. "I cannot say enough good things about Bucknell. One of its greatest assets is that it offers tremendous opportunities to take advantage of valuable non-academic positions, such as the internships I previously mentioned."

Art and English major Mary Loux McDonnell '91, had no real difficulty in finding her first job. Like Spickler, she cannot say enough about the opportunities that Bucknell has afforded her. "Going to Bucknell was really a good basis for getting a job. Lots of the people I interviewed with knew it as a small school with a great reputation. Bucknell gave me many opportunities to be a leader and explore many other non-academic interests. This is what makes Bucknell different than other institutions."

Although McDonnell acknowledges the tough times of the economy, she has faith that Bucknell's education and experience will stand out as the deciding factor for most students. "Even though I was an art and English major, I felt very marketable because I was very trainable. My broad education allowed me to be trained for any position. I ended up in a field [fashion merchandising] that I absolutely had no formal training in."

When seniors and recent alumni were asked about the effectiveness of the Career Development Center [CDC] in helping students get jobs, there were mixed sentiments. Most students saw the CDC's attempts to get employers to come to campus as commendable given the current economic recession. Alumna and economics major Caroline Feeney '91, recalls her participation in the CDC's placement program: "They [CDC] did their best given the economic conditions of the time. I was looking to get interviews with pharmaceutical companies, but the Career Development Center just didn't have the avenues to get them to come to Bucknell. Unfortunately, the economy kept many big named companies off Bucknell's campus."

For marketing psychology major Sue Boyle '92, the CDC has been beneficial in a rather different light. By encouraging seniors to take responsibilities for their futures, the CDC has taken the place of many nagging parents. As Boyle explains, "From the start of senior year, the Career Development Center does a good job in forcing students to get on the ball and take some responsibility. They help you with resumes, recommendations, and interviews on a one-to-one basis."

Both Elliott and Spickler are very pleased with the efforts of the CDC. Elliott is impressed that the CDC has maintained correspondence with him since graduating. "After two years, the Career Development Center still sends me a newsletter of potential job opportunities. It's nice to know that they are willing to help me out after two years." Similar to Elliott, Spickler remarked, "I was impressed at how quickly they [CDC] were able to mail reference letters and old resumes. They were still very supportive, even though I am no longer a student there."

Veering from the typical praise given to the CDC, English major Colin Bridgewater '92, sees a problem with the focus of the CDC. "The Career Development Center can beneficial, but it depends on a student's major. In helping me find placement for a teaching job, they failed. I had to do all of the research and work on my own. Students who need help finding placement in non-traditional areas, like me, benefit least from the Career Development Center."

In accord with Bridgewater is art history and international relations major Jobe Meier '92. "I very seldom go to the Career Development Center because it is more geared for helping students find jobs in business, banking and engineering. They are of no real help when it comes to finding employment in the art world. Even if I wanted a job in international relations, I would be better off going to see a professor in this field rather than someone at the Career Development Center." Like Bridgewater, Meier finds that doing her own work is the best way to gain employment.

Although there are varying opinions about the way Bucknell aids its students in finding employment, there is an overwhelming majority of seniors and alumni who believe that the Bucknell educational experience is excellent at equipping its graduates for the world. Summing up the beliefs of most students is international relations major Michael Wardell '92: "The current job market is out of Bucknell's hands. Bucknell is better than most universities in preparing its students for the job market. We are one of a few schools left that uphold a true university experience, where faculty and students can meet on a one-to-one basis, both inside and outside of the classroom."

People of the Year

Each year, The Bucknellian selects two or more members of the campus community as special honorees. The individuals profiled below have distinguished themselves in their fields of study and in the specific branches of the University they serve. This year's recipients are not necessarily familiar names in the news, but each has improved the University community through unique and substantive change. Bucknell wouldn't be the same without them.

John Grim

BY JOEY KRAKOFF AND JENNIFER HUNT
Bucknellian Staff Writers

One might call John Grim "the great inspirer." Influenced by Grim, assistant professor of religion, students have become increasingly aware of and concerned with Native American culture.

What makes Grim unique is that unlike other historians of religion who usually refrain from going out into the field, Grim's fieldwork is a very important part of his life. He participates in the Native American rituals, personally experiencing the annual ceremonies of the Winter Dance with the Kettle Falls Indians of Washington State and the Sun Dance with the Absaroke (Crow) Indians of Montana. Grim has also experienced life on the Ojibway Reservation. These experiences have allowed Grim to bring a personal perspective not only to his students but also to the entire Bucknell community.

Having been raised by a Native American family, Grim has firsthand knowledge of the customs he passionately presents to students. For him, there is little to separate his classroom interests from his personal life. In 1990, he arranged for the visit of his adopted family, allowing faculty and students to interact with them and learn more about the Crow way. And, in keeping with the Native American oral tradition, Grim is known for his story-telling ability.

Grim attributes his knowledge and success to Thomas Berry, with whom he completed his doctoral work, and to his wife Mary Evelyn Tucker, assistant professor of religion who is also receiving The Bucknellian's Person of the Year award. Concerning Berry, Grim said, "Professor Thomas Berry's special insight and presence have been an enormous inspiration to me."

Recalling with affection his early years at Bucknell, Grim spoke of the tremendous influence Sid Jamieson, head coach of the lacrosse team, has had on his Bucknell experience: "It has been very encouraging and helpful to have a member of the Iroquois nation on campus."

Additionally, Grim relates well to Jamieson for both share a desire to extend their work beyond the minimum and to attract the participation of those who are often hard to reach. "I have enjoyed participating in Sid's sideline Coaching Program, where faculty are invited to join the coaching staff of a particular sport. Though I know little about football, I attended a week of practice and then stood on the sidelines with the team at one game. It certainly made on impression on me. I think it is helpful when the faculty get involved with students outside the classroom," he said.

The first class Grim taught at Bucknell was a Freshman Seminar in Native American traditions in the Fall of 1989. Since then, he has taught classes in Introduction to the Bible, Catholicism, Islam, Tribal Religions, and Native American Religions. Enthusiastic about students' response and motivation, Grim has organized the visits of such Native Americans as Claude Otter and Bill Miller. Presently, Grim is working closely with the Center Gallery to bring a Native American Art display to Bucknell next year.

By virtue of his focus on Native American programing, other groups and departments—including Women's Studies and the Multicultural Center—in addition to Bucknell students, are helping to increase awareness and bring more Native American voices to the campus. Since arriving three years ago, John Grim has successfully tapped in to what was once of marginal interest at Bucknell: the Native American voice. In addition to bringing speakers such as Professor Inez Talamantez of the religion department at University of California, Santa Barbara, and Professor Marvin Lunenfeld of the History Department at SUNY Fredonia, Grim has spearheaded the Columbian Quincentennial project, providing a forum where both perspectives on the Columbian encounter, namely the Native American and the Hispanic, could be heard. Grim first got the idea for the Columbian Quincentennial program during the 1984 Newberry Library Conference in Chicago. This conference was sponsored by the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Another conference Grim attended at the Smithsonian Institute in Washington D. C. in 1987 discussed the means of teaching the Colum-

Mary Evelyn Tucker

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In the three years in which she has been at Bucknell, Mary Evelyn Tucker, assistant professor of religion, has already expanded the horizons of many students significantly beyond the boundaries of Lewisburg. Through her teaching and her active involvement in several areas, she has had a major impact on the Bucknell community and is an obvious choice for The Bucknellian's Person of the Year.

After teaching in a variety of schools, Tucker said that "I was looking forward to having good students," as "a four-year college with an emphasis on liberal arts attracted me." Tucker and her husband John Grim, also an assistant professor of religion, came to Bucknell in 1989.

It seems as if Tucker and the students have been well-matched. She stated that "there's an interest among students that we have tried to respond to," noting particularly that she and her husband "have been very pleased and excited by the interest in world religions."

Tucker teaches courses in comparative world religions and Buddhism, and she expanded the scope of the religion department's offerings with a course in Confucianism. Her specialty is the history of religions and she has done extensive research on Confucianism in East Asia, particularly in Japan. Her book, Moral and Spiritual Cultivation in Japanese Neo-Confucianism, was published in 1989.

While studying and teaching in Japan in the early 1970s, Tucker became fascinated with the culture and wanted "to understand the ethical and social basis of society." She believes that Confucianism has a great deal to do with this, and added that Confucianism has "a spiritual dimension that has not been fully articulated."

Tucker has been instrumental in bringing several prominent speakers to campus over the past three years to further enrich the educational experiences of the students. Last year she organized the Religious Studies Forum on the environment which presented different religious world views and the political, economic, social, and educational aspects of current environmental problems "to try to suggest that this is an interdisciplinary issue."

She has been one of the organizers of this year's President's Forum on the Environmental Imperative. Thus far, lectures have been given on the Gaia Hypothesis, Ensuring Biodiversity, and Religion and Ecology. Concerning the lecture on the Gaia Hypothesis, Tucker felt that "it was good because further discussion was created."

Amy Claire—The Bucknellian

Thomas Berry gave the lecture on Religion and Ecology. Berry, a leading expert on spirituality and ecology, has been to Bucknell three times thanks to Tucker and her husband. Tucker, Grim, and Berry are all currently working on their contributions to "World Views and Ecology," due to be published in 1993 by the Bucknell Review.

This past fall semester Tucker was responsible for bringing Charlene Spretnak to speak on ecofeminism during Colloquy. This semester, the Reverend Keido Fukushima, Zen Master of the Tofukuji Monastery in Japan, came to Bucknell for three days, lecturing and giving a calligraphy demonstration. Tucker studied Zazen under Reverend Fukushima in Japan in 1971.

In February, Frederick Franck's Seven Generations sculpture was brought to the campus, and its dedication marked the beginning of the Environmental Imperative. Tucker and her husband were primarily responsible for this addition, and Tucker stated that this statue "brought together the President's Forum and the [Columbian] Quincentennial programs."

Tucker is also involved with the Japanese and East Asian studies program and she is the advisor for the Asian Student Organization. In the future, she hopes "to integrate Asian studies into the Common Learning Agenda," the recently-adopted revisions to the Arts and Sciences curriculum.

In addition to her activities within the Bucknell community, Tucker also finds time to remain active in the international religious and educational community. In January she attended a conference on Japanese spirituality at the East-West center of the University of Hawaii.

Elizabeth Felter

BY TARA GILLIGAN AND SUE BASALLA
Bucknellian Staff Writers

"There are several different kinds of feminists on this campus," said Liz Felter '92, recipient of*The Bucknellian*'s Person of the Year award. "Some feminists on campus only see themselves as victims, and certainly people do get hurt and they have to heal. But if you see yourself as a victim, you're not going to accomplish much. However, if you say to yourself, 'I'm a person in control and I'm going to do something about this,' you'll be much more powerful."

By her own admission, Felter exemplifies the second of these two types of feminists. A strong, articulate woman, Felter has defined her role on campus as an independent advocate of women's rights. She has tackled the sexism of Sig Derby and the complacency of sororities. She has spoken at open forums and confronted individuals face-to-face. And throughout these controversies, Felter has remained refreshingly open to all perspectives; her anger is directed at sexism, not at men in general.

Her concern for women's issues is part of a deeper committment to grassroots politics. A political science major with minors in French and international relations, Felter criticizes the money- interests of national governments and believes that politics is most responsive to social problems in the local arena. "Women have much more success working with grassroots politics. It's easier to get in, easier to be listened to. I don't want to get too far removed from the people," she said. In the microcosm of Bucknell, Felter has put into practice this philosophy and has taken it upon herself to speak out when she sees inequality of any kind.

Not that it's been easy to take on politically-charged issues alone. At Kappa Delta Rho's open forum on sexism, Felter sat on a panel with representatives of the Panhellenic Council and the Women's Resource Center. Selected because of her past opposition to Sig Derby, Felter stood before the audience knowing that "what I was about to say wasn't what they wanted to hear."

Deactivating from her sorority while vice president of Panhellenic Council wasn't exactly easy either. "I think a lot of Thetas were relieved when I deactivated. I was putting pressure on them to be a little more politically aware. For me, it was more frustrating being in it than quitting." Although it meant turning down a large scholarship from the sorority, Felter believed that she "could no longer be involved in the Greek system because it fosters such a sense of Groupism. No one can be an individual. So as a feminist, I could not exist as myself."

Even as early as her freshman year, Felter took the unusual initiative of reporting her neighbor's verbal sexual harassment to the Office of Residential Life.

In explaining where she finds the courage to confront such sensitive issues without the backing of any organized campus group, Felter said, "I'm just angry. I'd suffer more if I didn't say things than if I did." What makes Felter remarkable, however, is that she expresses her anger in a calm, constructive manner that educates rather than berates.

Felter also credits her fiancé, Bill Farrell '92, for supporting her through difficult times. "I credit it a lot to Bill. I know that he'll always be there. I don't want to give him all the credit, though, because it sounds like I'm just relying on a man. But we do have a very good relationship."

Connecting her political activism with her academic interests, Felter completed an honors thesis in political science. She chose to reseach women's movements in Egypt after travelling there for a Jan Plan with Richard Peterec, professor of geography. "I was just fascinated by the culture. I walked down the street and saw maybe three women. The women I did see were either pregnant or had five little kids around them. I wanted to know why that was," she said.

Retirees reflect on careers at Bucknell

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the school year draws to a close, nine members of Bucknell's faculty and staff have plans to close out their full-time careers. But, as these retirees illustrate, retirement is not necessarily a time to be idle.

Seven members of the faculty, along with Chaplain James Hammerlee and Dr. J. Preston Hoyle, director of Student Medical Services, will officially retire from full-time University service at the end of this semester. Geology professor Richard Nickelsen retired in February of this year.

For most, retirement does not mean abandoning life-time interests. Many retirees will remain active in their fields. Nickelsen, for example, plans to complete a field work project in Utah. Art department professor James Turnure will continue to teach at Bucknell on a volunteer basis. At least once a year he will instruct a seminar that may focus on his special interests of Egyptology and archaeology.

Other post-commencement plans of the retirees include becoming more actively involved in the Lewisburg community. Hoyle will remain an active member of the Evangelical Community Hospital staff and will also serve as a consultant for a number of Pennsylvania medical associations including the Pennsylvania Medical and Dental societies. Hammerlee and his wife Betty plan to maintain their home in Lewisburg and use their free time to participate more fully in community activities.

In general, most retirees will use their retirement to slow down and "take time to smell the roses," as Hoyle said. Hoyle plans to use this opportunity to "do a lot of the things I enjoy but just never got the chance to do." Others look forward to paying more attention to side interests and hobbies that they have neglected over the years, such as traveling and golfing.

Most candidates for retirement can boast of years, even decades, of service to their profession. Bucknell's retirees are no exception: most of the nine have been at Bucknell for anywhere between 20 and 35 years. Throughout their time here, they've seen marked changes to the University environment. But some developments have made lasting impressions.

The improvement of campus facilities ranked high on the list of changes. A few cited developments in the Physical Plant and Student Health Services as the most positive changes to sweep across campus. Hoyle proudly explains that the medical service has emerged "from a reactive service to a proactive service" in that the staff no longer waits for students to come to them. Instead the health service reaches out to the student body through peer education and programming that deals with sexual health, nutrition, drugs, and alcohol.

Hoyle also expressed positive emotions about the growth of Bucknell "in size and quality of the faculty, administrative staff, and the quality of the product." Nickelsen, too, felt the growth of the faculty has improved Bucknell since more teachers provide the opportunity for less demanding course loads. Professors can use the extra time to fulfill their obligations not only as teachers but as scholars as well.

But perhaps the most noticable change to these faculty and staff has been the change in the student body. Students have more questions, are more sophisticated, and more aware of their environment now than they've been in past years, said one retiree. Hoyle points out that he spends probably twice the amount of time answering students' questions and explaining their problems and cures than he spent when he first started.

Elizabeth Felter

Her advisor, Patricia Misciagno, assistant professor of political science, described Felter as an extremely dedicated student, staying on campus to work on her thesis during January and Spring Break. Felter distinguishes herself academically because she has "not only developed the ability to analyze the obstacles women face in politics, but she also possesses the confidence to speak out about these issues." On a personal level, Misciagno characterizes Felter as "courageous," "generous," and a "bridge-builder," one who works to bring together different groups for a common cause.

After graduation, Felter will join the New Jersey Public Interest Research Group (PIRG), a grassroots environmental and political agency. Eventually she hopes to earn her Ph.D. in women's politics and then teach at the university level. En route to this goal, Felter may also draw upon her journalism experience with Bucknell World to become a political commentator in the tradition of her heroine, Ellen Goodman.

Felter's academic and journalistic goals reflect her awareness of feminism not only as an emotional challenge, but as an intellectual one as well. Felter is clearly not just a reactionary; she identifies with all sides of the movement and sees them as integral to one another. Felter believes that feminism "is broadening, accepting a lot more different types of people and appreciating what they're doing. I think five years ago, the typical feminist would have written me off."

Confronting sexual harassment and facing negative reactions to her work never soured Felter on Bucknell. "That's the amazing thing. I didn't have a place until this year, actually, this semester. I always knew there was a place for me. It was just a matter of finding it," she said. "I think that's my style, to be an individual."

Mary Evelyn Tucker

She plans to attend the third Global Forum in Kyoto in April, 1993. The Global Forum will bring together various religious leaders and parliamentarians to discuss ecological issues. The first two forums were held in Oxford and Moscow.

Tucker summarizes her two main interests as international relations, in terms of cultivating "a cultural and religious understanding between peoples," and "reformulating human-earth relations." Both issues are of pressing importance in our world today, and Bucknell is fortunate to have Mary Evelyn Tucker to guide and help us in our own understanding of these concerns.

John Grim

bian encounter on the high school and college level. With the support of colleagues within the Bucknell religion department, Grim was invited to submit a proposal to the Pitcairin-Crabbe Foundation of Pittsburgh to bring his envisioned program to Bucknell. In conjunction with William Becker, professor of religion, Grim co-authored the proposal and began to develop a skeleton of his intentions for the program. Once the grant was received, Grim continued with his plans and began fulfilling the initial skeleton. Refusing to take much of the credit for the program's success, Grim extends his thanks to the Bucknell community for making the program such a success.

Besides teaching and advising several campus organizations, Grim spends his spare time working on four publishing projects. Still, he takes the time to wander around his garden, planting flowers and talking to the birds and trees, all of which teach him a great deal about nature.

Arkansas nixes visitation policy

A 24-hour visitation policy proposed by the Residents Interhall Congress' Safety and Security Commission has been rejected by the University of Arkansas administration.

The main problem the university had with the proposal, according to Jeff Hogue, author of the proposal, was allowing students 24-hour visitation rights with members of the opposite sex.

Pat Newland, UA director of housing, claimed "the state is not quite ready to deal with the proposal... The perception of the campus is the problem. We have a party school image. We need to put ourselves up as an academic school."

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Step to the beat of a different drum

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With the grace and style more suited to a professional ensemble, the Bucknell Dance Company will present its final performance of the season this weekend. Composed of eight distinct pieces, the show promises to offer a variety of dancing techniques from nine different choreographers, making it "as eclectic a show as possible," according to Danna Frangione, associate professor of dance and faculty advisor for the company.

Although all eight pieces promise an evening of entertainment, the highlight of the production should be the final piece entitled "Soaring." Originally choreographed by Doris Humphrey and Ruth St. Denis in the 1920's, the dance was reconstructed by Yun-yu Wang, guest artist in residence, from the Labanotation (dance notation) score. "Soaring" represents the first dance reconstruction done at Bucknell.

Also featured will be the pieces "Sibi Mortem Consciscere," choreographed by Frangione, and "After the Minstrel," choreographed by Todd Rosenlieb '89. Performed to a commissioned score by Brian Wilhour '91, "Sibi Mortem Conscisere" will be sung live by the Some Singers, a male a capella group at Bucknell. Frangione comments that incorporating different artistic fields with the dance company is something new that she hopes to continue in the future. "Every year as we become more of a fixture on the campus, people come and want to work with us. People recognize that we're trying to do legitimate artistic work, and they trust us with their own work."

Started as an extracurricular activity, dance is now offered as a minor, and interest in the company has been growing exponentially. Supporting four major residencies a year, ten master classes, regular trips to shows, commissioned pieces, and a strong alumni attachment, the Bucknell dance program is comparable to that at any university offering a dance major.

Frangione points to a number of reasons for the success of the program. The administration has always been in favor of the arts and is highly supportive of the company. Combined with theatre a few years ago to create the department of theatre and dance, the two programs provide mutual crutches for one another. Constantly transferring crews and sharing theatres, the help is necessary, according to Frangione, "by virtue of the huge number of things we (the department) try to do."

But beyond the administration and the department, the heartbeat of the company lies in the dedication of the students. Although Frangione admits that she and Shellie Cash-Muller, associate professor of dance, act as artistic directors of the company, she is quick to point out that, "'director' is a very loose term." Invited into the department five years ago to expand the dance program, Frangione states, "We (the dance company) haven't expanded, we've exploded...This is a place that is growing whether we want it to or not. We're just trying to hang on."

Not much has changed from the student-run format of the company's origins. The dancers themselves decide which genre of dances to perform and which residencies to pursue. New members are auditioned and admitted by the officers, and dances are cast by the choreographers, who are often students themselves.

The company agenda varies annually, based on the character of the students each year. Because many of the dancers are not dance minors, the company pulls from a diverse background of personalities, running the gamut from accounting to English majors. But according to Frangione, it makes the company that much more dynamic. "They (the dancers) are people who don't see barriers. . . . They believe in their right to create art, and we respect that."

As a performance-based company, the dancers perform two mainstage productions a year. But beyond that, the department and the faculty are open to suit the program to the demands of the students. "There are very few traditions except that we go to Pizza Hut to eat after concerts," jokes Frangione, but adding in a more serious tone, "Shellie and I are there, and the department is there to respond to and support what the students want to do."

The Bucknell Dance Company will be performing tonight and tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center. Tickets are $4 and are available at the Weis Center Box Office.

It's still rock and jazz to me. . .

BY JOSEPH G. ZAVORY

When most people think of the Bucknell Jazz and Rock Ensemble, they believe it is just another spontaneous student-run club with no history. But that is definitely not the case. The first notes of jazz music began to flow from Bucknell Hall in the fall of 1971 when a group of ambitious student musicians decided to form their own jazz ensemble. Their perseverance and talent that gave rise to the group known as BJRE.

The Bucknell Jazz and Rock Ensemble was the creation of Barry Raphael '74, a trombone player who wanted to perform popular and jazz music. The music department did not provide an outlet for this type of playing; only the "skeleton of a 'big band'" existed at the time. After gaining the necessary approval of the administration and the music department, BJRE was born.

In January of 1974, the Bucknell Jazz and Rock Ensemble became the first college band to cross the "Iron Curtain."

In the beginning, the twenty-plus member group gathered in Bucknell Hall on Sunday nights to rehearse. Since it was a student-run organization and no faculty advisor was present at the rehearsals, the job of "director" fell upon the shoulders of the group's founder. "BJRE's first year was kind of tough. We were a young band and wanted to get some exposure," Raphael claims.

During its first year, BJRE performed on campus at fraternity parties, Coleman Theater, and on-campus benefits about twelve times. The group was well-received by the student body and was performing almost every weekend by the end of their first year.

In its second year BJRE was essentially the same band, losing none of its original members. Raphael attributes much of BJRE's success to this fact, and is quick to point out that BJRE experienced virtually no change in personnel in the first three years.

The second year started as successfully as the first year had ended. The group's popularity permeated the campus because of the type of music they performed. The group's second director, Dory Vanderhoof '75, claims that the band's success was further influenced by the time, the post-Vietnam War era, during which dancing became popular on the Bucknell campus. "The music that BJRE played was easy for people to dance to, and the audience got into what we were doing," Vanderhoof states.

As their reputation on campus continued to grow, the group began looking for bigger stages on which to perform. In January of 1973 they competed in and won the Dallas (PA) Kiwanis Jazz Festival, and also took second place at the Kings' College Jazz Festival. The Bucknell Jazz and Rock Ensemble's success is regarded by both Raphael and Vanderhoof as the group's turning point.

As second semester progressed they continued to play on campus with new-found energy. The success at the festivals provided the emotional boost that the band needed. They were asked to perform at Tent Party, and began to plan a European tour for the following January.

With all members returning for a third season, BJRE began preparing for their tour of Europe. Most of this preparation came in the form of performances, as they continued to play at fraternity and sorority parties. With their mixture of original and cover tunes, the Bucknell campus was not tired of listening to them play.

In January of 1974, BJRE became the first college band to cross the "Iron Curtain." The European tour covered 14 cities and included 20 performances. Playing in Hamburg, Munich, Frankfurt, Copenhagan, and Amsterdam as part of the tour, the group was rewarded with a wealth of memories. After returning from Europe, the band released its first album. Just Beautiful was a compilation of tunes from BJRE's first three years and its European tour. By the end of the 1973-74 academic year, BJRE had played as many as 160 shows, on campus and abroad.

BJRE rode a tidal wave of success through the seventies and early eighties. Although the group's relationship with the music department has been strained at times, they have always been given the support they need. The band released four more albums and went on to tour the South, in addition to a performance at the Montreaux Jazz Festival. They've played with Maynard Ferguson and Sha-Na-Na, along with a multitude of on-campus groups.

This year's band is in much the same mold as the original one. They are young, energetic, and ambitious. BJRE performed this year, placing third at the Villanova Jazz Festival. After sending in a taped audition, they were selected to compete against bands from Georgetown, Johns Hopkins, Indiana University of PA, and SUNY at Buffalo. The group was extremely pleased with this performance, having won out over other schools with faculty-run jazz programs. Performing on Friday and Saturday night of Tent Party, the Bucknell Jazz and Rock Ensemble will continue to represent the next generation of musical idea and the proud embodiment of a Bucknell music tradition.

Let's do the Time Warp again!

Rocky Horror Picture Show returns to Rooke Chapel lawn Wednesday night

BY KRISTIE ROBSON

Whip out your water pistols, grab your rice, toast some bread, and bring your party hats to Rooke Chapel Lawn Wednesday Night, May 13, at 12a.m. for the "Rocky". . . "Rocky"... "Rocky"... I see you shiver with anti... Rocky Horror Picture Show... pation.

The first outing of this film on September 26, 1975, proved to be a grand disaster. This anything but normal film was run on a normal feature film schedule. Proving to be too intimidating and overpowering for regular audiences, it was shunted from the main screen.

It was not until the film was forced into the only available playdate of the midnight slot, that the Rocky Horror Picture Show reached its full bloom. From bomb to almost religion for some, the magic of the midnight began to attract a new kind of audience.

The time and content of the movie attracted both outcast and conservative alike. Each character offers an outlet to dream in. Conservatives identify with Janet and Brad, an innocent couple who accidently fall into a world extremely different from their own.

The outrageous associate with the mad scientist/transvestite/seducer/murderer/dreamer Dr. Frank-N-Furter. Rif Raf and Magenta captivate those who yearn to overthrow through a good planned revenge. And Rocky, the master's creation, fulfills those who simply wish to observe male body perfection. All are lured by the chance to just celebrate the absurd, have fun with friends, and shout the "most delightful obscenities of the land." Spontaneity is the core to this film.

The anthem of the Rocky Horror Picture Show is "Don't dream it, be it." This simple phrase reminds us of the possibilities. Janet , the "heroine," shows the audience that it is possible to break free from the mold of convention. Dr. Frank-N-Furter shows us that a life lived entirely in dreams can be just as detrimental as a life never lived. Participation in this film gives the audience a chance for a happy medium in the world of fantasy and imagination.

For those who are "virgins" to the Rocky Horror Picture Show, here are some helpful comments for your participation enjoyment: The narrator/criminologist begins the story with "I would like (—you would, would you?), if I may (—you may), to take you on a strange journey (—how strange was it? It was so strange, they made a movie about it)". . . In the opening song "Dammit, Janet," chime in when "I really loved the (—starts with an "S") skillful way (—what a genius) you beat the other girls (with a whip) to the brides bouquet." In front of Magenta's name yell, "What's your favorite color" And in front of Columbia's name scream, "Where do you get your grass?" In the end, just let yourself go.

To enjoy this movie, you must be this movie. "Give yourself over to the pleasure." Escape is "just a jump to the left. And then a step to the right. With your hands on your hips. You bring your knees in tight. But it's the pelvic thrust they really drive you insane. Let's do the time warp again!" If you don't understand now, take time out this Wednesday to discover the fantasy.

Snakes, lizards, and gators—oh my!

Clyde Peeling's Reptileland provides an afternoon of slithery fun for all ages

BY ELIZABETH DANNEBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you happen to drive towards Bucknell along Route 15, Clyde Peeling's Reptiland is a name which must be etched in your mind. How can a name like Clyde Peeling on a billboard be passed by unnoticed, and what is a place called Reptiland doing in central Pennsylvania?

Well, to find out, I took a 15 mile hike to the town of Allenwood via Route 15 and checked out the place. Considering the number of billboards which advertise Reptiland, I came expecting the world.

I was shocked as I drove up to Reptileland and found that this glorified zoo was hidden behind a rather plain, brown wooden building. For some reason, I guess I had expected some kind of grand entrance leading to the animals. As I entered the small wooden building, sure enough, a safari-clad man named Clyde was waiting, with a smile to show me his collection of tortoises, alligators, crocodiles, snakes, lizards, and exotic birds. And what I discovered as I walked out the back door and into the "zoo," was that this really was a miniature version of your average zoo, and not a flashy tourist trap.

The animals are kept in pens with quite naturalistic settings, all within a wonderful botanical garden, complete with exotic bamboos, ornamental grasses, and flowering trees. Some say that when the trees blossom, the grounds themselves are a sight to see.

Clyde Peeling (middle), owner of Reptiland, along with his co-workers and family, calmly hold a 16 foot reticulated python from Asia.

Of course, not all of the reptiles are kept on the grounds, such as the snakes and some of the lizards, which are displayed in an indoor reptile house all year round. But rest assured, they are kept behind glass. I mean, would you feel comfortable with a gila monster if it wasn't behind glass?

Yet for those of you who would absolutely love to have a boa constrictor wrapped around your neck, reptile shows are held daily (starting Memorial Day weekend) at 10:30 a.m., and 1,3, and 5 p.m. During a show, not only can you handle some of the animals, but a staff member will tell you facts you probably never knew. For example, did you know that the rattlesnake shakes his tail out of fear, and that the noise is made by rattling dead skin that has not molted off the snake? You'll even learn the essential differences between an alligator and a crocodile! In other words, you'll be a reptile "god" by the time you walk out.

Although the original species of Reptiland came to Allenwood from all around the world, the animals there presently were captive-born. Peeling, director of Reptiland, says that he prefers it that way for two main reasons. First of all, he wants to avoid depleting wildlife. This is no surprise considering the extent of his love for animals. Second, Peeling claims that animals born in captivity are generally healthier. They are free of the parasites which abound in the wild, and therefore have a much higher rate of survival.

It is Peeling's respect for animals that has kept Reptiland open for the last 22 years.

Believe it or not, the beginnings of Reptiland date all the way back to 1964, when Peeling turned the place "from a roadside zoo to a zoo along the road." "We have gradually become part of the zoo community," said Peeling, as he proudly displays a plaque denoting the fact that Reptiland is accredited by the AAZPA (American Association of Zoological Parks and Aquariums). Peeling distinguished Reptiland from the rest declaring that his zoo is the smallest, profitable zoo.

So, for six bucks, why not visit this attraction for yourself. How often do you find a zoo, strictly for reptiles, in the middle of nowhere? And how many men do you know that are named Clyde Peeling? This man has a lot to share.

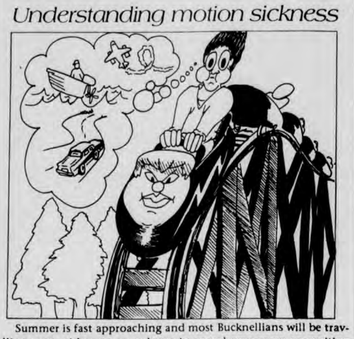
Understanding motion sickness



Summer is fast approaching and most Bucknellians will be travelling soon, either on an arduous journey home or on an exciting European vacation. But whether the mode of transportation is a clunky old car or a Concorde jet, almost everyone is susceptible to the most loathsome of sicknesses—motion sickness.

Ninety percent of American adults at some point in their lives experience motion sickness, and 10 to 15 million adults encounter it regularly when they travel, according to a recent New York Times article. Because of these large figures, scientists are trying to find the cause of the condition and new ways to treat it.

While one study implies that the condition is genetic, most others conclude that it is more of a condition of the brain than of the stomach. To be more specific, motion sickness is actually caused by the discrepancy between the sensory perception of the eye and that of the inner ear. Dr. Kenneth L. Koch, a gastroenterologist at Hershey Medical Center explains, "..the vestibular system of the inner ear sends messages about body position and movement that contradict information relayed by the eyes." While the body perceives the change in directional motion, the eyes do not and, in a way, deceive the body. Such is the case when travelling by boat, or car or while riding an amusement park ride.

Dr. Koch has conducted studies using various equipment and contraptions that simulate motion without actually having the subject move. Vertical black and white stripes on a rotating drum give the illusion of motion, while the inner ear tells the body that it really is sitting still. The subjects are then monitored using catheters and electrodes which create a picture of the events which lead to symptoms such as headache, sweaty palms, disequilibrium, and nausea. Hormone levels rise, including epinephrine, norepinephrine, and vasopressin, and rhythms in the stomach become imbalanced, and the rate speeds up to a point at which reverse peristalsis occurs, which can then lead to vomiting.

While scientists are still trying to find solutions and ways to alleviate the symptoms of motion sickness, they do offer suggestions:

•Eat a small, low-fat, starchy meal before travelling. If it is a long trip, munch on some crackers along the way. To stop nausea, pay attention to the movement that your inner ear is sensing. While driving on a winding road, for example, watch the curves out the window. On a boat, use the horizon as a reference to remind yourself that you are indeed rocking.

•Minimize body movements and especially head movements. Astronauts in early space vehicles with virtually no room for head movements experienced very little nausea.

•Stay busy with other thoughts. Subjects asked to solve mental problems got sick less frequently in motion sickness tests.

•Don't worry. Anxiety can stimulate many of the same hormonal reactions that precipitate nausea.

•Various prescription drugs are available for motion sickness, including Dramamine, promethazine, and a skin patch worn behind the ear that releases scopolomine through the skin and into the blood. While prescription drugs are helpful, some people experience moderate to severe side effects from using them.

Acupuncture is also being explored as a possible answer to eliminating motion sickness. In some cases, pressure applied to the Neiguan point in the wrist area helped subjects.

Study for finals in peace and quiet

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The library is a good place to study when you want to get work done, but with finals rapidly approaching, perhaps you've realized that it may not be the best place—especially if you have a habit of talking to anyone and everyone you know, in order to procrastinate. So for those people who are frantically searching for a new and improved work area, here are several locations which may be useful:

Residence hall study lounges are usually a good spot for reading. The day seems to be the optimal time to work there because almost everyone waits until late-night to use these rooms. Students need not trek to a distant location in order to study, and groups can work together in a convenient and comfortable area. These rooms, however, may get noisy, and the lighting in many (especially Roberts, Larison, and Harris) isn't the brightest. "The lounges are convenient because they are right in your building," comments Christine Taylor '95, resident of Smith. "They are quiet for the most part, and you don't have to truck up the hill to the library."

Two other smaller libraries are available to students. The Smith Library in Vaughan Literature, offers a cozy and inviting setting for anyone who feels at home among a plethora of classic books. Or for those who might feel more at home when surrounded by science vibes, the chem library, located on the third floor of the chemistry building is much more modern. Both are quiet, relaxed places where you'll be among people who really work, not snore.

While not a library, Newman House, located on the corner of St. George and Sixth Streets, is another quiet and relaxing place to study. And although it is probably easier for the downhill resident to head there when searching for an alternative, it is a refreshing change for the weary student. Newman House is open from now until the end of finals for anyone who needs a study area.

Don't forget the Walls and Arches lounges in the Langone Center. The rooms have soft chairs and small tables for writing, as well as a bird's-eye view of the athletic fields. These two are perfect for the odd half-hours between classes. Admittedly the Arches lounge is more aesthetically appealing, but when finals descend upon us, few will gripe about the bright orange seat covers. Both lounges, however, close at midnight.

Of course there are a number of outdoor locations for studying on those sunny, warm afternoons we covet so in Lewisburg. Not much real work gets done in the crowded quads, so one must be a little more creative when it comes to choosing a grass desk. Some secluded areas—behind Bucknell Hall, on the side of Smith Hall towards the Langone Center, or the Freas Lawn (you can even take a roll down the hill as a quick study break.) They're a great place on a hot and sunny afternoon and private enough to get the tan everyone desires.

If you suffer from the double cram syndrome, a studying disorder that tempts one to cram the brain as well as the face, finding a serene munching spot is crucial. For caffeine freaks or doughnut maniacs, Dunkin Donuts provides an aromatic, enjoyable dining and studying atmosphere. Open 24 hours a day, seven days a week, Dunkin is a great escape from the usual study spot. Perkins is yet another prime chow-while-you-study place for the weary worker. Also open 24 hours, Perkins pleases any taste and quiets down around 11 p.m.

However, if transportation is a problem, look no further than Bucknell's very own Bison. Though open only until 1 a.m., the Bison can be semi-quiet and offers a studying ambiance unique to Bucknell. And if you're desperate for food, but not willing to spend the cash, the caf will be open for a studying on Sunday, May 17th through Friday, May 22nd from 8 p.m. until midnight. Brain food and drinks will be provided compliments of Bucknell.

There are, without a doubt, many other spots which aren't as well known, but provide the necessary solitude required by so many Bucknellians. If one is imaginative there are lots of suitable locations. Mike Krupnikoff '92 remembers settling into the little round window in Smith Hall with a pillow and his work. While it might sound somewhat uncomfortable, when one is desperate for seclusion, anything is free game. Or how about the steps in front of the chem building?

It's nice to know that in addition to the library, one does indeed have a choice of private areas in which to work. It's simply a matter of finding the spot which works best for you.

Marc Haimes"

A Modern Butler

A three part short story

PART THREE; INTERMISSIONS

Supper was lovely. Lovely indeed. We assumed our designated places at the candlelit table, and helped ourselves to steaming platters of the most wonderful food I have ever dared sample. I headed the table, as Master Wildes had ordered, and quite liked it. There was a short note from Irma next to the carrots, urging us to eat as much as we liked and announcing that she, of course, would clean up after we finished the meal and retired to the drawing room. We dallied in few words throughout most of the meal. Perhaps we were simply enjoying each other's company. Silvermissy was the first one for speech. She dipped her corn bread in a small glass of saltwater and began. "I always do this, but-mother, with my food. Saltwater is so good for the gums, but I despise the way it tastes. The flavor of the corn bread drowns out the brackishness of the solution, yet I still enjoy the prophylaxes benefits. Do you find me attractive?" She chirped a pleasant little giggle (or was it a burp?) and fainted. I sprang to my feet quite adroitly, but Master Wildes threw me a halting glance. I caught it, and put it in my pocket for later. Then I sat back down.

"Don't you worry one bit about her," the good Master said. "She's always fainting. Ever since puberty. Some people sneeze, some get the hiccups, others experience chronic flatulence, my daughter faints. God knows why."

"Orgasm." This came from Churchill's direction.

"But-mother!" Silvermissy had awoken to hear Churchill's words, and was horrified, yet she still looked quite lovely I might add.

"Spot is gonna talk to me tonight. I know he's just gonna. I like Spot. I like him a lot. And I think he likes me. We're gonna communicate." Sparky nodded excitedly and scratched his ear. I learned later that he named all of them Spot.

"Delusion." The word was from Churchill.

Mrs. Wildes brushed a pleasant smile off her face with a napkin. "Come on now, everyone. How do you expect to live long happy lives if you keep up with such feuding words? Your father says we're playing tether-ball tonight. Now, as for me I like tether-ball. Unless it leads to feuding words. I hate feuding words. They can make your long life so unhappy because you so busy yourself with the feuding words you'll never get to play tether-ball."

"I hate tether-ball," Sparky muttered. "It makes me itch."

"Fleas." This was Churchill again.

"Just as long as daddy doesn't do that thing with the aerosol again, but-mother. It's so bad for the gums."

"I'm gonna give him bones and baths and read him stories and smother him with love and hugs and kisses. He'll talk to me then. I know he will. I'll be his pretend-father."

"Freud."

"You see, James. I can call you James? Most people really do think I'm a scientist, and I'm not. I'm a poet. Do you understand. You must assure me that you do understand. Scientist sounds so vulgar."

"Yes, sir. I do perfectly." This was me.

"I know the fainting is a problem but I just can't seem to help..." Silvermissy slouched forward onto the table with a delicate thud. She really was a lovely girl.

"And he would never bite me. None of them would ever bite me. They're just shy. That's all. Just shy. Yeah."

"Yet, feuding words aren't quite as bad as hateful words, which are much, much worse. I hate hateful words much worse than feuding words. Not that I'm speaking hatefully now, mind you. No, not me, I'm just excited for a long happy game of tether-ball.As long as it doesn't lead to feuding words. Did I mention you could call me Queenie?"

"Revolution."

"...myself. It just happens. All of a sudden. Do you find my eyes scintillating. Really? Be honest now. Is that the first word that comes to mind?"

"Propaganda."

It was truly lovely. Lovely indeed.

And after supper, we all excused ourselves and went into the drawing room. Since we couldn't very well spike the tether-ball pole through the floor, as that would be exceedingly improper, we decided that I, as the butler, would kneel down and hold it while the others played.And it was quite exhilarating, really. The leather ball whirled around my head as the family batted and swung, each trying to spin the ball around the pole in an opposite direction. A few times the ball would assume an unlikely slant and slam into my head or neck but, being a dedicated servant, I shrugged it off.

Like all boys, Sparky was fiercely competitive, and when he won he would become very affectionate stooping to give me a quick hug, which was quite nice, except that he smelled like a damp rug. Master Wildes also played very well, yet when he did lose he would become frustrated and spray a thick fog of aerosol around the room. This upset Silvermissy who would hold her breath to protect the gums. Soon she would faint and then be too groggy to play her next match. Churchill would substitute in, making little effort to do anything more than stare at the spinning ball. "Metaphor," he/she would mumble plaintively as Sparky secured a quick victory over him/her and howled with raucous joy, jolting Silvermissy to collapse again. Then the puberty-laden boy bent down and damp rugged me once more. "Just as long as there's no feuding words," Mrs. Wildes explained. After tether-ball I served the family a strong cup of evening tea. They sat and sipped and everyone agreed that it was splendid to have a butler around the house.

Master Wildes was the first to visit me that evening. When I heard the knock, I must admit that I was slightly taken aback. My father had always spoken of the unspoken rule that forbids household members from the servant's quarters. And yet the taboo was being violated, and on my very first night! This was indeed an unusual household. But soon, I began looking forward to the evening meetings, especially the ones with Master Wildes. He was always exceptionally lucid, no matter how odd his daytime hobbies had become. He called our moments "intermissions." With every one of his visits he would grope his way through the dark to the edge of my bed. There he would sit and answer questions. He explained that one day in the future I may have to answer a question for him. But until then, he would be happy to answer questions for me, as long as he chose the questions.

"James?"

"Yes, sir."

"Remember how I told you I was just a poet. Not a scientist."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I'm not really a poet. Not that I'm a scientist, though. I mean there's no real word to describe it. "

"Of course, sir."

"I mean it could be used as a weapon. But it could also be something very, very wonderful."

"Sir?"

Chandra Guinn '93 takes commitment a step above the rest

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian
Guinn prides herself in initiating change on campus.

There are not many places on campus that a student can go without running into a program, a committee, or some activity that Chandra Guinn '93 has not been directly or indirectly involved with. The sociology major from Mitchellville, Maryland has made her mark on the Bucknell community.

"Whatever state I find myself in, please let me be content," smiled Guinn, using a well-known quote she learned from her mother. According to these words of wisdom, Guinn is in a state of constant bliss, whether she is acting as chair on the Committee of Complimentary Activities (CCA), working on her internship with the Race and Gender Resource Center, or organizing some other group activity on campus.

Despite her involvement with several recognized organizations, Guinn speaks mostly of her dealings with non-traditional, not always recognized activities. Perhaps the most notable involvement is her recent initiation into the Alpha Kappa Alpha sorority, Inc., a national sorority that does not have a chapter at Bucknell. After a long drive to Iowa with her mother, Guinn was officially initiated into the sorority of her dreams. Guinn is the first and only member of the sorority at Bucknell, though she is trying to get more members for next fall. First established at Howard University in 1908, the predominantly, though not exclusively African-American sorority boasts several distinguished members, including Sharon Pratt Kelly, the Mayor of Washington, D.C. and Phelicia Rashad, who played Claire Huxtable on The Cosby Show. "I've waited all my life to be an AKA. Now, I'm official," said Guinn.

Guinn is also a member of Essential, the campus support group for African-American and Hispanic women. Noting the importance of the group, she said, "We share with one another the different things that happen to us at Bucknell. It is a group that you can vent good and bad feelings about Bucknell with and know that the people who are hearing you understand and sympathize with what you are saying." Another of the group's greatest interests, aside from dealing with the trials and tribulations of being a minority, is sponsoring events that reach out of the bounds of usual Bucknell activities, such as the fashion show this weekend.

As far as Bucknell's commitment toward racial unity is concerned, Guinn observed that the faculty has shown a genuine desire to improve the race relations on campus. Despite the desire and need for change, however, she noted the difficulty in receiving real action on the issues: "I believe that some faculty members have often contributed individual efforts to make the atmosphere better, and I think that there are groups on campus that recognize the need for a more diverse student body, but I don't think that they know that there is something they can do about it."

The changes that Guinn is striving to make, however, would require more action than reaction. Defining her idea of action, she said, "I am a big advocate of protesting and taking over buildings. We could shut this place down for a day and say that we won't be prepared to work in the year 2000 with these people that we know nothing about unless you bring more of them here!"

However, Guinn feels that the most important part of solving any serious problem is to ask questions, get involved and be aware of what goes on every day. "I think that the more involved you are across the board, not just in your own ethnic, racial, or other specific group, the more intelligently you can speak about the goods and bads about this campus," she said.

Guinn prides herself in her a positive self-image and bold self-assurance that she attributes to her mother. It is her strong will that has pulled her through the difficult times when her critics have tried to hold her back or put her down. "In spite of my critics, and boy, do I have them, in spite of my enemies, in spite of everything that has happened to me over the last three years, I can truly say that I am happy with Chandra right now," she laughed, "God, I am at my best. And I love me like this. It makes things so much easier. It makes each day better, and even when it rains I can find a little sunshine to let me know that things are going to be alright."

People of the Year enrich Bucknell

One glance at the campus crime statistics released this week shows that vandalism and theft account for a disproportionate amount of campus crime, and police discovered this week that a major campus crime wave may have been perpetrated by Bucknell's own students.

In light of these recent destructive incidents, we at The Bucknellian feel it especially appropriate this week to honor our 1991–92 People of the Year. As attention is drawn to the thoughtless, selfish actions of some students, this annual award recognizes members of the University community for significant positive contributions which help Bucknell to reach its full potential. These three people each believed that something was missing at Bucknell, and they worked consistently to turn these areas of weakness into strengths.

Liz Felter stood up to verbal harassment as a freshman, long before sexual harassment became the much-discussed issue it is now. Indeed, it is possible that such constructive dialogue on feminism may not be as far advanced at Bucknell today without Liz's efforts. She has taken a bold stand against sexism at Bucknell, and she was not afraid to make difficult personal choices in support of her ideals. Her decision to leave the Greek system, in which she held a leadership role, shows a level of conviction uncommon at Bucknell.

Most important to Liz's success is not the quantity of her actions, but their quality. She has a unique ability to challenge people's views in a way which spurs thought and discussion. She does not lecture and berate, she discusses and explains.

Encouraging discussion is both the occupation and the passionate avocation of our other two honorees, Assistant Professors of Religion John Grim and Mary Evelyn Tucker.

Mary Evelyn's expertise in Confucianism would seem an odd match for a place like Bucknell, but student interest in her classes has skyrocketed in her three years here. Her interest in combining religion, ecology, and globalism has encouraged this interest, as she helps students to discover they are part of a world of diverse perspectives and fundamental values.

John is a world-renowned expert in Native American religions. Bucknell is fortunate to have his knowledge, but even more fortunate for the way he has broadened these studies to reach a wider community. He has helped his many students to understand the native American world, one in which each person is intimately linked, both biologically and spiritually, to the earth.

Such perspectives are receiving more attention as we confront our global problems, and both John and Mary Evelyn have reached out to students beyond the classroom by either organizing or encouraging the Columbian Quincentennial program, the President's Forum on the Environmental Imperative, and many other campus events. They were also instrumental in bringing to campus Frederick Franck's Seven Generations, a physical embodiment of the link between the spirit and the land.

All of these people have improved the atmosphere of diversity, acceptance, and discussion on campus, and we wish to salute the three honorees for their consistent commitment to making a Bucknell a better place. We hope that their positive, constructive work will serve as an example to others.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Writers believe that Bucknell needs an advisor

TO THE EDITOR:

We are writing in annoyance upon reading M. J. Leitzell's purportedly disinterested letter of May 1, which expresses "surprise" that Bucknell has thought it necessary to hire an advisor for gay, lesbian and bisexual students. At the end of the letter, Leitzell worries that the University "may have opened a can of worms." She informs us that she has little interest in others' sexual preferences; rather, out of concern for Bucknell's financial state, Leitzell is "only afraid" that now "many other minority students like the Chinese, Indian, deaf, blind, etc. will feel that they also deserve an advisor."

The offensive implication is that gay, lesbian and bisexual students are not seriously interested "in getting an education."

First, we must congratulate Leitzell that she should "care less what a person's sexual reference is." Gays, lesbians and bisexuals everywhere will undoubtedly be relieved to learn from this letter that they have one less homophobe to worry about.

However, Leitzell should know that Chinese, Indian and some other "minority students" already have faculty advisors, (and if Bucknell's "deaf, blind, etc." students do not have a faculty advisor, we sincerely hope they will soon lobby for one). This news may "surprise" Leitzell, but the students concerned are quite happy to have someone to turn to when, as happens too often, they encounter cultural dislocation, racial hatred and xenophobia.

Bucknell's gay, lesbian and bisexual students have hitherto had no such institutional support. Furthermore, this advisor will help Bucknell's heterosexual community deal with homophobia, thus making an "educational" contribution to the entire campus. However, we should note that the new advisor has been appointed to work only five hours a week: this should not, significantly hurt Bucknell's budget, but we wonder whether anyone can deal with the enormous problem of homophobia on our campus in some twenty hours a month.

Leitzell seems to envision a happy academic utopia in which students who are "busy getting an education" never have to experience sexual or racial harassment, violence or discrimination. Surely, she argues, "no professor would have the insensitivity to question any student on his sexuality." And surely again, nobody would bother a

Reader believes that advisor will foster education

TO THE EDITOR:

I want to address M.J. Leitzell's questions about the need for a gay, lesbian and bisexual advisor at Bucknell University. M. J. Leitzell, I would like to introduce you to a section of Bucknell's Mission statement:

Bucknell expects its students to be concerned with two closely related types of development: that of the productive citizen and that of the person working toward intellectual maturity and self-awareness. Bucknell's education program stresses the preparation of its students for the exercise of high responsibility in all phases of society. The undergraduate experience serves as a catalyst for the student's intellectual development and as a means of fostering the growth of each individual's capacity for self-awareness and sustained commitment to learning.

Because our society presents continuing challenges to values, students are encouraged to cultivate respect for other individuals and cultures, enhancing in the course of this pursuit their own moral sensitivity, personal creativity, and emotional stability. At the same time, Bucknell's residential character provides a matrix within which institutional programs and practices that exemplify compassion, civility, and a sense of justice form an aspect of the educational experience.

I am a student who views this mission as worthy and strives to utilize my education at Bucknell to develop in these ways. In accordance with the underlying theme of Bucknell's mission, I feel that the addition of Mr. Matthew Frericks as an advisor should be seen as an opportunity to further many students' intellectual maturity, self-awareness and ability to become a responsible and respectful members of society.

M. J. Leitzell, I believe that your question of how students feel about the addition of a gay, lesbian and bisexual advisor when gays represent only a small segment of the population may have been misguided. A gay/lesbian/bisexual advisor's responsibilities are not limited only to gay, lesbian and bisexual students and faculty. I would suggest that Mr. Frericks would be open and responsive to other individuals' questions about homosexuality and the Bucknell community. Hopefully, this type of dialogue will allow for Bucknell students to "cultivate respect for other individuals."

M. J. Leitzell, maybe you haven't read about intolerance for gays, lesbians and bisexuals or etc. in the Daily Item, but the injustices that are inherent in homophobia, sexism and racism often escape notice by the media. Injustices against gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and others are a regular occurrence in American society and at Bucknell. As for the argument that gays, lesbians and bisexuals are excluded, I find that easy to believe. A person at Bucknell University may be interested first and foremost in obtaining an education. However, many gay, lesbian, or bisexual students are subject to verbal harassment, the loss of friends, and even death threats by individuals who are homophobic. I find it hard to believe that any individual could prosper in this type of environment. The exclusion comes when these individuals feel that it is necessary to leave Bucknell to pursue a more hospitable educational environment. I think it is important to emphasize that students' time at Bucknell is aimed at creating both intellectual and societal maturity and responsibility.

Homophobics must realize that not everyone agrees with their lifestyle. Especially, I (I don't take the liberties, as M.J. Leitzell does, to assume that my opinions are those of anyone but myself) am offended that individuals who have not examined the underlying themes that surround an issue such as homophobia should make such broad moral judgements. I, for one, believe that an individual should not have to hide their sexual orientation in fear that they will offend someone. M. J. Leitzell, I would suggest taking a thorough look at your own moral sensitivity and awareness before you begin to judge that of others.

I am just afraid by not allowing the hiring of gay/lesbian/bisexual advisor, Bucknell University would have been in violation of their own mission and would have missed the opportunity to foster an environment that is compassionate, civil and just. Furthermore, additional hiring of advisors for Native Americans, Asians, the differently abled, and any other student/faculty population should not be viewed as a financial burden but as an added chance to enhance the Bucknell community. By hiring Mr. Matthew Frericks, Bucknell University has not opened a can of worms, rather they have made a great, forward stride in creating an academic and residential climate in which all individuals can prosper.

Resist the urge for stupid fun

TO THE EDITOR:

From one Bucknellian to another, don't play with fireworks. It's hardly worth the trouble you're going to have to put up with when you get caught. Trust me on this one.

Although fireworks are legal in some states, they are not in this one. I had started out on a Saturday night with intentions of good clean fun. Soon I was caught in a snowball effect and what at that instantaneous second seemed like a fun idea was really inexcusably stupid. When I shot a bottle rocket off outside the front of Hunt Hall I wasn't considering the other people. What if by some freak chance the bottle rocket had started a fire? I have training as a member of an ambulance crew and have seen the pain and suffering burn victims go through. In some cases the dead layers of outer skin have to be removed with treatments of bleach during a long agonizing ordeal. Imagine if someone had you to thank for such pain. Of course no one really thinks of these things during that split second of "fun."

In a close community where so many people are concentrated in a few cramped areas, any form of fire is a very serious threat to the welfare of these people. To top it off, these people are your friends. The last people on earth who warrant a stupid, freak moment of inconsideration that could ruin the rest of their life or destroy everything they own. Don't betray your friends with an uncharacteristic neglect for common sense. Rationally weigh the consequences against the advantages. Do it now, don't wait until you're faced with a spontaneous impulse. It's just not worth the risk.

In summary I just want to warn you. Fireworks, BB guns, smoke bombs, and whatever are, for a good reason, considered dangerous and illegal on this campus. I urge you to resist the temptation of these trouble-making and potentially harmful toys. When you look back at it the next day, you will be glad that you had the common sense to find another less expensive and less dangerous way to have fun.

Coffee with Alice

Women should take back the night and a whole lot more

BY CHARLES SACKREY
Bucknell Progressive Caucus

Try to imagine a society where all but a few of the thousand most powerful people in business and government are women, and where all the other centers of life—church, school, sports, the media, etc.—are overwhelmingly dominated by females. Imagine further that women have come to the opinion (about which they are not coy) that their dominance proves their superiority. Imagine you're a male in such a society and your sweetheart and her friends consider you a nice guy, hard working and all—even cute, with those glistening teeth—but...well, you're a guy and not quite as bright as they are. (And, of course, she and the friends know that your testosterone level varies from one part of the month to another, and thus on those few days of the month when it is ragingly high, you'll have to be avoided, perhaps even quarantined.)

After all, for all its bombast and self-congratulation, what has male leadership delivered to us?

Quite naturally in this world, being dominant, women will also have largely determined the shape and tone of the language, how it's used and for what purposes. The he's in all the writing will be she's, and while thousands of studies will have been written about Emma Goldman and Jane Addams, writing about Norman Shwartzkopf and Vince Lombardi will be found mostly in narrowly argued texts on abnormal psychology. Women will also have produced their own Freud to ponder upon the special frailty of males. In such a psychology, the deep-trench banality of the thinking of a male like Ronald Reagan might be considered a specific syndrome, "mammary envy," whereby some young boys become clinically moronic by learning to hate their own bodies (given their useless flat chests and the knowledge, learned from looking at not-so-smart daddy, that someday their chests will also be made ugly by matted hair.)

Imagine last, that by being so completely dominant in this world, women got the idea that, as well as not being as quick as they on the uptake, as a male you're not quite as human as they are, either. So, one night you go to a party and a couple of women get you loaded on beer (because they know your being a male won't allow you to say "no" even unto unconsciousness). And, when you pass out, they strip you, call in a few friends, do unimaginable things to your body, then for the next week in certain circles the hook and crook of your private parts are, in certain female circles, the subject of a derisive, dismissive gossip. You might even discover that in these circles you're known as "Teeny Weeny," or "Limber Member."

What a world in which to be a boy! Or a man! How would we males actually take it? How long would we wait before we sought to change it? How much time would we lose working through the self-doubt? How many times would we pause for fear of retaliation? How many little revolts would we have to stage before we gathered momentum for a real assault? Who would be our revolutionaries? Who would be the traitors to our cause, and who would sleep most soundly with the enemy?

If we males spend a few moments imagining a world run by women—particularly if they followed our own lead and largely dominated everything—we can surely understand better what we are hearing from women who carry the banner in front of the march, who are shouting the slogans, and planning the strategic moves for coming battles. The possibility that we are only at the beginning of a protracted struggle between men and women in America over power and dignity raises a good question, and like the old labor song asks it: "Which side are you on?" For my part, I trust more what I hear

Specter will have to campaign around Yeakel

BY NANCY NEUMAN

Designing a winning strategy for Senator Arlen Specter in his race against Lynn Yeakel for the U.S. Senate seat in Pennsylvania will be tricky. First, he cannot attack Yeakel on her gender. Direct sexist attacks do not attract voters, no matter what their politics are. Second, he cannot patronize Yeakel if he appears to put her down for being inexperienced and unfamiliar with the ways of the Senate, he will step into the Anita Hill minefield. Third, he cannot accuse her of distorting his record or not telling the truth, lest the spector of Specter accusing Hill of perjury in the Clarence Thomas hearings becomes the only issue of the campaign.

Both Yeakel and Specter are pro-choice, so there's not much play on that issue, except that pro-choice women voters are more likely to trust a woman to maintain her position, as opposed to a male legislator who might trade off a pro-choice vote for a vote on some other issue. Specter has won the loyalty of civil rights groups for his votes in the Senate, so Yeakel and he can't debate the question of whether affirmative action policies promote equal opportunity or promote "quotas."

Now that the Cold War is over, Specter can't claim expertise in weapons sytems versus a candidate who has not been involved in defense policy debates. So what's left? Crime policy. Crime is Specter's issue. He can argue that as a former District Attorney and incumbent Senator he is tough on crime, and question Yeakel's ability to deal with street weapons and the constitutional questions surrounding cops and the courts. Here's a post-Cold War way to go after a woman candidate without appearing to attack her for being a woman. Instead of suggesting that Yeakel doesn't know an F-16 from a B-2 bomber, he can charge that only someone with his background and long years of service can protect the public from violent crime. There is no evidence that women are soft on crime, but voters may believe otherwise.

Yeakel has been called a political "novice" or "neophyte" ever since she won the primary race. Yet her career is typical of women politicians. Most get their start in networks of women where they sharpen the leadership skills one needs to win public office: public speaking, fundraising, negotiation, and a working knowledge of issues. Few women who have spent years in political organizations consider themselves "novices."

Women candidates, like Yeakel, are proving they can command the level of contributions that male candidates receive, a break from the past. But women candidates still have to campaign a bit differently from men. Usually they face a paradox: they must appear tough enough to do the job, but not so tough they create an image that will backfire. Voters still want women candidates to run positive campaigns and not be too aggressive. Male candidates, on the other hand, can be tough, aggressive, attack their opponents, and win. Bill Clinton has been credited with having the guts to stand up to negative attack—apparently this is a quality Democratic voters think is important in a campaign against President Bush. No woman candidate would be congratulated for a similar strategy.

But male candidates have to adjust their campaign style if their opponent is a woman. Lynn Yeakel is now a proven winner. Specter has his work cut out for him.

Buchanan loses by praising L.A. acquittal

The Road to the White House

BY JOHN SHIRE

On May 5, in reference to the Los Angeles riots, The Wall Street Journal claimed that Patrick Buchanan "praised the jury that acquitted the police charged with beating Rodney King, accused President Bush of 'appeasing the mob' by making 'weak and equivocal' statements about the rioting and staunchly opposed any social programs to ameliorate inner city problems." Further, Buchanan is quoted as declaring, "This orgy of violence and lynching cannot be used to shake down the American taxpayer for another Great Society."

I have always been one to advocate the maintenance of peace and order at any cost. I even condone violence as a means of achieving this end if it is necessary; however, I believe that a line must be drawn between a use of force and excessive violence as a means of preserving peace. Additionally, I believe that it is a big mistake to dismiss social programs as a means of ameliorating inner city problems. True, I was not there when King charged at the police in a drunken state, and I never saw the compiled evidence during the trial. But neither was Patrick Buchanan present at the incident, nor did he sit through the court trials. For him to dismiss an investigation into the incident as "weak and equivocal" reveals that he is abrupt and irrational. Bush was wise to state that from what he had seen, it looked like the acquittal was a poor decision, but that he would make his final decision after a thorough Federal investigation. This is sound reasoning. It is open and provides for the benefit of the doubt.

For Buchanan to oppose programs to ameliorate the inner-city crime is an understandable opinion from a right-wing conservative, but it ignores the reality of the escalating situation. I consider myself conservative in the sense that I believe in hard work, big business with limited government intervention, a strong defense program, a general division of labor according to quality of education, and maintaining the status quo. I will acknowledge the fact that those who live in the ghettos of Los Angeles are highly uneducated, poor, violent and a nuisance to the law enforcement system under question, but I also recognize the social forces that serve to keep these people in their present state of inferiority and conflict with respect to the broader population of the United States. Widespread education throughout the inner-city slums of Los Angeles is a reasonable means of reducing crime and encouraging those with potential to break out from an angry and frustrated way of life. Some of those who have not had the opportunities that most of us share, such as education, healthy food, and access to medical care, may really be intelligent and have a lot to offer society as a whole. If they are not given the chance to demonstrate these abilities, no one will ever discover their talents. This may cause greater frustration which will turn to anger, and will result in more violence.

It is one thing to advocate order in society through the use of force, and quite another thing to dismiss a reasonable means of preserving the order. Unfortunately for Patrick Buchanan, he maintains his hard ball game in the election rhetoric by supporting physical force as a means of preserving peace in society and dismissing a means of ameliorating the causes of violence. I staunchly support Buchanan in his campaign for a more effective method of immigration control. I even respect Buchanan for having the guts to praise the jury for not giving in to the country's cries of outrage in acquitting the police charged with beating Rodney King, but some situations do not simply disappear. They only get worse.

I doubt that Buchanan thinks that he even has a shot at winning the Republican nomination for election '92, and I am sure that he is just reminding everyone what he thinks Republican policy should be. To me, this is good stuff. For I would not want to see an unreasonable individual, who lacks compassion for a suffering part of society, in the Executive Office. Bush came out on top of this one. He showed compassion, and a willingness to wait until a Federal investigation is completed, before deciding whether or not King was truly "beaten" by the police. Further, Bush never dismissed the idea of social programs to ameliorate inner-city crime. If praise should be given, it should be given directly to our President.

most women imagining about the future than what I hear from most men.

After all, for all its bombast and self-congragulation, what has male leadership delivered to us? Without question, there is that huge heap of consumer goods over there. But, it is one paid for by a gasping planet; a citizenry of which one third is, quite simply, destitute; a society in which every niche is a hierarchy; where officialdom is widely and deservedly perceived as corrupt; where one gender remains largely dominated by the other one; where the minority population remains widely feared, and I believe, widely despised; and where the division between the rich and poor grows steadily.

What can we lose by listening to the women, or, more, by joining them?

Women should not have to be afraid

TO THE EDITOR:

On Monday, the KDR fraternity sponsored the "He Said, She Said" program in which men and women on our campus expressed their varied opinions on gender relations, sexism, and ultimately, rape. During this, Sarah Pryor voiced her opinion that "Women live in constant fear of rape," and that "Every man is a potential rapist." Now, of course I agreed with her statements, as they are only logical in our present society of sexual harassment and assault. However, until this past weekend, I had never really understood the full extent that women have come to fear men, alone, at night.

Here's my story: I was walking along the path connecting Smith dorm with the gym, between the soccer field and the cemetery. Those who have walked there in the past at night know that this is a poorly lit, dangerous stretch for a woman alone at night. Therefore, I was surprised when I was walking along at about 10 p.m. that a woman, presumedly another student, was coming toward me from the fieldhouse. As we were about to pass each other, I politely said, "Hi." I was promptly maced by the woman. I fell to the ground, in pain and retching, and heard her run away into the night. As I showered later, for the nearly two hours it took to get the stench off of me, I finally overcame my anger, took a serious look at this seemingly unjust act perpetrated against me, and quickly forgave.

I am a founder of Men Against Rape. I have been called a crusader in this movement. In my opinion, I would never rape a woman or try to put her in fear of such an action. The woman I met last weekend, could never know this simply by looking at me. I appear just as capable and suspicious of rape to the opposite gender as any stranger that they would meet alone at night. I had never truly considered this before. I do not wear a flashing neon sign on my chest proclaiming to the world that I am not a rapist. For this poor woman, my first statement, simply that of "Hi," could have preceded an assault.

However, until this past weekend, I had never really understood the full extent that women have come to fear men, alone, at night.

Is this what our society has come to? Despite laws demanding equality for women, they cannot even walk the streets of Bucknell without the fear of being violated or killed by another human being. We who participated last week in the Take Back The Night march were met with booing and derision at some places on campus. What were these men shouting at us, that rape is good, that women should live in fear of men every day and every night of the rest of their lives? Obviously, these sentiments are absurd. For how many of these men, how many know if their girlfriend, sister, or mother has been raped? Considering one in four women are raped in our society today, that is a distinct possibility. I am sure that these victimized loved ones would bear different feelings on the matter.

We need to do more than simply say that rape is wrong. We need to improve our campus community, make it safe for both genders as they walk alone at night. Women have just as much right to liberty as men, and we have denied them this right far too long. I bear the woman who injured me no malice, as I am happy that she was overly cautious. She needs to be in our society. However, is it not ridiculous that men have bred so much fear in women of sexual assault that it is not even possible for one human being to simply greet another when they meet without the possibility of worry or concern for life and sanctity? We have a lot to change. You know what must be done for the changes to happen. Let us, together, start them now.

Senior is disappointed by Bucknell

TO THE EDITOR:

As a senior nearing graduation, I feel compelled to address a number of issues that have bothered me for much of my career at Bucknell.

The first of my points of contention is the treatment I, along with most of my class, have received at the hands of this school's administration. A large part of my discontent stems from the shabby treatment I have been the victim of solely because I belong to a fraternity. In my four years, I have been called a racist, elitist, sexist by the simpleton librarian; I have had my academic integrity insulted by a bunch of whining, egotist faculty members; and I have had every aspect of my social life scrutinized by regressive-thinking, senile administrators. Heaped on top of all of these insults is the fact that my family has forked over nearly $100,000 to garner such impressive services.

I applied early decision to Bucknell because I knew it was the school for me. The size was exactly what I was looking for, the campus was incredible, the academic reputation was lofty, and the social scene was given "five stars" by all of the college rating books. Unfortunately, I have been disappointed at every turn.

Although several of the courses I took here were interesting and informative, several others were incredibly boring. Many of the professors I have taken courses from seem to have little grasp on the needs of students in the 1990's, but seem more interested in getting their own point of view across to their students. I have also found the elective options lacking in variety, and most of the interesting courses are filled by "majors" before any non-majors can enroll.

The social scene here, once hailed as outstanding, has decayed to the point of ridiculousness. The school seems to think that by offering a comedian in the Bison, or a movie in some auditorium, they can provide legitimate alternatives to drinking. In case they forgot, we are in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, and there is nothing to do here! Because the school passed reactionary measures to be sure they were totally in step with the brilliant policies of Act 31, students have been made to feel like the subjects of some Orwellian nightmare. I do not feel that anyone who pays over $20,000 a year to attend a university should constantly have to be looking over their shoulder for fear that some Neanderthal security guard will write them up for being drunk. We work extremely hard at Bucknell, and when the weekend comes, we want to play hard to release tension.

As if the school had not slapped us around enough in our four years here, they had to take two last steps to insult our intelligence. The first of these incidents was President Sojka's whimsical selection of our graduation speaker, explained by the brilliant disclaimer that commencement is a whole school event. If that is so, why are the dorms locked to undergraduate students the day after finals end? Why aren't the undergraduate students required to stay for it? How many non-seniors attend? President Sojka has spent four years lying to us about his motives and his actions, and this was a final example of him spitting in our faces.
The second send-off this school has given us was completely abandoning the Jan Plan. Over my three January sessions, I did not have a true Jan-session before my semester in Washington. I earned more than $2500 in spending money for my spring semesters. Several other students used this time to earn sorely needed money, while others had some of the most valuable learning experiences of their Bucknell careers over January. How many students will now have a chance to go to China, or Russia, or gain internships that often result in jobs after graduation? The faculty has admitted to everyone that they really don't care enough about the students to put in the effort required to re-work the Jan Plan to everyone's benefit. I worry for the students who will be following me through Bucknell without the Jan Plan experience because the faculty was too selfish to have it.

In conclusion, I would like to say that I am leaving Bucknell disillusioned and angry. I feel that the school I applied to is no longer the school that exists, and that I have been the victim of false advertising. I considered transferring for a while, but that would not have allowed me to go to Washington for what turned out to be the best semester of my four years. This place is a ridiculous facade of self-righteous professors and conniving administrators who obviously care very little about the needs of the student body.

P.S. If those unsubstantiated accusations generalize, stereotype, and hurt people's feelings, maybe the victims can understand what I was made to feel like during my time here at Bucknell!

Campus volunteers thanked

TO THE EDITOR:

As the semester comes to a close, I wanted to let all of you know how much your volunteerism meant to Project Diploma at Milton Area School District.

Project Diploma, a drop-out prevention program, has been coordinating academic assistance programs for four years. This past year has been the most successful. With more than 70 Bucknell students being matched with junior high and senior high students. The Milton students have ranged in various needs from being potential drop-outs to being an academic student in need of assistance with their studies. Whatever the need, your volunteerism often enabled the students to do better in their coursework as well as exemplified positive role models.

More than 100 students volunteered for this project and I do extend apologies that we were unable to schedule all of you this year. It is hoped that next year the program will be even more efficient at utilizing the powerful volunteer spirit that has come forth from Bucknell.

To all of you who did devote your time, energy, and talent for Project Diploma, I thank you. At the risk of accidentally leaving out a name or two, I chose not to list you... but you know who you are. If you are a senior and will be graduating, I wish you all the best. If you will be returning to Bucknell in the fall, I look forward to working with you again in September.

true scholar "unless that person [i.e. the true scholar] tries to persuade others to join his lifestyle against their will."

We are not sure that Leitzell has ever met or talked at any length to a gay, lesbian, bisexual, or for that matter Chinese, Indian, blind, deaf, or "etc." student. If she had done so, she would know (a) that gay/lesbian/bisexual students do not run around Lewisburg trying to "convert" people who "do not agree with their lifestyle;" (b) that plenty of people "have the insensitivity" to question, ridicule and attack others' sexual preference; and (c) that homophobia is prevalent among many heterosexuals who have never been harassed by homosexuals, as the great majority haven't. Leitzell seems to believe that those who suffer discrimination, harassment, and violence have brought it on themselves by using their position as students only as a cover to engage in homosexual activity.

The offensive implication is that gay, lesbian and bisexual students are not seriously interested "in getting an education." We wish Leitzell understood the profound ignorance of this suggestion. Bucknell's many gay, lesbian and bisexual students are among its most astute, perceptive and well-informed, and some are graduating this year with honors. They have not only knowledge gleaned from textbooks and professors, but also that special insight and maturity which comes from having learned to survive in insensitive, hostile, and dangerous environments.

Prejudice against homosexuals comes not only from overt acts of hostility and violence, but also from assumptions like Leitzell's that gay, lesbian, and bisexual students are acceptable, but only if they hide their sexual orientation and confine themselves to classroom activities. No such restrictions are ever placed on heterosexual students, who are allowed to date, kiss, hold hands, speak about their relationships, and generally be seen outside the classroom without their seriousness as students being questioned. It seems Leitzell's tolerance only extends to those gays, lesbians, and bisexuals who make themselves invisible.

Leitzell's attitude is both outrageous and unfortunately too typical. We strongly recommend that Leitzell—or anyone unconvinced of the prevalence of homophobia and other types of discrimination—attend one of the meetings in which gay, lesbian, bisexual or "etc." people speak out about the violence and hatred they must daily confront.

Testing the power of the pen

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The William Smith Library in Vaughan Literature Building has always been one of the more classic-looking niches on campus. The atmosphere it creates provides the perfect setting for one of Bucknell's newest traditions—the poetry and fiction reading done each semester by the first-level creative writing class.

Organized for the past several years by Mindy Weinreb, associate professor of English, the original conception for the readings was to provide students interested in writing with a place to share their work and ideas. Weinreb comments, "I initially thought it would create a community of underground writers at Bucknell." What it has become is a semi-annual event, forever changing in response to the personality of each consecutive class.

One of the more competitive English classes to get into, Weinreb has increased the number of sections of creative writing taught per year to three, and still the registrar turns away numerous students every semester. One of the main attractions for most students is that the creative writing program is not your typical Bucknell course, and Weinreb felt that it was "not a course that's suited to a traditional evaluation." While the reading does conclude the course, it is by no means a substitute final. Instead Weinreb describes it as a "celebration for us as a group."

Semantics
by Katie Levine

Momma calls you Roman,
says you give me
"the profile of an ancient aristocrat."
To her, you're the nose that toppled empires and the force that set those thousand ships to sailing.
But I don't see any Marcus Aurelius waiting to carry us off in his chariot.
No Ceasars pine away in this land, holding feasts and staging battles in our honor.
Here, there are only pretty boys in a regalia of crew necked sweaters and white tennis shoes.
Young men who once raised cries of "Elephant Nose" against us from across their playground battlefields.
Gentlemen who still look blindly by you and me,
on their conquests for the flat-faced prizes decorating this ivy-covered landscape.
So I don't want you to be a Roman nose.
You've got to be something different.

Daddy calls you my heritage,
an extension of the family line.
He tells me you are a beautiful nose, and besides, "ethnic is in."
"In where?" is what I want to ask him.
This is no melting pot.
Your hard Eastern European contour would never dissolve into the potage of creamy blonds that we have here.
Nor could we ever jump into a kettle
peppered with names like "Jew Girl" and "JAP Nose."
Our delicate flavoring would be destroyed by this unsavory broth-watered down by the stares of unkind, ice-blue eyes.
So I don't want you to be an ethnic nose.
You've got to be something else.
You will be my delicate nose, my petite nose,
my well-shaped, ever-lovely, cute-as-a-button nose.
And perhaps if I repeat these appelations long and loud, day after day, each will come to be—refashioning you—just as their words have molded me.

Writing, Weinreb explains further, is an essentially private activity. To choose to write for a semester about feelings distinguishes a student from his or her classmates. The context of writing is really the self, something you can't evaluate with a formal exam. She decided early on that "the best way to help students feel like writers was to insist that they participate in those activities that writers participate in."

The response from the students of the class has been good. Some students moving on to higher level creative-writing courses continue to participate in readings. Likewise the feedback from the Bucknell community has been positive as well. Weinreb comments, "It is a kind of tradition at this point. They (the campus) like it. Even if they don't attend, they like the idea of it."

Although this is Weinreb's final semester teaching the creative writing course, the imprint she has left behind is sure to linger in the years to come. Asked to comment on her feelings towards the readings, Weinreb commented, "I did it for the students. I wanted to give them the feeling that there were people to talk to."

The English 106 creative writing class will give a poetry and fiction reading Tuesday, May 12 at 7 p.m. in Smith Library, Vaughan Literature. The reading is free and open to the public.

Zukerman delights audience

Acclaimed violinist dazzled full house at Weis Center Saturday

BY JASON SPEIGELMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

From the moment the curtains opened on the Weis Center stage, the audience knew that the performance last Saturday night would be a memorable one. Even though acclaimed violinist Pinchas Zukerman and pianist Marc Neikrug played for nearly two hours, the audience would easily have sat for more.

The concert opened with the Sonata for Violin and Piano in E-flat, K. 302 by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, and the listeners were captivated by the very first note. Zuckerman's mastery of the delicate instrument came forth fluently and flawlessly. The distinct difference in tempo between the two movements of the work was effectively finessed without drawing unneccesary attention to the change, and the talented fingers of Zukerman exacted the right amount of flare from the piece. Because Mozart wrote these accompanied works with a piano in mind that had half the power of a Steinway & Sons grand piano, Neikrug's beautiful accompaniment tended to drown out the violin in spots. However the beautiful sound of Zukerman was never lost.

Three complete works by William Schumann followed, and were played almost perfectly. The first, Romances, Op. 94, demonstrated the unspoken mental link between the two performers. Even at the several points where the music stopped and resumed, Zukerman and Neikrug did not need to look at one another, but rather played as their combined experience allowed them.

The next work, Marchenbilder for Viola, Op. 113, showed the diversity of the Tel Aviv-born performer. While known as a world-class violinist, many people are unaware of the skill Zukerman possess on the viola. Although this even lower instrument was more difficult to hear in the large auditorium, the finesse with which it was played was unaffected. The four-movement piece was brilliantly interpreted and left the audience trying to decide from which instrument they wanted to hear more.

The last of the Schumann works was the beautiful Phantasiestucke, Op. 73, an appropriate end to the first half of the program. The piece was a thrilling journey through the upper and lower registers of the violin. The congruency between piano and violin only served to emphasize the professionalism of both men.

Haika, a contemporary piece by Takemitsu, opened the second half of the show with an intriguing sound created by the odd intervals of music. Like many modern composers, Takemitsu abandoned the traditional style of melody versus harmony, and experimented with intervals that are not usually found in classical works of music.

Responding to three curtain calls, Zukerman and Neikrug performed a short encore, a selection arranged by Robert Fuchs, to satisfy the audience's hunger for more of the wonderful music.

The hall, which is large and tends to kill the sound of solo voices or instruments, did have some effect on the sound coming from Zukerman's hands. Brenda Brilliant, a member of Zukerman's management staff said, "It is a beautiful hall and (it) really brought out the best of Mr. Zukerman." Though pressed for time, Zukerman stopped backstage for a few minutes to sign autographs, and the friendliness of the man only added to the enjoyment of the evening's performance.

Men's lax starts, ends on a roller coaster

Complete first winning season in recent history at 7–6; after downing Colgate 16–11, Bison conclude with 11–8 loss to Lafayette

BY DARREN S. MILLMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It would just not have been appropriate for the men's lacrosse team to finish the 1992 season winning five of its last six games given the up-and-down nature of the year's first seven contests. Maintaining their reputation for being consistently inconsistent, the Bison followed up a 16-11 drubbing of Colgate on Parents' Weekend with a season-ending 11-8 loss at Lafayette on Saturday.

After a week long lay-off, the Bison boarded the team bus and headed for Easton, PA in hopes of clinching sole possession of secon' place in the Patriot League behind league champ Army. The team had reason to feel confident going into this one as it was coming off the impressive win over Colgate and had won four of its last five games.

Despite the fact that the team came out slow in the first thirty minutes of play, Bucknell found itself very much in the game trailing by only one goal, 7-6. According to midfielder Dan Snyder '93, "We were still confident at halftime that we would prevail in the end."

Unfortunately for the Bison, the Leopards, and one Leopard in particular, came out hungry for a share of second place in the league. Lafayette goalie Ryan Stewart had a spectacular game stoning Bucknell attackers time and time again throughout the second half. Snyder commented that Stewart "made several clutch saves in crucial situations which allowed their team to keep the momentum throughout the game." After four quarters of play, Stewart had made 27 saves giving him an highly impressive save percentage of 77% for the game.

Seven of the eight Bison goals scored in the game came from the sticks of seniors playing in their final collegiate games. The Class of '92 was well represented by Kevin Roth (four goals), Matt Comyns (two goals, one assist), and Doug DePietro (one goal, one assist). Freshman midfielder Chris Pemberton provided the other Bison goal while Justin Zackey '94, Todd Streelman '93, and Baird McIlvain '95 each added assists.

On Parents' Weekend, the Bison entertained the fans on the hill with three of the finest quarters the team had played all year. The defense was solid from the goalie play of Colin Barker '94 to the close defense of Jeff Kangas '94, Pat Hatcher '92, and Gabe Portuondo '93.

The offense was unstoppable in the second quarter, riddling the Colgate goalie with a constant barrage of shots which resulted in eight Bison goals. In pursuit of his 100th career point, DePietro relentlessly led the Bison onslaught. Midway through the second quarter DePietro eclipsed the century mark, joining an elite group of only 13.

Coach Sid Jamieson pulled most of his starters early in the second half as the Bison held a commanding 13-5 lead after three quarters. The second-string defensive unit proved unable to shut down the Colgate offense, allowing six goals in the final 15 minutes of play. Nevertheless, Bucknell cruised to a 16-11 win.

DePietro had a terrific game recording three goals and three assists, while Zackey added three and two. Comyns, Roth and Snyder each had two and one while Streelman had one and two. Rik Herrema '93, Chris DiMenna '95, and Pemberton each had goals, and Greg Brown '92 and Kangas both added assists.

The prospects for next year are difficult to judge at this point. While the midfield position was the team's greatest question mark at the beginning of this year, that position should be significantly more solid next season. A number of young players, including Pemberton, DiMenna, Chris Wyszynski '95, and McIlvain gained valuable experience this year and should contribute even more in 1993. Veterans Snyder and Herrema will provide the leadership at midfield.

Attackman Matt Comyns '92, shown here during the Colgate game, finished his career with 16 goals and 26 assists, including 13 goals and 17 assists during this past season.

Before the season began, the attack appeared to be one of the more solid aspects of the Bison game, and in hindsight that observation proved true. The attack unit is, however, losing its three top scorers to graduation, with Streelman being the only player returning who has significant game experience. Look for Zackey to move into a starting attack position next year to help fill the gap.

The defensive unit, which was hot and cold this year, should also be improved next season. The Bison return a number of experienced defensemen as well as both goalies.

Although the season-ending loss to underdog Lafayette was certainly a great disappointment, the team did manage to finish the season with a winning record of 7-6, the first men's lacrosse team to do that in a number of years.

Brian Sipes — The Bucknellian

Justin Zackey '94, shown here in a game played earlier this season against nationally ranked Towson State, finished with 20 goals, second best on the team, and a team-high 20 assists for a total of 40 points.

Baseball drops six of last seven

Kennedy homers in final at-bat; Koerner earns all-league honors

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For the Class of '92, it was a bittersweet ending to a fine four years. The senior foursome of Mark Kennedy, Dave Koerner, Bill Rinker, and Jim Zervanos accounted for 68 victories for their careers—more than any other class in Bucknell history.

This season ended on a down note, however, as the Bison were beaten in six of their last seven games, including a crucial three-game sweep by Lafayette last weekend. Lafayette, who has now been Bucknell fourteen straight times dating back to 1986, clinched second place in the Patriot League, while the Bison had to settle for third. The Fordham Rams won the title for the second consecutive year.

The first game of the Lafayette series on Saturday included a dandy of a pitching matchup. Bucknell's Jack Kazanjian '93 faced Jeff Antolick of the Leopards. Kazanjian (6-2) needed just one more win to tie the all-time Bucknell record of seven, while Antolick would go on to be named to the First-Team All-Patriot League. On this day Antolick backed up his nomination by tossing a four-hit shutout, 7-0. Kazanjian, meanwhile, was roughed up for nine hits in seven innings.

The second game of Saturday's doubleheader was much closer. Lafayette jumped out to a 5-0 lead after a four-run third inning against Kurt Waldner '93. The Bison got right back into the game in the bottom of the third by scoring three times. A sacrifice fly by Mike Kearns '93 and a two-run single by Matt Sniegocki '93 made it a game again. However, that would be all of the scoring for the day. The Bison had baserunners in every other inning, including two on with two out in the last inning, but could not get anyone home.

Sunday's affair turned out to be a slugfest, but the results were the same for the home team. Lafayette sent twelve men to the plate in a seven-run fifth inning, on their way to a 13-7 triumph. Dave Scranton '95 (3-3) was the losing pitcher for the Bison. At the plate, Zervanos, Larry Trout '93 and Scott Sutfin '94 had three hits apiece, and Rinker drove in three.

Despite the lost weekend, Bucknell still had a chance to finish the year with a winning record. The team accomplished that feat on Wednesday with a dramatic 6-4 win over C.W. Post. Trailing 4-1 into the ninth inning, C.W. Post rallied to tie the game against Jim Stevens '94. However, the Bison would pull this one out. Mike Kearns '93 started a two-out rally in the bottom of the ninth with a sharp single to left. Koerner was next up, and the designated hitter blasted a long home run to end the game, just like that. The win pushed the team's record to 18-16 with one game to play, thus assuring a winning record for the second straight year. It is the first time since 1953-54 that Bucknell has had two winning years in succession.

Yesterday afternoon, the Bison dropped their season finale to West Chester, 5-2. Kazanjian was given another shot to get his seventh win, but despite pitching well, he could not get it. The righthander went the distance, giving up nine hits while being charged with just two Leftfielder Jim Zervanos '92 rounds third and heads for home during a victory over Colgate two weeks ago. In his final season, he ended up hitting .336 with 16 RBI and 36 hits.

Hartzell completes fourth year at Bison sports helm

BY MITCH BENTON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Since coming to Bucknell in 1988, Rick Hartzell has seen the school's athletic department add three varsity sports, enter a new league, renovate stadiums, and increase athletic fund-raising from barely one hundred thousand to nearly one-half of a million dollars. Despite these accomplishments Hartzell, now finishing his fourth year as Bucknell's Athletic Director, has never forgotten why he entered this profession.

"The most important aspect of my job is to determine the best way to serve the students," claims Hartzell. "Once you have found it, you can never vary. It's easy to get caught up in the building of buildings, and fund-raising, but I've always put the students at the top of the pyramid."

As the Bison's Athletic Director, Hartzell is responsible for guiding the activities of his department's 26 varsity sports, and see to the well-being of the school's almost 800 varsity athletes. A self-titled coach of coaches, he must oversee personnel management, intramurals, and alumni relations, and apparently undertakes this juggling act with great dexterity.

Hartzell's immediate supervisor, Vice-President for Student Services, Barbara Shailor, attests to his abilities, "Rick has worked very hard on improving the quality of both the men's and women's teams, showing great gender equity. He has put a new emphasis on women's sports and they have gained in support. He has done an excellent job and is extremely cooperative with the administration. It would be an understatement to say that Rick's leaving would create a number of holes in the department."

While the marriage between Bucknell and its Athletic Director appears to be a nice fit, a number of events over recent weeks have made divorce a possibility. Although discussions are in very early stages, Hartzell has been contacted by his alma mater, the University of Northern Iowa, regarding the possibility of heading its Athletic Department.

"Everything is in the exploratory stage," explains the Iowa native, "I grew up there and it had quite an effect on me. They called to talk to me about the position, along with a few other candidates. Like I've always told my staff, if another position is offered with competitive salary and perks, you owe it to yourself and your family to look."

Athletes and Coaches of the Year

Outstanding swimmer Margaret Grunow '93 and her team's coach, Lynn Kachmarik, honored as Women's Athlete & Coach of the Year for their record-shattering performances last winter

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's swim team enjoyed a very successful 1991-92 season under the coaching of Lynn Kachmarik and the talent and leadership of co-captain Margaret Grunow '93. For their accomplishments this athletic season, Kachmarik and Grunow have been named as Women's Coach and Athlete of the Year by The Bucknellian.

Emily Wolken — The Bucknellian
LYNN KACHMARIK AND MARGARET GRUNOW '93

Kachmarik has been the head coach of the Bucknell women's swim team for ten years, during which she has amassed a 65-41-1 dual meet record. The team's 1991-92 8-2 record marks its best record since the 1986-87 season, the only year that the women's swim team has captured a conference title.

Last season, the Bison came close to winning the league championship, suffering from just a 14.5 point margin to the Champions from Army. Bucknell repeated as the league runner-up this year, edging out Army, but losing to powerhouse Navy in what was the first Patriot League appearance for the Midshipmen.

Kachmarik's 1991-92 regular season was highlighted by a 131-112 win over swimming rival Drexel. The victory marked the first time in the history of Bucknell women's swimming that the Bison have beat the Dragons. Two of Kachmarik's other teams had come within one point of Drexel, including the 1989-90 squad. Bucknell's 8-2 record also led the Patriot League in winning percentage this year.

Kachmarik also coached her team to a record-shattering conference appearance; at the Championship meet, the Bison combined to break thirteen school records, ten individual and three relay marks. Of those marks, seven also established new Patriot League records.

At that meet, two of Kachmarik's talented swimmers garnered conference champion honors in five individual events. Three of her five relay squads also captured gold medals. For those achievements, Kachmarik was named the Patriot League Women's Swimming Coach of the Year at the conference meet.

Grunow, the most versatile and successful women's swimmer in Bucknell history, came off of a disappointing 1990-91 season to take the swimming scene by storm this year.

The junior specializes in the sprint freestyle and butterfly events, but puts up a fight in just about any event in which she competes. Since she arrived at Bucknell, Grunow has competed in "off" events whenever the Bison were in need of her talent outside of the sprint events.

Those events to which she was unaccustomed included the 500 and 200 freestyles and the 200 individual medley. "Unaccustomed" is a relative term for Grunow, as she has set school records in both the 200 free and the 200 IM; the latter mark fell this January.

A co-captain of this season's team, Grunow enjoyed an undefeated season, the first of her collegiate career. In fact, no one even came close to beating her all winter. Grunow has only been touched out four times since her arrival at Bucknell, and all four losses came in an "off" event.

Grunow now owns five individual school records and is a member of four school record-setting relay squads. At this year's Patriot League Championship meet, Grunow swam to conference champion status in all three of her individual events, the 50 and 100 frees and the 100 fly. Her times of 23.58, 51.11, and 56.52 respectively all shattered Bucknell and Patriot League records. At the conference competition, Grunow also led three relay squads to gold medals and new school records.

"I was really excited to break the 24 and the 52 second barriers in the freestyle events. I'd never broken into the lower ranges in either event before and was pretty surprised at my times," she said. For her accomplishments in the pool, Grunow was named co-Patriot League Swimmer of the Year, an honor that she shared with Holy Cross's Jill Adessa.

When asked about her goals for next year, Grunow stated, "Right now I am working to fit swimming into my schedule this summer, and I plan to train as hard as I always do during my college season, so I am hoping for the best. On a more cut-and-dry level, I'd really like to see a 50 point in the 100 free next year."

In January, Grunow enjoyed perhaps the greatest achievement of her swimming career when she qualified for the Olympic Trial meet. At that competition, Grunow competed against the nation's best swimmers, finishing 32nd in the 50-meter free with a time of 26.87.

In this day and age of scandal and athletes leaving early to turn pro, it's difficult to figure out what the NCAA's all about. Forget about the UNLV's or Tracy Murray's of the world and focus on the Bucknell men's cross country, The Bucknellian's Male Athletes and Coach of the Year. Art Gulden's team of Matt Deardorff '92, Jason Cahilly '92, Tom Wuchenich '92, Tom Eagleson '93, Judd Jarden '92, Jeff Loomis '92, and Bob Kelly '92 dominated both the track and the classroom this past year.

A team GPA greater than 3.6 with three Phi Beta Kappas and one Tau Beta Phi (the engineering equivalent) is impressive no matter what its record. However, last fall they finished 13th at nationals; tops amongst non-scholarships schools. True student-athletes (four of whom receive no financial aid at all) striving to be both the best runners and students they can.

When Head Coach Art Gulden arrived in Lewisburg in 1970, he inherited a program that struggled locally and turned it into one that dominates nationally. The 1965 graduate of Rutgers wasted little time putting the Bison on the cross country map. His overall meet record of 234-9 includes a streak of 167 consecutive dual-match victories without a defeat and 17 straight conference titles. Nine trips to the NCAA's in the past 14 years (his 1982 team finished 12th at nationals), not to mention being named the District II Coach of the Year last fall, ranks Gulden among Bucknell's finest coaches of any sport. To determine what makes him so successful, you need only to ask any member of his team. "He never settles, or lets us settle, for anything less than our best," said one senior runner. "He always believed in us, even when we didn't."

The athletes and their coach always comment as a group and never separate the parts of their team. You ask all eight one question and you get the same answer. They get embarrassed when you mention them specifically and try to change the focus back onto the team.

"It's difficult to explain," said Gulden. "We're more like friends than just coach and athletes. You can't separate anybody." He went on to say, "Without any one of them we wouldn't have been as good."

Every time I asked them to comment on each other, they just wanted to talk about the season. It makes for a near impossible article to write, but I'll respect their wishes and focus on the season. Thanks guys!

While the dual-meet portion of their season is taken for granted as much as their making the dean's list, reaching districts is far from a given. In fact, the team only qualified for nationals by two points. Loomis' "miracle final half-mile" kick in which he passed several opponents saved the team. However, both he and the coach were quick to point out that without the four guys who crossed the finish line ahead of him, his kick wouldn't have meant a thing.

Once in Tucson with the other 22 teams who managed to qualify for nationals, Bucknell found themselves ranked 23rd. No respect. When it was all said and done, they were upset with themselves for finishing 13th. In fact, if you were to count all seven runners from each squad and not just the top five, the Bison would have finished in the top eight.

"We never had all seven guys run their optimal race on the same day," reflected Gulden. "We didn't have the one burner who got us the low number every time out."

Finally, Gulden managed to differentiate between some of his runners. Deardorff, a GTE/Co-SIDA Academic All-America who finished first in most of the meets and is credited with having "the best leg speed" of any of the runners, was named the team's MVP at its post-season banquet. Wuchenich, the first Bison to cross the finish line at Tucson, "came the furthest" in his four years according to Gulden. Eagleson and Jarden, the two underclassmen, "are ready to lead next year because they've had a taste of nationals and want to get back." Even that was like getting blood from a stone. They're a true team.

According to Gulden, what makes the team an ideal NCAA program is that "We do it right;" in other words, no scholarships, no fifth-year, red-shirted athletes. Everyone gets educated and graduates in four years. No other team at this year's nationals could comply with such high standards. Dartmouth, the only other non-scholarship school that made it to Tucson, had fifth-year senior runners and they still finished behind the Bison.

Not many schools can boast a top-fifteen ranked team in such a popular sport, let alone a four-year, non-scholarship school with the academic standards of a Bucknell. Any athletic department would be fortunate to have any of these eight people go through it at anytime, let alone all together. The NCAA should stop worrying about UNLV and start publicizing teams such as the 1991 Bucknell Men's Cross Country Team. Gulden said it all when he said, "I could talk about this team forever." I could too, coach, and yes you guys do "do it right."

Tricia Plasko '92

Bucknell sprinter Tricia Plasko '92 has been named The Bucknellian's Athlete of the Week for the week of May 1-7.

Plasko set a school record in the 200-meter dash with a time of 24.74 at the Patriot League Championships last weekend at Holy Cross. Bucknell's women's squad finished second to to Army at the meet.

Plasko also ran on the 4x100-meter relay team which set another Bucknell record with a time of 48.08. In her third event of the meet, Plasko placed second in the 100-meter dash—an event won by Tameka Hinton '95, also from Bucknell.

Softball suffers disappointing tourney

After being seeded third, Bison fall to Lafayette Leopards 5–1 and Fordham Rams 1–0

BY ANDREA FALCIONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell softball team ended its 1992 season on a down note, tying for last at the Patriot League Championships last weekend. The Bison went into the tournament with a third-place standing and, had they played up to their full potential, could have made the championship game more exciting than the 8-0 routing that Army gave to Colgate. Colgate, the fourth-seed team, was swept in a doubleheader against Bucknell earlier this spring.

The Bucknell women faced Lafayette, a team that ended its regular season with a 3-29 record, in the first round of tournament play. The Bison shelled the Leopards when they met them in the regular season, posting two easy, shutout victories. Perhaps unwisely looking beyond the underdogs to who they may have met next, the Bison were very *un*pleasantly surprised.

Lafayette scored once in the third, but both teams were fairly flat until the sixth inning, when the Leopards got an offensive spark. During that inning, Lafayette scored an impressive four runs. Bucknell was not only plagued by poor hitting, with three of its top six offensive players going hitless, but returned to its inconsistent defensive play as well. Lafayette was helped out in its 5-1 winning effort by four Bucknell fielding errors.

Bucknell's only run came in the bottom of the sixth, when Kelly Corr '95 had a sacrifice hit to drive in Ellen Gabriel '93. Gabriel reached base after being hit by a pitch earlier in the inning and had stolen a base to move into scoring position.

Jen Yuengling '93 and Heather Hoehn '94 were the only two multiple hitters for Bucknell on the day, going two-for-four with a triple and two-for-three with a double respectively. Yuengling also stole her 20th base of the season; the junior was a perfect 20-for-20 in stolen base attempts on the season. Devaney Kerr '94 also mustered a hit for the otherwise faltering Bison.

On Saturday, Bucknell faced the Fordham Rams, who had lost to Colgate by four on the previous day. This contest ended up in a pitchers' duel. Fordham's Jen Satriale and Heidi Dawson '95 both pitched great games, each allowing only four hits in seven innings. Unfortunately, the Bison ended up on the losing end of their second game as well, behind a one-run effort by their opponents.

Ashley Chertkof — The Bucknellian

In the Fordham game, only Hoehn shined at the plate, hitting a perfect two-for-two while reaching base on balls once. Kerr and Jill Spatzer '93 also connected one time apiece at the plate.

Although the Bison returned to Lewisburg disenheartened, they had two things to smile about. First, Hoehn and Lisa Fink '93 were both honored by the League by being chosen for the All-Patriot League Team. Fink ended the season with a strong .344 batting average, 20 stolen bases, and eight doubles, the latter two leading the Patriot League as well as the Bison.

Hoehn ended the season with a .319 batting average, seven doubles, and a league and team-leading 31 runs batted in. The firstbaseman was also an extremely consistent defensive player for Bucknell all season, leading the team with a .986 fielding percentage.

The other pleasant Bison note is that they will look to take the Patriot League by storm next season, as they will lose only one senior, co-captain Amy Holman, to graduation. Next season's squad will feature an exceptionally talented senior class, with the likes of Yuengling, Fink, Gabriel, and Carol Gesler returning. These four, along with Hoehn and Kerr, round out the top six hitters on the 1992 Bucknell team.

The 1993 season will also see the reappearance of pitchers Dawson and Allison Love '95 with a year of collegiate experience under their belts. Both pitchers graced the Bucknell mound with confidence and a sense of style this season, each ending their rookie year with a winning record.

With the addition of what is sure to be a strong freshman class, the Bison should enjoy an even more fruitful season during the 1992-93 academic year.

While Northern Iowa is the first school that has tempted Hartzell to leave Lewisburg, it is not the first to come calling. When called upon, the director always cites his employer's reputation over his own accomplishments for the inquiries. "Last year a position opened at Nebraska as did Columbia before that. But when these schools call, they are not calling because of Rick Hartzell, they are calling because of Bucknell."

The Bison's NCAA faculty representative, Timothy Sweeney, the Chair of the Management Department, disagrees and notes the director's abilities. "His leaving would lead to a difficult transition. He is very decisive. Rick takes on difficult, complicated issues head on and is very direct. I'd have to give him very high marks as an athletic administrator."

Upon his graduation from UNI in 1974, he stayed at the school to earn his Master of Arts in 1977. It was from there that Hartzell, who had played football and baseball as an undergraduate, began a coaching career. Leading the baseball squad of Coe College in 1978 and '79, he received a Coach-of-the-Year Award. From Coe he left for the University of Iowa where he started work on a doctorate degree. It was at Iowa that Hartzell's career moved from the fields and into the offices.

An Assistant Athletic Director's position opened for Hartzell at Northwestern University, where he remained until 1985 when he became the director at the University of Maryland at Baltimore County. Ironically, Hartzell had Northwestern to thank again, when, in 1988, then Bucknell Athletic Director, Bruce Corrie left to take the reigns at NU.

"I called and applied at Bucknell," recalls Hartzell. "I was told that I was one of the five finalists, but they were only going to interview four." Giving up hope, Hartzell left to attend a conference in Florida where he received a career-altering phone message. "Larry Shin called and said that he didn't like any of the four candidates and wanted to talk to me. I jumped on a plane and the rest, I guess, was history."

Athletic administration was not the only new career that Hartzell found while coaching at Coe. While there he had read about college basketball refereeing and went to an organizational meeting. After moving to the east coast, he advanced his status by earning a position as a referee in the Atlantic Coast Conference after competing at an ACC tryout.

Some people associated with the Bison Athletic Department have privately aired concerns about the mixture of administration and officiating. The time commitment associated with Hartzell's refereeing, which has since expanded to include the Big East and Big Ten Conferences, forces him to spend considerable amounts of time during the winter away from Lewisburg.

Despite this, Hartzell claims that he has not lost focus on his position. "Bucknell's always been my top priority. I try to be careful of scheduling when I go and where, but I do miss some games and some of the home games which I hate to be away from." He also feels that the national exposure and contacts that he gains from the experience can help the school, such as in gaining an automatic bid for the newly formed Patriot League in 1992.

He may have an impressive list of accomplishments already, but if Hartzell decides not to return to Northern Iowa, he has an agenda of additional issues he hopes to address. "We've already added a baseball and softball complex and built the West Fields, but I still think more can be done in that area. It looks like renovations are going to be done to Davis Gym and we are going to spruce up the Annex."

Despite the physical changes, Bucknell's Athletic Director has no doubt that the most important issue facing his position is the welfare and integrity of the athletes and the programs. "I've always tried to make the student in student-athlete a priority."

While he may leave to return to his alma mater, Hartzell is adamant that it is not due to any dislike for his current situation. "I love this place. I love Bucknell, the kids are so mature and competitive. I have really grown into this situation. If I were to leave it would have to be perfect."

earned runs. Three Bucknell errors directly led to three West Chester runs. The highlight of the day came from Kennedy, who hit a long homer into the wind in his final collegiate plate apperance.

The homer was Kennedy's fourth of the season—most on the club. The senior catcher hit .292 on the year, and he also led the team in doubles (10) and RBI (34). Several other Bison had terrific seasons as well. Koerner, despite missing six games due to injury, was named to the All-Patriot League Team as a designated hitter. Koerner hit .358 with three homers, and he led the team with a .547 slugging percentage.

Zervanos finished his career with a fine season at the plate. The leftfielder hit .336, collecting 36 hits and 16 RBI on the year. Zervanos, while wishing he could have had more seasons like this one, still relishes his role with the team. "I was not recruited like Kennedy, Koerner, and Sniegocki," said Zervanos. "I feel privileged to have been a part of this team."

Speaking of Sniegocki, it was a breakthrough year for the centerfielder. Taking over for superstar Roger Ahrens this year, Sniegocki hit .302 with team-highs in triples (7), stolen bases (11), and hits (39). He was also second on the club in RBI with 27. Second baseman Mike Kearns turned in his second straight steady season. As a leadoff hitter, Kearns batted .322, stole nine bases, and led the club with 27 runs scored. As a team the Bison hit .298, compared to a .286 average from their opponents.

One of the major disappointments this year was the team defense. Bucknell committed 63 errors in 35 games, winding up with a rather poor .948 fielding percentage. Bison pitchers had to account for 47 unearned runs. It is hard for a team to play consistent ball when it gives away over a run a game.

The pitching was inconsistent, as well. Despite taking the loss in his last two starts, Kazanjian was brilliant all season. He finished the year 6-3 with a 2.95 ERA in ten games. He completed seven of his nine starts, tossed one shutout (a 1-0 masterpiece over league-champion Fordham), and even picked up a save.

Sniegocki appeared in five games in relief and did not allow a run. Koerner's homer gave him his first collegiate win in the C.W. Post game.

The rest of the staff had its moments, but for the most part was fairly shaky. Kurt Waldner came off an arm injury to post a 3-5 record with a 4.62 ERA. He did lead the staff in strikeouts with 43. Dave Scranton '95 was the best of the freshmen, posting a 3-3 record with a 5.86 ERA. Scranton cracked the starting rotation for the last month of the season.

While the 18-17 season may have been somewhat of a disappointment, the future looks bright. The entire pitching staff will return next season with another year of experience under their belts. Catcher John Martine '94 is an excellent receiver, and he showed promise at the plate this year, hitting .304 in 23 at-bats. Koerner's bat and versatility will be missed, so somebody will have to step up there—maybe Brian Walter '94. Rinker does have one more year of eligibility, but it is unclear as to whether he will return. If not, the position will likely go to Walter or Scott Sutfin '94. Sutfin, who hit .329 in 28 games this year, can also play the outfield, and may be Zervanos' replacement next season.

Farewell to Gibby

After being waived by the Pittsburgh Pirates this week, Kirk Gibson announced his retirement, saying he was tired. "You get older and it's harder to stay focused on baseball," Gibson said. "I think it might be nice to be home in the summer and spend some time with the kids."

The 34-year-old Gibson has a right to relax for a while. There were better players in the last decade, but fewer who played with such fire. There are fewer still who can say that they are connected to one of the greatest moments in baseball history. Although I expect to see many more decades of baseball, I can safely say that Kirk Gibson's ninth-inning home run in the 1988 World Series is the greatest moment in baseball which I will see in my lifetime.

My older brother was a Bucknell freshman in the fall of 1975, and I have heard him talk about another dramatic home run, as Carlton Fisk of the Red Sox went deep over Fenway's Green Monster to beat the Reds in that year's Fall Classic. The video clip of Fisk waving to coax the foul-line shot fair is nearly as legendary as Babe Ruth's mythical "called" World Series home run (except that Fisk's exploits were real).

Sure, I've seen the highlight plenty of times, but my brother actually lived it. Packed into a TV lounge in Trax Hall with dozens of freshmen he watched the moment unfold, and the place just exploded. From listening to him tell the story, it was clear that this was a formative moment in his life as a sports fan, one of those "where were you when..." moments.

I always thought it sounded great, but it's too bad I'll never live through anything like that. Enter Kirk Gibson.

During my freshman year at Bucknell, I wondered down to the Vedder TV lounge to catch the end of the opening game of the Series. The Dodgers were losing to the Athletics, but had the tying runs aboard in their home ninth. It was pinch hitter time, and I watched incredulously as an injured and grimacing Gibson limped out from the dugout. Great, I thought, stupid heroics. He'll look really bad when he strikes out and they carry him off on a stretcher. He thinks he's Roy Hobbs.

He was Roy Hobbs, as life did art one better. In The Natural, Hobbs, wincing and bleeding, hit the shot that won the pennant for the New York Knights. As I watched Gibson at the plate, I thought it sad that life was never so dramatic. But then, he sent that no-doubt-about-it shot into the stands... I felt shock, jubilation, amazement... he was Roy Hobbs.

In that same moment I learned what my brother had meant. I had lived this one, which I will never, ever forget.

And so, a short farewell to Gibson, who played with the grit of a former football standout (which he was). Kirk Gibson will probably never make it into the Hall of Fame without a ticket, but few of those men on the plaques can claim a moment of immortality like his. No one can take that moment away from Gibson.

Or from me.

Track places second at Patriot Leagues

Army sweeps men's and women's titles at Holy Cross as Bison are unable to defend both of their titles

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

We were just spoiled I guess. To expect another sweep of the Patriot League Outdoor Track and Field Championships would have been to ask the near imposible. The United States Military Academy used superior muscle to capture enough points in the field events to render the track events all but insignificant.

"If you take away the field events, this would've been one heck of a good dual-meet," said Head Coach Art Gulden. Dual meet is exactly the right term. Army's men outscored Bucknell's 274 to 142, while the remaining five teams brought nothing to Holy Cross' facility. Lafayette finished third with only 63 points; Lehigh (60), Fordham (49), Colgate (45), and host Holy Cross (15). The women's meet was equally dominated by the Cadets, but the race for second was much tighter. The Bison topped the Leopards by just seven and fell to Army by 63 points.

"If you take away the field events, this would've been one heck of a good dual-meet," — Coach Art Gulden

Despite knowing how formidable an opponent Army would be, neither squad "rolled over." "They're smart kids. They looked at the charts and knew it would take an unbelievable performance to beat them," said Gulden. "Maybe this is good. It will force us to raise our expectations of what we as a team and a coaching staff need to do to prepare to go to the next level."

Several Bison boasted outstanding individual performances. Tricia Plasko '92 set a new school record in the 200-meter dash with a time of 24.74. The women's 4X100-meter relay team, which Plasko was on, also established a new school record with its 48.08.

Colin Bridgewater — The Bucknellian

Tricia Plasko '92 prepares to pass the baton to Audra Wilson '94 in last year's championships. The two of them made up half of the first place 4x100-meter relay team at this year's finals.

Bucknell snatched three other firsts at last weekends finals. Kristen Opdyke '93 won the 10,000-meter run in 38:21.29. Dawn Ellery '94 took the gold in the high jump at 5'4". Tameka Hinton '95 got top honors in the 100-meter dash with her time of 12.29. Plasko placed second, and Julie Diercks '93 fourth in that event.

Jim Bock '92, like Plasko, earned firsts in a dash and a relay. Bock won the 100-meter dash and had a leg in the winning 4X100-meter relay. Bob Kelly '92 crossed the finish at 31:29.05 to place first in the 10,000-meter run.

Matt Deardorff '92 continued Bucknell's distance dominance by placing first in the 5,000-meter. In the 400-meter intermediate hurdles, Rick Van Emburgh '95 captured gold in 53.60.

"Army was just too good and too deep for us," reflected Gulden. "The rest of the conference didn't help much in breaking up some of their scoring and they didn't let up. But, I wouldn't want or expect anyone, especially a service academy, to let up at all. Despite them, overall I'd say we had a good meet, though."

Other than those who won events, several Bison garnered points for their respective squads. Paula Lyons '95 got sixth in the 100-meter hurdles. Jenny Thomas '94 and Ella Episcopo '92 finished third and fifth in the triple jump, respectively. Kris Deardorff '93 placed fifth in the javelin. Gina Abraham '93 and Kathy Wurster '94 scored in both the 800-meters and 1500-meters. Hinton captured sixth in the shotput and Bridget Dean '95 took third in the 400-meter intermediate hurdles.

Audra Wilson '94 scored in both the long jump and 200-meter dash. Opdyke finished fifth in the 5,000-meter run. The Bison relay teams "really pleased" the coaching staff. Not only were they the first place 4X100-meter team, but the second place 4X800-meter team and the third place mile-relay group.

For the men, Jason Cahilly '92, Mike Bronson '93 and Dave Howard '93 joined Kelly in the scoring portion of the 10,000-meter race. Joe LaBarge '93 broke a string of three straight Cadets in the pole vault by finishing fourth. Blaine Fawcett '93 placed among the top three in the javelin, 110-meter hurdle, and the high jump. John Plante '94 and Thomas Rabosky '95 joined Fawcett in scoring in the high jump. Sam Bijelic '94 and Pete Gregory '93 provided the Bison with the remainder of their field points with their top six performances in the shotput, hammer, and discus throws.

Matt Deardorff '92 and Dave Howard '93, pictured here in last year's Patriot League Outdoor Track and Field Championships held here at Bucknell, won this year's 5,000-meter run and placed fifth in the 10,000-meter run, respectively.

Colin Bridgewater — The Bucknellian

Tom Eagleson '93, a graduate of Walt Whitman High School, shown here at last year's finals, took third in the 1500-meter run at this spring's championships at The College of the Holy Cross.

Brad Bernardini '94 took the bronze in the 100-meter dash. Jean Simon '94 and Kristofer Fischlein '95 finished forth and sixth, respectively, in the 400-meter dash. Tom Eagleson '93 earned a third and sixth in the 1500-meters and 800-meters. Jim Farrer '93 took fifth in the former. Bock got fifth in the 200-meter dash and Tom Wuchenich '92 sixth in the 5,000-meter run.

Adam Scarletti '94 and Kevin Nicholas '95 scored in the 400-meter intermediate hurdles. The men's relay teams pleased the coaching staff as much as the women's with their third place finish in the 4X800-meters and second in the mile relay.

"Army showed a lot of talent and class," commented Gulden. "They went to the wall by doubling and tripling most of their athletes and we didn't do that because it's not our style. We believe in using fresher legs throughout the meet instead." When asked if he thought Army was making a statement to the rest of the league by pouring it on in the men's and women's meet, Gulden said, "The academies never let up and that's good. Sure they were sending the message that whenever they want to they can run with us."

"We're going to re-evaluate and reset our goals much higher to go after them." — Coach Art Gulden

Gulden ended by saying, "We're going to re-evaluate and reset our goals much higher to go after them."

Bucknell captures Presidents' Cup

Bison edge Lehigh by 1.5 points for second straight overall sports title

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For the second consecutive year, Bucknell has won the Patriot League Presidents' Cup. In the closest race ever, Bucknell edged Lehigh by 1.5 points to claim the overall title.

Bison athletes won three championships in 1991-92 and accumulated 114.5 points, while Lehigh compiled 113 points without winning a single title. The three Bucknell championship teams this year are the men's cross country team and the men's and women's indoor track teams.

The Presidents' Cup is an annual award given to the school which accumulates the most points over the academic year. Points are based on tournament finishes or, if there is no post-season for that particular sport, regular-season finishes. The sports in which there are no championship tournaments are baseball, football, field hockey, and men's and women's lacrosse.

1991–1992 FINAL PATRIOT LEAGUE PRESIDENTS' CUP STANDINGS

BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY	114.5
Lehigh University	113.0
Lafayette College	108.5
Colgate University	100.5
United States Military Academy	99.0
Fordham University	88.0
Colgate University	61.0
United States Naval Academy	37.5

One key to this year's race was avoiding sub-fifth place finishes. Bucknell only had teams place lower than fifth in three sports, while Lehigh had only one. Bucknell had seven second place teams to Lehigh's six.

The United States Military Academy set a league record by collecting nine championship titles this year. However, Army was hurt by the fact that they only competed in 14 of the 22 varsity sports.

Ironically, Bucknell did not capture either the Men's or Women's Championship Trophy. Lehigh's men edged Bucknell 62.5-59, while Bison women were nipped by Lafayette 58.5-55.5.

The fact that Bucknell's men and women both had consistent success turned out to be the key to retaining the cup.

By virtue of its athletic achievement, Bucknell captured its second-straight Patriot Presidents' Cup for overall excellence in 22 varsity sports. Despite not winning either the men's or women's titles, the Bison managed to edge out Lehigh.
